I trust this digression will be pardoned, for I cannot give my opinion of American orchestras except by comparison with those in Europe; and it has therefore seemed to me serviceable to explain why the French orchestras are so inferior to the American orchestras, since in the Boston Orchestra is to be found a very great number of French solo instruments.

* * *

Which American orchestra is to be ranked the first? I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. There are simply nuances to differentiate these three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

It is, in truth, a very difficult matter to determine the intrinsic worth of these orchestras without taking into consideration the conductors who have slowly fashioned them. The sonority may change according to the director. All those whom I have heard in the United States are extraordinary technicians. I will not return to Toscanini again. He is the king and every one bows before his mastery and genius.

Leopold Stokowsky dazzles me. I am not sure that he is always correct in his very free interpretations of masterworks, but I must admit that I have thought of this only in retrospect. During the performance, in spite of my surprise in hearing the finale of the Franck symphony so filled with personal and original effects that I no longer recognized the orchestration, I applauded enthusiastically. And then, what a marvelous execution of the Debussy "Nocturnes"! Never have I heard them played so! The "Fêtes" (with the unheard-of effect of the brasses giving a pianissimo echo) struck me as being that which Debussy had dreamed, without the hope of ever hearing it realized.

An astonishing musician is this Leopold Stokowski, and I hope with all my heart that Europe will be able to hear him some day at the head of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky is very popular in Paris, where we are grateful to him for some magnificent concerts which he has given here, and for all the great new works which he has introduced. No other conductor has done so much for modern music in France as Mr. Koussevitzky. I am happy to see that he continues along these lines in the United States, for it is due to his initiative that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has commissioned some new works for its fiftieth anniversary by the best contemporaneous composers, and has brought into existence symphonies by Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Albert Roussel, &c.

* * *

Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third symphony, Debussy's "La Mer", and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!

Frederick Stock impresses me as belonging to a category other than these two directors. One feels that his taste and make-up are essentially classical. He has a profound respect for the works he interprets, and forces himself to translate all the author's intentions, effacing himself as much as possible behind the writer. For me, he and Stokowski stand at the opposite poles. Incontestably, he is a great servant of music.

He conducts works with extreme simplicity, without any sought-after effects. One feels him to be in possession of all the secrets of his profession and to be playing upon his orchestra with absolute sureness. Some virtuosi have confided to me that nowhere have they felt more at ease than when playing a concerto in Chicago, knowing they can do anything they wish with the certainty of being followed always by the orchestra.

America is fortunate is possessing such orchestras and such conductors.

Tullio Serafin, with the authorization of Nicholas Tcherepnine, has made a further cut of about ten minutes in the second act of Moussorgsky's "The Fair at Sorochintzy."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

DEC 7 - 1930

Music and Musicians

Reviews and News of Capital's Programs.

Beethoven Festival Has Impressive Finale.

ONE of the most stirring climaxes that musical Washington will probably ever hear was brought about yesterday afternoon at Constitution Hall, when Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a large local chorus paid final tribute to the week's Beethoven festival by an inspired rendition of the "Ninth Symphony."

Albert W. Harned.

With Koussevitzky at the helm, the gigantic lyricisms of the famous chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," soared through the great hall on the wings of what must inevitably be called "greatness." For, after a not too invigorating performance of the "First Symphony," Koussevitzky shook himself and his orchestra from the sluggishness of the early afternoon and summoned up fire and thunder, and a leadership that swept everything before it, and made an audience that listened breathlessly applaud feverishly when it was all over.

This was, in fact, something that will not easily be forgotten. It is something that Washington should be proud of for having had, and Boston, proud of for having given.

There is, furthermore, a local aspect of it that makes it all the warmer. The chorus that has been training these many months, under the nimble baton of Dr. Albert W. Harned, sang with an intensity and a display of professionalism that raised it up at once into the clouds, and pointed to its being an organization for whom no music seems too difficult. It sang, too, not in sections, nor with highlights and lowlights that were lumpy in their graduations, but as a whole—and as one—with an eye for the leader—who could not, of course, lead it astray. If there is any fault to be found, it was that the ladies outshone the men—the soprano strains coming forth with clarity and ease—putting the stronger sex somewhat in the shade.

The soloists, Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada Van Der Veer, Dan Gridley and Fraser Gange, all of them artists of distinction, sang their parts with no thought save that of blending in with the whole, and thus—not able to express their own individual merits to any great degree—were yet responsible for much that was especially melodious and soothing to the ear.

All of which, with Koussevitzky at his most majestic, summoning voices and instruments into complete harmony, brought the week's fete to a triumphant close and made one shed more than a single tear that such a resume of the greatest works of Beethoven should have come and gone so speedily.

E. de S. M.

78

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 7 - 1930

New Works For Orchestra Given By Boston Symphony

Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony Found to Be Impressive and Interesting at First Boston Performance — "Metamorphoseon" of Respighi Receives Scant Praise—Conservatory Group Gives Concert

The works composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony continue to put in regular appearances, says A. H. Meyer in Musical America. Recent concerts brought Respighi's "Metamorphoseon," and Prokofieff's Fourth Sqmphony, in C Major.

"Metamorphoseon" is a theme with 13 variations, written in virtuoso style. The theme is modal, suggesting plain-song. The variations, save the seventh, group themselves in such a manner as to suggest the sequence of movements in a symphony. The seventh variation includes cadenzas for almost all the instruments, from bassoon and bass clarinet to solo violin and harp. One found decoration upon a theme where one might reasonably have expected germination of new through from the original motif. One missed the brilliance which alone would have justified the difficulties which Respighi placed in his score. Despite an exciting and sonorous conclusion and isolated moments of beauty, the score won little or no favorable comment from the press.

New Prokofieff Symphony

Prokofieff's new symphony is another matter. It divided both the press and the audiences. While Friday's audience remained apathetic, Saturday's recalled Dr Koussevitzky again and again, until finally he bade his men rise in acknowledgment.

The symphony is in the conventional four movements, with slow introduction preceding the first. Prokofieff in some passages has used the same musical material which is introduced in his ballet, "The Prodigal Son," given in Paris, May, 1929.

The principal theme of the first movement is aggressive and virile. To this mood the symphony returns with even greater force and concentration in the last movement, whose chief theme may well be descrivbed as rugged and exceedingly wild. The contrasting theme in the first movement is suave and ingratiating, suggesting the so-called "Mozartean" style of the composer's earlier "Classical Symphony." On the whole, the themes seem to the writer to be of no little musical significance. And the treatment is entirely worthy of them.

Music of Austere Power

The style is in the main far less dissonant than that of, say, the "Scythian" suite. On the other hand, this symphony contains far less sunshine and cheer than the "Classical Symphony." It is dark, austere, hard, forbidding—music of lean, powerful sinews. Greyness, gloom are not far in the distance. It is thus a music that easily baffles one.

Needless to say, Dr Koussevitzky and his men were lavish in the expenditure of time and effort upon these two new scores, and splendid performances were the result. At the second of the concerts there was another event of importance. Victor Polatschek, new clarinetist of the orchestra, was introduced as soloist in the Mozart Clarinet concerto. One admired not less the fine, sensitive, well-colored tone than the subtlety and variety of interpretation.

This concert began with a light and delicate performance of Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and ended with an extremely brilliant and highly rhythmed version of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Saprice." The concert of a week earlier included also Handel's Concerto Grosso in B Minor and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

The orchestra of the ew England Conservatory of Music, Wallace Goodrich, conductor, gave its first concert of the year on November 15. Joseph Malkin, newly appointed teacher of 'cello, was the soloist in Lalo's concerto in D Minor. The orchestral numbers weer the overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," the Nocturne from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Chausson's symphony in B flat major.

With many new members entering the orchestra this fall, Mr Goodrich has gone far indeed toward the desired ideal of perfection in ensemble. Precision and solid sonorities were noteworthy in the playing. The flexibility, the well-planned interpretative details which Mr Goodrich was able to secure from the young musicians showed them going much farther than merely meeting the challenge of the difficulties contained in the Chausson work.

Handel and Mozart Works Replace Russian Moderns

Lack of Time for Rehearsal Prevents Stravinsky and Nabokov From Being Played by Boston Symphony. Tschaikowski Remains as Scheduled

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Had Dr. Koussevitzky not fallen ill at the end of the Beethoven Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave in Washington a fortnight ago, Providence would have heard from him and his band at the Albee Theatre Tuesday evening an all-Russian program with compositions by Stravinsky, Nabokov and Tschaikowski. Now, owing to lack of time for rehearsal, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, as yet unheard in Boston, has disappeared from the list, and with it the symphony of Nabokov. In their place stand two classics. Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, in B-minor, and the G-minor Symphony of Mozart.

As Providence would have discovered had things remained unaltered, neither the present-day Stravinsky of the Capriccio nor the youthful Nabokov is especially formidable. But for every hearer who craves the new in music there are at least a dozen who prefer the tried and true (which incidentally was itself once new and debatable), so that the change of program will undoubtedly please more than it disappoints.

Although he did not wear his heart upon his sleeve and although he avowed no program for his music, in which content is always subservient to form, the Mozart of the G-minor Symphony, one of the three which he wrote in the summer of 1789, is himself something of a romanticist, anticipating by some three decades the Schubert of the "Unfinished" Symphony, also classic in structure but distinctly personal in expression. The little G-minor, the symphony without trumpets or drums, is tinged with a melancholy that must have represented something more than the pattern-making in tones, the fashioning of beautiful sounds and of melodies spirited, gay or placid, that was the be-all and end-all of the classical symphony.

The chromaticism of the G-minor Sympany, too, hints of music's new day that was to dawn with the turning of the century. For their own time Mozart's modulations were daring; in a symphony in G-minor such keys as F-sharp minor and C-sharp minor were employed, and even emphasized. And the slow movement strikes a profounder note than any that Mozart had sounded before. There is, indeed, an intensity of expression that suggests, not Beethoven, but Beethoven's successors. It is the G-minor Symphony more than any other of his works that makes us feel the tragedy of Mozart's early death. Beside it the first two symphonies of Beethoven, for all their greater vigor and brilliance, are superficial and immature.

But if we cannot find the simon-pure classicist in Mozart of this symphony, we can find him in Handel of the 12 Concerti Grossi for strings which he wrote in the space of one month in the autumn of 1739. This Twelfth Concerto, in B-minor, has long been overlooked by Dr. Koussevitzky's predecessors, and most unjustly, since its general level of interest is sufficiently high and its slow movement is one of Handel's finest. The broad chief melody of this movement, in which Italian sweetness and German strength are happily blended, is as typically Handelian as that of the celebrated Largo from "Xerxes."

The remaining piece, Tschaikowski's Fourth Symphony, is, of course, romanticism of the deepest dye. Tschaikowski had no inhibitions. That which he felt, re expressed. And his feelings were considerably more violent than those of most people. They were violent even for a Russian. The Fourth Symphony, composed in 1878 and dedicated to Tschaikowski's benefactress, Mrs. Von Meck, whose face he never beheld, was written to an avowed program. This program, set forth at great length in a letter to the wealthy widow, will be quoted in full in Mr. Hale's program notes. Reduced to the fewest possible words, it represents man's endeavor to escape from his fate, his crushing destiny. That anyone's destiny might be a pleasant or a favorable one would never have occurred to the morbid, self-tortured and introspective composer of the "Pathetic" Symphony. The fate motive in the Fourth Symphony, announced at the outset, recurs ever and anon as a reminder that the sword of Damocles still hangs over a man's head. Incidentally Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Fourth Symphony has recently and to an uncommon degree stirred audiences and astonished reviewers both in Boston and in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
DEC 8 1930

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony departs in a burst of glory and we will never forget the stupendous event the Ninth Symphony was; Lisa Gardiner dances delightfully

By RUTH HOWELL

Nothing could have revealed the greatness of Beethoven more surely and more simply than the final program of the festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon. The master's first symphony was played, a simple, melodious, delicately emotioned work, savoring of Mozart, but with musical meat; and then his last. They made a perfect program in their contrast, their building to a climax, their amazing revelation of the composer's development over the years of his musical life that saw the production of nine symphonies.

The first was played just about as it was written. The audience listened to it in breathless anticipation of what was to follow. After the intermission, the packed auditorium settled down to an impressive silence. There was an air of eager expectancy, of mental and emotional readiness. A stupendous work, rarely heard here and not for a long time, was about to be played.

And today, all those people, nearly 4000, probably would trade the rest of the festival for the privilege of seeing and hearing Koussevitzky conduct that symphony.

He gave the rich music a thoughtful and intense reading. He built to climax after climax thruout the first three movements. And then he built the grandest of all in the last, when 300 people made music, 200 of them singing. Not that the man was so great nor that the chorus was so unusual, nor the orchestra any different than before. But the combination, guided by one small man who drew music from them all and sent it billowing in great waves and soaring to every high corner of the auditorium; and what music! The orchestra without the singing was enough, but the well-done task of working them together deserves extra glory.

The music of the symphony is superb, and it is taxing. But the chorus, all from Washington (more power to them) sang its parts exceedingly well; the soloists found their way capably thru the maze of singing, and the orchestra was the magnificent pedestal upon which this was built. The men played the music with accuracy, power and interest while their leader devoted himself to the singers.

The finale was the grandest noise and the most exciting thing ever heard in that hall. When it was over people wept and thundered applause for fully five minutes. The symphony took an hour and a quarter, but there were many who would have stayed to hear it over again. It is too long since this has been played here; it should be done again, while there are singers who know it and an audience eager to hear.

TRANS DEC 19

For the first time in six years Dr. Koussevitzky is disabled—by overwork in Washington with a faulty chorus no more than half prepared for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Consequently, at the Symphony Concerts this week, there will be no production of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" or of his "Caprice for Orchestra with Piano-Solo."Instead, Mr. Burgin will be deputy-conductor through a program including Sibelii 's First Symphony; Mozart's Piano-Concerto in A major—pianist Bruce Simonds; Krenek's "Little Symphony," new piece by the young Austrian modernist, heard last month in New York.

In Cambridge on Thursday evening the same pieces will be played with Mr. Burgin again conducting. . . . The program originally announced for this week—Mozart's Symphony in G minor and the two novelties from Stravinsky—is transferred to Friday and Saturday, Dec. 18 and 19, with Dr. Koussevitzky at his post.

OUTSIDE READING ON
SYMPHONY CONCERT

The music collection of the Providence Public Library has all the music to be played by the Boston Symphony Tuesday night including the Handel and Mozart works that have been substituted for the Stravinsky and Nabokov [illegible] is a miniature orches- [illegible] Tschaikowski symphony [illegible]its for piano, one of the [illegible] in the Analytic Sym- [illegible]ited by Percy Goetschius, [illegible]udents find helpful.

[illegible]s custom of ordering [illegible]from its files as soon as [illegible]ogram is announced, the [illegible]d Stravinsky's Capriccio [illegible] Orchestra, dated 1929, [illegible]ave been played. It is [illegible]ent for two pianos, four [illegible]by the composer. The [illegible]hony is not yet available [illegible]tribution.

[illegible]n Book" of the Boston [illegible]chestra concerts when [illegible]phony was played in Boston (Oct. 31-Nov. 1) is on file. Also two newspaper criticisms, one written by Olin Downes, on the occasion of its performance in New York, and the other by Sabaneev, when it was played in Paris. Sabaneev is the author of "Modern Russian Composers," which contains an interesting account of Stravinsky's life and music.

Some other good reading on Stravinsky is found in "Contemporary Russian Composers," by Montagu-Nathan; "Musical Portraits," by Rosenfeld, and "Music After the Great War," by Van Vechten.

Tschaikowski himself gives the programmatic basis of his Fourth Symphony in his correspondence, which has been published under the title "Life and Letters of Peter Ilich Tschaikowski," edited from the Russian by Rosa Newmarch. A good analysis of it, with musical notation of the principal themes is found in "Master of the Symphony," by Goetschius, one of the books adopted by the National Federation of Music Clubs for its study course in music understanding.

The Russian folk melody, "The Birch Tree," the theme of the final movement, is included in two folk song collections, "Folk Songs of Many Peoples," by Botsford, and "100 Chants Nationaux Russes," by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Among other material which will aid in the study and enjoyment of this symphony are such books as "Story of Symphony," by Lee; "Symphonies and their Meaning," by Goepp; "Modern Symphonic Forms," by Skilton; "The Lure of Music," by Downes, and such short biological sketches as are in "Master Musicians," by Brower, and "Famous Composers," by Dole.

12 PROV. JOURNAL DEC. 11

MUSICAL

Revised Symphony Program for Tuesday Night Concert

Handel and Mozart Brought Up to Fill Line When Stravinsky and Nabokov Have to Be Dropped. Koussevitzky Retains Tschaikowski

Instead of the program originally announced, Handel and Mozart will replace the moderns, Stravinsky and Nabokov, at the Boston Symphony concert Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre. These revisions have been made because of a temporary illness suffered by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the lack of time to rehearse the new works, as is stated by Warren Storey Smith in his program notes elsewhere on this page. Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, with which the band is of course familiar, remains the sole survivor of what was once to have been an all-Russian concert. Now it is, broadly speaking, an all-classic one. The Handel work is the Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B-minor, No. 12, and for Mozart Dr. Koussevitzky will present his Symphony in G-minor (K. No. 550). The Tschaikowsky symphony will close the program.

In his free lecture at the Providence Public Library this afternoon at 2:30 o'clock, Dr. W. Louis Chapman will describe the music to be played and illustrate the principal themes upon the piano. Books on music and composers and the scores in the library's possession will be reserved for those who wish to consult them. The lecture is under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

78

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

DEC 7 - 1930

New Works For Orchestra Given By Boston Symphony

Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony Found to Be Impressive and Interesting at First Boston Performance — "Metamorphoseon" of Respighi Receives Scant Praise—Conservatory Group Gives Concert

The works composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony continue to put in regular appearances, says A. H. Meyer in Musical America. Recent concerts brought Respighi's "Metamorphoseon," and Prokofieff's Fourth Sqmphony, in C Major.

"Metamorphoseon" is a theme with 12 variations, written in virtuoso style. The theme is modal, suggesting plain-song. The variations, save the seventh, group themselves in such a manner as to suggest the sequence of movements in a symphony. The seventh variation includes cadenzas for almost all the instruments, from bassoon and bass clarinet to solo violin and harp. One found decoration upon a theme where one might reasonably have expected germination of new through from the original motif. One missed the brilliance which alone would have justified the difficulties which Respighi placed in his score. Despite an exciting and sonorous conclusion and isolated moments of beauty, the score won little or no favorable comment from the press.

New Prokofieff Symphony

Prokofieff's new symphony is another matter. It divided both the press and the audiences. While Friday's audience remained apathetic, Saturday's recalled Dr Koussevitzky again and again, until finally he bade his men rise in acknowledgment.

The symphony is in the conventional four movements, with slow introduction preceding the first. Prokofieff in some passages has used the same musical material which is introduced in his ballet, "The Prodigal Son," given in Paris, May, 1929.

The principal theme of the first movement is aggressive and virile. To this mood the symphony returns with even greater force and concentration in the last movement, whose chief theme may well be descrivbed as rugged and exceedingly wild. The contrasting theme in the first movement is suave and ingratiating, suggesting the so-called "Mozartean" style of the composer's earlier "Classical Symphony." On the whole, the themes seem to the writer to be of no little musical significance. And the treatment is entirely worthy of them.

Music of Austere Power

The style is in the main far less dissonant than that of, say, the "Scythian" suite. On the other hand, this symphony contains far less sunshine and cheer than the "Classical Symphony." It is dark, austere, hard, forbidding—music of lean, powerful sinews. Greyness, gloom are not far in the distance. It is thus a music that easily baffles one.

Needless to say, Dr Koussevitzky and his men were lavish in the expenditure of time and effort upon these two new scores, and splendid performances were the result. At the second of the concerts there was another event of importance. Victor Polatschek, new clarinetist of the orchestra, was introduced as soloist in the Mozart Clarinet concerto. One admired not less the fine, sensitive, well-colored tone than the sublety and variety of interpretation.

This concert began with a light and delicate performance of Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," and ended with an extremely brilliant and highly rhythmed version of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Saprice." The concert of a week earlier included also Handel's Concerto Grosso in B Minor and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

The orchestra of the ew England Conservatory of Music, Wallace Goodrich, conductor, gave its first concert of the year on November 15. Joseph Malkin, newly appointed teacher of 'cello, was the soloist in Lalo's concerto in D Minor. The orchestral numbers weer the overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," the Nocturne from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Chausson's symphony in B flat major.

With many new members entering the orchestra this fall, Mr Goodrich has gone far indeed toward the desired ideal of perfection in ensemble. Precision and solid sonorities were noteworthy in the playing. The flexibility, the well-planned interpretative details which Mr Goodrich was able to secure from the young musicians showed them going much farther than merely meeting the challenge of the difficulties contained in the Chausson work.

Handel and Mozart Works Replace Russian Moderns

Lack of Time for Rehearsal Prevents Stravinsky and Nabokov From Being Played by Boston Symphony. Tschaikowski Remains as Scheduled

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Had Dr. Koussevitzky not fallen ill at the end of the Beethoven Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave in Washington a fortnight ago, Providence would have heard from him and his band at the Albee Theatre Tuesday evening an all-Russian program with compositions by Stravinsky, Nabokov and Tschaikowski. Now, owing to lack of time for rehearsal, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, as yet unheard in Boston, has disappeared from the list, and with it the symphony of Nabokov. In their place stand two classics. Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, in B-minor, and the G-minor Symphony of Mozart.

As Providence would have discovered had things remained unaltered, neither the present-day Stravinsky of the Capriccio nor the youthful Nabokov is especially formidable. But for every hearer who craves the new in music there are at least a dozen who prefer the tried and true (which incidentally was itself once new and debatable), so that the change of program will undoubtedly please more than it disappoints.

Although he did not wear his heart upon his sleeve and although he avowed no program for his music, in which content is always subservient to form, the Mozart of the G-minor Symphony, one of the three which he wrote in the summer of 1789, is himself something of a romanticist, anticipating by some three decades the Schubert of the "Unfinished" Symphony, also classic in structure but distinctly personal in expression. The little G-minor, the symphony without trumpets or drums, is tinged with a melancholy that must have represented something more than the pattern-making in tones, the fashioning of beautiful sounds and of melodies spirited, gay or placid, that was the be-all and end-all of the classical symphony.

The chromaticism of the G-minor Sympany, too, hints of music's new day that was to dawn with the turning of the century. For their own time Mozart's modulations were daring; in a symphony in G-minor such keys as F-sharp minor and C-sharp minor were employed, and even emphasized. And the slow movement strikes a profounder note than any that Mozart had sounded before. There is, indeed, an intensity of expression that suggests, not Beethoven, but Beethoven's successors. It is the G-minor Symphony more than any other of his works that makes us feel the tragedy of Mozart's early death. Beside it the first two symphonies of Beethoven, for all their greater vigor and brilliance, are superficial and immature.

But if we cannot find the simon-pure classicist in Mozart of this symphony, we can find him in Handel of the 12 Concerti Grossi for strings which he wrote in the space of one month in the autumn of 1739. This Twelfth Concerto, in B-minor, has long been overlooked by Dr. Koussevitzky's predecessors, and most unjustly, since its general level of interest is sufficiently high and its slow movement is one of Handel's finest. The broad chief melody of this movement, in which Italian sweetness and German strength are happily blended, is as typically Handelian as that of the celebrated Largo from "Xerxes."

The remaining piece, Tschaikowski's Fourth Symphony, is, of course, romanticism of the deepest dye. Tschaikowski had no inhibitions. That which he felt, re expressed. And his feelings were considerably more violent than those of most people. They were violent even for a Russian. The Fourth Symphony, composed in 1878 and dedicated to Tschaikowski's benefactress, Mrs. Von Meck, whose face he never beheld, was written to an avowed program. This program, set forth at great length in a letter to the wealthy widow, will be quoted in full in Mr. Hale's program notes. Reduced to the fewest possible words, it represents man's endeavor to escape from his fate, his crushing destiny. That anyone's destiny might be a pleasant or a favorable one would never have occurred to the morbid, self-tortured and introspective composer of the "Pathetic" Symphony. The fate motive in the Fourth Symphony, announced at the outset, recurs ever and anon as a reminder that the sword of Damocles still hangs over a man's head. Incidentally Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Fourth Symphony has recently and to an uncommon degree stirred audiences and astonished reviewers both in Boston and in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

DEC 8 1930

N

The Bo... glory ... dous... Gardi...

Nothin... greatnes... and more ... than the final program of the festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon. The master's first symphony was played, a simple, melodious, delicately emotioned work, savoring of Mozart, but with musical meat; and then his last. They made a perfect program in their contrast, their building to a climax, their amazing revelation of the composer's development over the years of his musical life that saw the production of nine symphonies.

The first was played just about as it was written. The audience listened to it in breathless anticipation of what was to follow. After the intermission, the packed auditorium settled down to an impressive silence. There was an air of eager expectancy, of mental and emotional readiness. A stupendous work, rarely heard here and not for a long time, was about to be played.

And today, all those people, nearly 4000, probably would trade the rest of the festival for the privilege of seeing and hearing Koussevitzky conduct that symphony.

He gave the rich music a thoughtful and intense reading. He built to climax after climax thruout the first three movements. And then he built the grandest of all in the last, when 300 people made music, 200 of them singing. Not that the man was so great nor that the chorus was so unusual, nor the orchestra any different than before. But the combination, guided by one small man who drew music from them all and sent it billowing in great waves and soaring to every high corner of the auditorium; and what music! The orchestra without the singing was enough, but the well-done task of working them together deserves extra glory.

The music of the symphony is superb, and it is taxing. But the chorus, all from Washington (more power to them) sang its parts exceedingly well; the soloists found their way capably thru the maze of singing, and the orchestra was the magnificent pedestal upon which this was built. The men played the music with accuracy, power and interest while their leader devoted himself to the singers.

The finale was the grandest noise and the most exciting thing ever heard in that hall. When it was over people wept and thundered applause for fully five minutes. The symphony took an hour and a quarter, but there were many who would have stayed to hear it over again. It is too long since this has been played here; it should be done again, ly upset the dope by sma... shown here plunging ove... passed to Carideo, who c...

Hilltop Fr... in Th...

THE Georgetown freshme... ble and despised (by ... classmen) make their last ... power today when a footba... representing the yearlings t... sophomore eleven in Griffith ... in the annual battle of t...

TRANS DEC 19

For the first time in six years Dr. Koussevitzky is disabled—by overwork in Washington with a faulty chorus no more than half prepared for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Consequently, at the Symphony Concerts this week, there will be no production of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" or of his "Caprice for Orchestra with Piano-Solo."Instead, Mr. Burgin will be deputy-conductor through a program including Sibelius's First Symphony; Mozart's Piano-Concerto in A major—pianist Bruce Simonds; Krenek's "Little Symphony," new piece by the young Austrian modernist, heard last month in New York.

In Cambridge on Thursday evening the same pieces will be played with Mr. Burgin again conducting. . . . The program originally announced for this week—Mozart's Symphony in G minor and the two novelties from Stravinsky—is transferred to Friday and Saturday, Dec. 18 and 19, with Dr. Koussevitzky at his post.

OUTSIDE READING ON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The music collection of the Providence Public Library has all the music to be played by the Boston Symphony Tuesday night including the Handel and Mozart works that have been substituted for the Stravinsky and Nabokov numbers. There is a miniature orchestral score of the Tschaikowski symphony and arrangements for piano, one of the latter included in the Analytic Symphony series, edited by Percy Goetschius, which music students find helpful.

Following its custom of ordering music lacking from its files as soon as a symphony program is announced, the library procured Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, dated 1929, which was to have been played. It is in an arrangement for two pianos, four hands, made by the composer. The Nabokov symphony is not yet available for general distribution.

The "Program Book" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts when Nabakov's symphony was played in Boston (Oct. 31-Nov. 1) is on file. Also two newspaper criticisms, one written by Olin Downes, on the occasion of its performance in New York, and the other by Sabaneev, when it was played in Paris. Sabaneev is the author of "Modern Russian Composers," which contains an interesting account of Stravinsky's life and music.

Some other good reading on Stravinsky is found in "Contemporary Russian Composers," by Montagu-Nathan; "Musical Portraits," by Rosenfeld, and "Music After the Great War," by Van Vechten.

Tschaikowski himself gives the programmatic basis of his Fourth Symphony in his correspondence, which has been published under the title "Life and Letters of Peter Ilich Tschaikowski," edited from the Russian by Rosa Newmarch. A good analysis of it, with musical notation of the principal themes is found in "Master of the Symphony," by Goetschius, one of the books adopted by the National Federation of Music Clubs for its study course in music understanding.

The Russian folk melody, "The Birch Tree," the theme of the final movement, is included in two folk song collections, "Folk Songs of Many Peoples," by Botsford, and "100 Chants Nationaux Russes," by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Among other material which will aid in the study and enjoyment of this symphony are such books as "Story of Symphony," by Lee; "Symphonies and their Meaning," by Goepp; "Modern Symphonic Forms," by Skilton; "The Lure of Music," by Downes, and such short biological sketches as are in "Master Musicians," by Brower, and "Famous Composers," by Dole.

12 [illegible]

MUSICA...

Revised Symphony Program for Tuesday Night Concert

Handel and Mozart Brought Up to Fill Line When Stravinsky and Nabokov Have to Be Dropped. Koussevitzky Retains Tschaikowski

Instead of the program originally announced, Handel and Mozart will replace the moderns, Stravinsky and Nabokov, at the Boston Symphony concert Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre. These revisions have been made because of a temporary illness suffered by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the lack of time to rehearse the new works, as is stated by Warren Storey Smith in his program notes elsewhere on this page. Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, with which the band is of course familiar, remains the sole survivor of what was once to have been an all-Russian concert. Now it is, broadly speaking, an all-classic one. The Handel work is the Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B-minor, No. 12, and for Mozart Dr. Koussevitzky will present his Symphony in G-minor (K. No. 550). The Tschaikowsky symphony will close the program.

In his free lecture at the Providence Public Library this afternoon at 2:30 o'clock, Dr. W. Louis Chapman will describe the music to be played and illustrate the principal themes upon the piano. Books on music and composers and the scores in the library's possession will be reserved for those who wish to consult them. The lecture is under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 12 1930

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

The Ancient Supplants th... phony Changes Its Progra... Now Announcing Handel, ... New as the Boston Sym... n for Next Tuesday Here, Mozart and Tschaikowsky

Several changes have been necessary in the program for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre. It is hoped that Dr. Koussevitzsky will have recovered from his slight indisposition by that time and be able to conduct.

The Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12, of Handel, has been substituted for the Nabokov Symphony, and the Mozart Symphony in G minor will take the place of the Stravinsky Capriccio with piano solo. Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony will conclude the program.

The Concerti Grossi come to us from the golden age of music about 1740, a the time when Bach and Handel and Veracini were the principal figures in the world of music and the best work of Stradivarius was done. It illustrates the entrance of the dialogue and antiphony into orchestral work, and this idea, together with the contrapuntal development of beautiful thematic material, is observed throughout these concert pieces.

The Symphony in G minor (K. V. 550) of Mozart is probably his best known and most popular symphony. Although in G minor the key adds no element of the solemn or serious to the work. Its themes have a lift and lilt to them which the natural accents of music make clear. The subjects and episodes are so definite, so uninvolved that they are presented to the hearer with an individuality and distinctness which makes them readily appreciated. The contrapuntal "working out" is so clever as almost to seem new material, making the thematic model all the more enjoyable.

The Andante has considerable of the religious and devotional in its makeup, yet it participates somewhat in the model of variations upon a theme. The Minuette and Trio are of sprightly nature, these terms being more for the naming of portions of a symphony than for descriptions of dance form. The Finale is dashing and brilliant, an entire change from the three preceding movements. It contains much pleasing rapid "passage work" and charming violin figures with occasional episodes for the wood wind.

There is a brisk stateliness about this symphony, a curious combination of the serious with the lighter, that illustrates an interesting phase of Mozart's life. All three of the 1788 symphonies show this change, which is but the approach of riper musical maturity.

This work is an interesting contrast with the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony which follows on the program. Where the Mozart symphony requires some 40 or 50 players, the Tschaikowsky comes to us with more than double that number. The Mozart is of fine classic texture, while the Fourth Symphony is painted with gorgeous colors thickly laid. One recalls Dresden china, the other the Russian and the Tartar barbarian symbolized by powerful brass band, sounding trumpets and sonorous strings.

Plaintive and appealing folk songs occasionally find their way into the tremendous massiveness of this symphony, offering some of the most striking contrasts of barbaric splendor with exquisite melody to be found in all music. In this symphony of Tschaikowsky the commanding trumpet call of the brass choir appears at the very outset and appears frequently in the first and last movements. In the "program" of this symphony, which comes to us from the composer himself, we find that rare episode of unity of the plan and realization of a musical composition. As the symphony unfolds, it is apparent that the composer's mental and spiritual lives were those of great activity and intensity. His emotions were those of no plaintive poet but of a truly great soul whose life and thoughts were not of the earth.

The intensity of expression of these symphonies is not surpassed in musical literature.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro
Mozart.....Symphony in G minor (Koechel No. 550)
I. Allegro molto
II. Andante
III. Menuetto: Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro assai
Tschaikowsky...Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto: moderato con anima (In movimento di valse)
II. Andantino in modo di canzona
III. Scherzo: pizzicato estinato
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco

The serious and almost melancholy song of the oboe in the Andantino is of considerable thematic length and is frequently repeated, but so delightfully embelished by florid passages of great musical beauty that one wishes that might be even longer.

The Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato, the longest movement for pluck strings in the literature of mu... Usually taken at a tremendous speed serves as an illustration of the possibilities of what is usually but an occasional resource of composers and of virtuosi of the string section of the orchestra.

The Finale is glorious in its mili... splendor. The Russian folk-tune "In fields there stood a birch tree," en... almost abruptly in a striking contrast its simplicity with the tremendous sweeping waves of emotion offered fullest orchestral panoply and mag... cence.

This symphony was very near dear to Tschaikowsky himself. We ... that Dr. Koussevitsky's kindred ... will reveal this tremendous sympl... in its true brilliancy and gorgeous... oring.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPM...

Rover Studi... Waiting for...

And Comes to Con... Like Life, Afte... Admit All to...

TRAV. DEC. 14

By THE HERA...

The Rover finds himself in mighty unusual places in his search for light and truth, but dom has felt more completely place than last Friday at noon.

Those who recognize the Ro... sight would have been amazed ... cover that at 12:10 o'clock on that day he was the 42nd individual from the door in the long line of persons who were waiting for rush seats at Symphony hall.

It should be explained here that the Rover doesn't know a fugue from an arpeggio, can't distinguish between counterpoint and allegro non troppo and is as fully informed on the iconoclastic schism as on the subject of sonatinas. However, there he was.

His arrival in a taxicab was a wrong start, to begin with. No one else arrived in a taxicab, and there was an audibl esnicker from 41 persons who were already in line when the Rover dismounted and paid his fare.

"Spending a dollar to save 50 cents," was the remark of one stoutish lady who chuckled until she was on the point of bursting her seams.

An official looking man in a Chesterfield overcoat and a derby hat hustled the Rover into a place at the end of the line and asked him to crowd up close. Inquiry from the 41st person (a slender lady who was reading a copy of Rousseau's "Confessions" in French) disclosed that the doors would not be opened before 2:30 P. M.

COLD BITES ROVER

The Rover's next discovery was that it was cold. The savage December wind rushed dismally down Massachusetts avenue, whipped spitefully around the corner of Huntington avenue and swept through the chilly gray stone pillars and across the hard granite steps of the colonnade with an unmerciful bitterness. There was no sunshine, many of the people in line were stamping their feet and blowing on their hands for warmth.

No one, thought the Rover, no one but the most ardent of music lovers would consent to stand in such a chilling and dismal position for two hours.

With this thought in mind, he next turned his idle attention to a study of the shivering, but ardent, music lovers.

Conservatory students were in the majority. There is some subtle something that identifies the music student at once—a certain earnest and exalted look about the eyes, perhaps, possibly a threadbareness of the coat and a worn look to the bits of fur coat trimming, or else it may be the length of the hair of the young men. On the other hand, that indefinable something may be as definite an object as a briefcase full of music or an orchestral score or text book on concertos.

Anyway, the Rover identified most of them as music students and found, moreover, that they were all habitues of the line under the columns. Each new youngster, whether he or she arrived alone or with a group, was hailed by others in line.

"Yoo hoo, Mary, we'll save you a seat and a cup of tea. Meet us in the lunch-room."

"Yah, Henry, had to stay after school."

"Say, Sally, where were you last week? We had a seat all saved for you."

"How'd the date go, Charlie?"

Many of them had brought pillows and blankets along, nearly everyone in line had a book, newspaper or magazine and one or two were wrapped in blankets, as though they were attending a football game.

There were other music lovers there beside the students, tempted to brave December's freezing blast by the same love for beautiful sounds, the Rover supposed.

Numbers 43 and 43A in the line were a plumpish woman wrapped to the chin in a coon skin coat and her small daughter. Mother was holding a Boston bag in one hand, and the corners of a few packages protruding therefrom indicated that she had been doing some Christmas shopping, and that number 43A would awake on Christmas morn to discover that Santa Claus had left her a small blonde doll with blue eyes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

The Psalms and Pieties of Igor Stravinsky

Hans. Dec 13

Memories and Reflections for Prelude to His New Symphony

THE new piety of Igor Stravinsky, whose name has for so many years been associated with paganism and barbarity, is not surprising. Stravinsky is above all a man of intellect, a dialectician for whom the realities of abstract thought are more apparent than the realities of man-made art. A shrewd observer of artists and men has remarked once that there is not a page of sensuous music in the whole of Stravinsky's output; the "Fire-Bird" is but a fairy tale, and its sensuousness is fictional. Watching Stravinsky's transformations, we suddenly become aware that we know nothing about the man behind the art. Chaikovsky, Wagner, Strauss leave us with the impression of an intimate acquaintance after we have listened to their music; not so Stravinsky—he is shielded from us by a mask—be it the mask of Russian ballet-music, that of scholastic renaissance or scholastic religion.

A discussion as to where the true Stravinsky is would be futile; he is as truly present in "Le Sacre" as in the three unaccompanied pieces for the clarinet. In the first instance he is solving the problem of rhythmic power; in the second he is delineating his conception of pure melody. Now that Stravinsky "got a religion in his head," he merely follows the logical line of thought leading him to the very source of music—the chants of the Church. It is significant that being by birth and upbringing a member of the Greek Orthodox Church, he leans towards the Latin psalmody of the Roman. The reason is not far to seek—the Greek Church is much more national in character than the Papal Church, and Stravinsky has utilized the Russian church modes in "Les Noces" (the second tableau) and elsewhere to the full. In quest of abstraction, Stravinsky naturally turned to the most impersonal, the most emasculated art of Gregorian monody. Incidentally, the baffling dedication to the Glory of God, penned on the title-page of the Symphony of Psalms, may be the traditional Jesuit formula, "Ad majorem Dei Gloriam." Stravinsky is thorough. In his new medievalism he adheres to the theories as well as to the practices of his spiritual fathers.

In the light of the previous experience, it is difficult to predict what Stravinsky's next step will be. He does not renounce his past as Tolstoy did in his religious years. On the contrary Stravinsky is unaccountably eclectic in his methods. There is no "line of development" from "Apollo" to the "Baiser de la Fée," the first a serene work for string ensemble, deliberately drab and undistinguished, the second a potpourri of Chaikovsky's tunes arranged for a ballet. Yet, the two follow each other in close succession. But then has not Stravinsky declared that music must be composed in the spirit of a notary's contract? Certainly there is nothing unnatural about a notary drawing two contracts in one day—one for the exploitation of the pre-historic meteorite of Arizona, the other, say, for the disposal of a stock of second-hand goods. Yet, when a creative artist works on widely divergent problems, we feel duty-bound to find a common denominator to his unrelated results. Aesthetic theories are exceedingly resilient—and the imagination may be stretched so as to embrace the unembraceable. Is it not a simpler way to suppose that a musician may be as versatile in his pursuits as a business man?

When Stravinsky's old teacher, Basil Kalafati, still at his desk at the St. Petersburg Conservatory, was shown the score of "Pulcinella," he shrugged his shoulders and said: "The same old story. Stravinsky could never learn to harmonize. His chorals were always unsatisfactory." There is some ultimate truth in this provoking judgment. Like Beethoven's, Stravinsky's harmonization is "unsatisfactory." Disquisitions on the beauty of ugliness are begging the question. We must admit that some pages of Stravinsky are unspeakably hideous. Like his glorified notary, Stravinsky occasionally finds himself compelled to draw a contract dealing with unsavory stuff. Stravinsky is systematic, and he would not abandon a possible line of investigation unless he is fully convinced that it has been thoroughly exploited. When he discards barbarity, power and rhythm, his admirers are displeased, but Stravinsky is a great man, whatever his vagaries are, and he is not writing for admirers.

Stravinsky's independence from the established code of morals is striking. It is remarkable with what nonchalance he may lift a vapid tune and use it for a high purpose. The story of the famous bassoon solo of the "Sacre" is well-known. Stravinsky picked it up from a popular waltz by one Bochet, having heard it at a restaurant in Lausanne where he was a daily customer. What hath God wrought! You would not know that humble tune in its new surroundings! On several occasions Stravinsky has helped himself to such stray tunes; still oftener he has made use of identical material for different purposes.

Only in his "impersonal" period, inaugurated by the Piano-Concerto of 1924, has he abandoned certain devices which have faithfully served his needs all the way from the "Fire Bird" to "Les Noces."

Stravinsky at rehearsals, relentless in his demands for rhythm and rhythm

Continued on Page Six

Stravinsky

Continued from Page Four

alone, trying to reduce everything to an inhumanly accurate succesion of beats, and struggling all the way through with his own unwelcome humanity, the sounds escaping his throat, the muscular tension, the perspiration, the unevenness of the rhythmical strokes, this Stravinsky is a symbol. He believes in the power of the written sign, and on one occasion he refused to correct an obvious misprint in the score of "Les Noces," insisting that all that is printed is correct. However, he often agrees to rearrange the metrical distribution, thus he re-distributes the meters of the "Dance Sacrale" of the "Rites of Spring" in a special addendum for the use of conductors. However, in this practical phase he is eminently unsuccessful. They say, Beethoven could not dance in time. Certainly, Stravinsky's external rhythm is far behind the rhythm of his brain.

Stravinsky is not so difficult to approach as he is reputed to be, provided there is some definite business on hand. But he would not bear platonic friendships even with the most ardent of his admirers. It is highly doubtful if Stravinsky is at all open to flattery however subtle. He is rather cynical in refusing to humor a man's vanity. One of the Stravinsky stories—told by Stravinsky himself—concerns a highly influential man who would address Stravinsky in his letters as "Cher ami," and would get a reply invariably addressed, "Cher Monsieur," until, after several rebukes, he compromised on "Cher Monsieur et Ami," ultimately dropping "Ami" altogether. Stravinsky's humor is dry, and he gets along best with simple folks. With them he is a convivial friend, remarkably alert and lucid even after several rounds of strong spirits have been served and consumed. One can not imagine such a mind a prey to any material or spiritual forces, independent of his free will. NICOLAS SLONIMSKY blonde young man. They were all very serious and very quiet and the Rover had to step down two steps to discover what was in the portfolio.

It contained a group of pencil sketches, very good ones, too, of the human form divine (male)—delineated, the Rover discovered from the conversation, by No. 72 in connection with her classes at the Museum and offered to No. 74 and the others for critical comment.

Place No. 77, next this little art group, was occupied (it would be) by one of those strait-laced elderly women who always appear put out about something. The Rover could just imagine her narrative of the disgusting conduct of the young artists when she arrived home after the concert. It would have ended with a complete denunciation of the younger generation, with a dissertation beginning, "When I was a girl."

Supercilious 77 read "The Atlantic Monthly," of course.

No. 102 opened her lunch when the Rover's contemplative eye arrived at her position. She was sitting on a copy of The Boston Herald opened at a page which bore one of the Rover's ephemeral masterpieces. Her luncheon comprised two chopped egg sandwiches, a pickle and a chocolate cup cake. There was a moral in No. 102, sitting on the Rover's masterpiece and eating sandwiches, but the Rover couldn't quite hit on it.

With such idle speculation and vapid conjecturings the Rover passed away two freezing, windswept hours, until the hands of the clock on the drug store across the street reached 2:30 in their creeping around, and every one produced a half-dollar from pocket or purse and moved toward the open door to the concert hall.

And the Rover, who has been reading "Moby Dick" again, moved forward with them, still contemplative, comparing waiting on the steps of Symphony hall with the course of life.

A few hours in the cold and the wind, a little fun, a little work, a little study, and the gates open, admitting us all to the warmth of vast, sunlit halls, wherein the music of the spheres shall sound forever.

And even Melville couldn't better that conclusion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 12 1930

IN TERMS O
Comment i

The Ancient Supplants th
phony Changes Its Progra
Now Announcing Handel,

Several changes have been necessary in the program for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre. It is hoped that Dr. Koussevitzsky will have recovered from his slight indisposition by that time and be able to conduct.

The Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12, of Handel, has been substituted for the Nabokov Symphony, and the Mozart Symphony in G minor will take the place of the Stravinsky Capriccio with piano solo. Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony will conclude the program.

The Concerti Grossi come to us from the golden age of music about 1740, a the time when Bach and Handel and Veracini were the principal figures in the world of music and the best work of Stradivarius was done. It illustrates the entrance of the dialogue and antiphony into orchestral work, and this idea, together with the contrapuntal development of beautiful thematic material, is observed throughout these concert pieces.

The Symphony in G minor (K. V. 550) of Mozart is probably his best known and most popular symphony. Although in G minor the key adds no element of the solemn or serious to the work. Its

OF MUSIC, n Season

New as the Boston Symn for Next Tuesday Here, Mozart and Tschaikowsky

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro
Mozart.....Symphony in G minor (Koechel No. 550)
I. Allegro molto
II. Andante
III. Menuetto: Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro assai
Tschaikowsky...Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto: moderato con anima (In movimento di valse)
II. Andantino in modo di canzona
III. Scherzo: pizzicato ostinato
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco themes have a lift and lilt to them which the natural accents of music make clear. The subjects and episodes are so definite, so uninvolved that they are presented to the hearer with an individuality and distinctness which makes them readily appreciated. The contrapuntal "working out" is so clever as almost to seem new material, making the thematic model all the more enjoyable.

The Andante has considerable of the religious and devotional in its makeup, yet it participates somewhat in the model of variations upon a theme. The Minuette and Trio are of sprightly nature, these terms being more for the naming of portions of a symphony than for descriptions of dance form. The Finale is dashing and brilliant, an entire change from the three preceding movements. It contains much pleasing rapid "passage work" and charming violin figures with occasional episodes for the wood wind.

There is a brisk stateliness about this symphony, a curious combination of the serious with the lighter, that illustrates an interesting phase of Mozart's life. All three of the 1788 symphonies show this change, which is but the approach of riper musical maturity.

This work is an interesting contrast with the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony which follows on the program. Where the Mozart symphony requires some 40 or 50 players, the Tschaikowsky comes to us with more than double that number. The Mozart is of fine classic texture, while the Fourth Symphony is painted with gorgeous colors thickly laid. One recalls Dresden china, the other the Russian and the Tartar barbarian symbolized by powerful brass band, sounding trumpets and sonorous strings.

Plaintive and appealing folk songs occasionally find their way into the tremendous massiveness of this symphony, offering some of the most striking contrasts of barbaric splendor with exquisite melody to be found in all music. In this symphony of Tschaikowsky the commanding trumpet call of the brass choir appears at the very outset and appears frequently in the first and last movements. In the "program" of this symphony, which comes to us from the composer himself, we find that rare episode of unity of the plan and realization of a musical composition. As the symphony unfolds, it is apparent that the composer's mental and spiritual lives were those of great activity and intensity. His emotions were those of no plaintive poet but of a truly great soul whose life and thoughts were not of the earth.

The intensity of expression of these symphonies is not surpassed in musical literature.

The serious and almost melancholy song of the oboe in the Andantino is of considerable thematic length and is frequently repeated, but so delightfully embelished by florid passages of great musical beauty that one wishes they might be even longer.

The Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato, is the longest movement for plucked strings in the literature of music. Usually taken at a tremendous speed it serves as an illustration of the possibilities of what is usually but an occasional resource of composers and of virtuosity of the string section of the orchestra.

The Finale is glorious in its military splendor. The Russian folk-tune "In the fields there stood a birch tree," enters almost abruptly in a striking contrast in its simplicity with the tremendous and sweeping waves of emotion offered in fullest orchestral panoply and magnificence.

This symphony was very near and dear to Tschaikowsky himself. We know that Dr. Koussevitsky's kindred spirit will reveal this tremendous symphony in its true brilliancy and gorgeous coloring.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

DEC 12 1930

Broadcasters don't make the front page often. They don't attack enough. Nothing like a good attack to attract attention.

Wonder why the networks don't give more consideration to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is still the best known symphonic band in the land. There ought to be room for it regularly on the radio.

Whenever the microphone chefs are hard pressed for musical programs they go to their pantry for what they call "songs of gay Paree."

Ossip Gabrilowitsch is glad to [illegible] piano is coming [illegible] ious attention

Rover Studies Music Lovers Waiting for Symphony Seats

And Comes to Conclusion That Rush Line Is Like Life, After Which Gates Open to Admit All to Warmth and Shelter

TRAV. DEC. 12

By THE HERALD'S ROVING REPORTER

The Rover finds himself in some mighty unusual places in his daily search for light and truth, but he seldom has felt more completely out of place than last Friday at noon.

Those who recognize the Rover on sight would have been amazed to discover that at 12:10 o'clock on that day he was the 42nd individual from the door in the long line of persons who were waiting for rush seats at Symphony hall.

It should be explained here that the Rover doesn't know a fugue from an arpeggio, can't distinguish between counterpoint and allegro non troppo and is as fully informed on the iconoclastic schism as on the subject of sonatinas. However, there he was.

His arrival in a taxicab was a wrong start, to begin with. No one else arrived in a taxicab, and there was an audibl esnicker from 41 persons who were already in line when the Rover dismounted and paid his fare.

"Spending a dollar to save 50 cents," was the remark of one stoutish lady who chuckled until she was on the point of bursting her seams.

An official looking man in a Chesterfield overcoat and a derby hat hustled the Rover into a place at the end of the line and asked him to crowd up close. Inquiry from the 41st person (a slender lady who was reading a copy of Rousseau's "Confessions" in French) disclosed that the doors would not be opened before 2:30 P. M.

COLD BITES ROVER

The Rover's next discovery was that it was cold. The savage December wind rushed dismally down Massachusetts avenue, whipped spitefully around the corner of Huntington avenue and swept through the chilly gray stone pillars and across the hard granite steps of the colonnade with an unmerciful bitterness. There was no sunshine, many of the people in line were stamping their feet and blowing on their hands for warmth.

No one, thought the Rover, no one but the most ardent of music lovers would consent to stand in such a chilling and dismal position for two hours.

With this thought in mind, he next turned his idle attention to a study of the shivering, but ardent, music lovers.

Conservatory students were in the majority. There is some subtle something that identifies the music student at once—a certain earnest and exalted look about the eyes, perhaps, possibly a threadbareness of the coat and a worn look to the bits of fur coat trimming, or else it may be the length of the hair of the young men. On the other hand, that indefinable something may be as definite an object as a briefcase full of music or an orchestral score or text book on concertos.

Anyway, the Rover identified most of them as music students and found, moreover, that they were all habitues of the line under the columns. Each new youngster, whether he or she arrived alone or with a group, was hailed by others in line.

"Yoo hoo, Mary, we'll save you a seat and a cup of tea. Meet us in the lunch-room."

"Yah, Henry, had to stay after school."

"Say, Sally, where were you last week? We had a seat all saved for you."

"How'd the date go, Charlie?"

Many of them had brought pillows and blankets along, nearly everyone in line had a book, newspaper or magazine and one or two were wrapped in blankets, as though they were attending a football game.

There were other music lovers there beside the students, tempted to brave December's freezing blast by the same love for beautiful sounds, the Rover supposed.

Numbers 43 and 43A in the line were a plumpish woman wrapped to the chin in a coon skin coat and her small daughter. Mother was holding a Boston bag in one hand, and the corners of a few packages protruding therefrom indicated that she had been doing some Christmas shopping, and that number 43A would awake on Christmas morn to discover that Santa Claus had left her a small blonde doll with blue eyes.

In her other hand number 43 held a magazine, opened to an article on Russia's Future."

Number 43A, meanwhile, was engaged in the pleasant pastime of writing the name "Marjory" on one of the stone pillars with a bit of blue crayon. She had already written it 15 times and hadn't quite surrounded the column when the Rover noticed her.

Number 63 was an interesting subject for idle conjecture. The Rover guessed that he was a musician who had been out of work for some time. His rusty, black felt hat, his worn satin-faced, furlined overcoat, his light gray spats, his torn chamois gloves, all had seen better days somewhere, probably on the avenues of Europe.

His face was the face of an artist, too, sensitive, but strong, intellectual, but thwarted. He was reading intently. By stepping out of line the Rover could just read the title of the brown-covered book—Dostoievsky's "Crime and Punishment."

Nos. 72 to 76, inclusive, formed a group, two youths and two maidens, who were sitting on one of the steps together with their heads bent over a portfolio held by No. 74, a languid blonde young man. They were all very serious and very quiet and the Rover had to step down two steps to discover what was in the portfolio.

It contained a group of pencil sketches, very good ones, too, of the human form divine (male)—delineated, the Rover discovered from the conversation, by No. 72 in connection with her classes at the Museum and offered to No. 74 and the others for critical comment.

Place No. 77, next this little art group, was occupied (it would be) by one of those strait-laced elderly women who always appear put out about something. The Rover could just imagine her narrative of the disgusting conduct of the young artists when she arrived home after the concert. It would have ended with a complete denunciation of the younger generation, with a dissertation beginning, "When I was a girl."

Supercilious 77 read "The Atlantic Monthly," of course.

No. 102 opened her lunch when the Rover's contemplative eye arrived at her position. She was sitting on a copy of The Boston Herald opened at a page which bore one of the Rover's ephemeral masterpieces. Her luncheon comprised two chopped egg sandwiches, a pickle and a chocolate cup cake. There was a moral in No. 102, sitting on the Rover's masterpiece and eating sandwiches, but the Rover couldn't quite hit on it.

With such idle speculation and vapid conjecturings the Rover passed away two freezing, windswept hours, until the hands of the clock on the drug store across the street reached 2:30 in their creeping around, and every one produced a half-dollar from pocket or purse and moved toward the open door to the concert hall.

And the Rover, who has been reading "Moby Dick" again, moved forward with them, still contemplative, comparing waiting on the steps of Symphony hall with the course of life.

A few hours in the cold and the wind, a little fun, a little work, a little study, and the gates open, admitting us all to the warmth of vast, sunlit halls, wherein the music of the spheres shall sound forever.

And even Melville couldn't better that conclusion.

Stravinsky

Conservatory, was shown the score licinella," he shrugged his shoulders id: "The same old story. Stravinuld never learn to harmonize. His s were always unsatisfactory."
is some ultimate truth in this pro-judgment. Like Beethoven's, Stra-
's harmonization is "unsatisfac-Disquisitions on the beauty of s are begging the question. We dmit that some pages of Stravin-e unspeakably hideous. Like his d notary, Stravinsky occasionally imself compelled to draw a contract with unsavory stuff. Stravinsky ematic, and he would not abandon ble line of investigation unless he convinced that it has been thorexploited. When he discards bar-power and rhythm, his admirers pleased, but Stravinsky is a great hatever his vagaries are, and he writing for admirers.
insky's independence from the hed code of morals is striking. It rkable with what nonchalance he t a vapid tune and use it for a rpose. The story of the famous solo of the "Sacre" is well-Stravinsky picked it up from a waltz by one Bochet, having t at a restaurant in Lausanne e was a daily customer. What d wrought! You would not know mble tune in its new surround-n several occasions Stravinsky ed himself to such stray tunes;
ner he has made use of identical for different purposes.
In his "impersonal" period, in-(Photo ed by the Piano-Concerto of 1924, abandoned certain devices which thfully served his needs all the
the "Fire Bird" to "Les Noces." nsky at rehearsals, relentless in ands for rhythm and rhythm

Miss Dor

Dr. and Mrs. Nathaniel Pope Bree ment of Their Daughter to George Assistant Professor in

Continued on Page Six

Stravinsky

Continued from Page Four

alone, trying to reduce everything to an inhumanly accurate succesion of beats, and struggling all the way through with his own unwelcome humanity, the sounds escaping his throat, the muscular tension, the perspiration, the unevenness of the rhythmical strokes, this Stravinsky is a symbol. He believes in the power of the written sign, and on one occasion he refused to correct an obvious misprint in the score of "Les Noces," insisting that all that is printed is correct. However, he often agrees to rearrange the metrical distribution, thus he re-distributes the meters of the "Dance Sacrale" of the "Rites of Spring" in a special addendum for the use of conductors. However, in this practical phase he is eminently unsuccessful. They say, Beethoven could not dance in time. Certainly, Stravinsky's external rhythm is far behind the rhythm of his brain.

Stravinsky is not so difficult to approach as he is reputed to be, provided there is some definite business on hand. But he would not bear platonic friendships even with the most ardent of his admirers. It is highly doubtful if Stravinsky is at all open to flattery however subtle. He is rather cynical in refusing to humor a man's vanity. One of the Stravinsky stories—told by Stravinsky himself—concerns a highly influential man who would address Stravinsky in his letters as "Cher ami," and would get a reply invariably addressed, "Cher Monsieur," until, after several rebukes, he compromised on "Cher Monsieur et Ami," ultimately dropping "Ami" altogether. Stravinsky's humor is dry, and he gets along best with simple folks. With them he is a convivial friend, remarkably alert and lucid even after several rounds of strong spirits have been served and consumed. One can not imagine such a mind a prey to any material or spiritual forces, independent of his free will. NICOLAS SLONIMSKY

80

Jan. 4 Dec 13

New Krenek, Old Sibelius, Novel Burgin

The Deputy-Conductor Excels Himself with Two Composers

UNTIL yesterday, self-consciousness was Mr. Burgin's bane as solo-violinist or deputy-conductor at Symphony Hall. Seated in his usual place at the head of the strings, he escaped it. There these ten years he has been spirited, sensitive, steadying concert-master. From time to time he has taken the solo-part in a violin-concerto—and never done himself full justice. (Probably he came nearest it when he played Sibelius's Concerto last spring.) Violinist all his life, now ripened virtuoso and fine-fibered musician, uneasiness—not with the music in hand or with the orchestra behind him, but with his inner self—seemingly oppressed him. He was as one who did not like to be left alone on the edge of a great platform with something to play and an audience waiting to hear. . . . Similarly with his conducting as substitute for Dr. Koussevitzky on holiday or, as this week in Cambridge and Boston, indisposed. Then again sight and thought of the audience seemed to constrain him. There he was, by himself, on a conspicuous stand, with a difficult job and no one near to help, though he and everyone else knew that a friendly orchestra sat ready to his askings. Self-confidence plainly forsook him; while the listener thought to himself what an admirable conductor Mr. Burgin must be—in his own rooms. Only on one or two occasions at the Young People's Concerts has he thrown off these constraints and conducted confidently, spiritedly, as one unoppressed.

There is not a reason why the adult assemblage of Friday afternoon or, for that matter, Saturday evening, should turn Mr. Burgin uneasy. It is as full of good will toward him as the orchestra itself, year in and year out saying as much in applause of welcome and approval At last he has made that discovery for himself: regained ease, gathered becoming confidence. Yesterday he conducted as never before at Symphony Hall, even with those youngsters' pieces for boys and girls. Mr. Burgin is no fanatical modernist; but he understands intelligently and sympathetically what such composers are trying to do; while the orchestra is excelled by no other—with a bow toward Philadelphia—in expert and characterizing performance of this music. He led it through Krenek's "Little Symphony" with a light, flexible hand; opened out intricate counterpoint; spared not with insist nt rhythms; made adept and vivacious play with strings of scrappy motivs; turned dissonances as though they were the most natural of musical means, as indeed they are to the composer's generation; gave the whole piece its true air of modish tonal entertainment.

With Mozart's Piano-concerto in A major, Mr. Burgin was not so fortunate, though the assisting pianist, Bruce Simonds of Yale, was by no means blameless. If the deputy-conductor had thrust away the oppression of an audience, the thought of a pianist to be accompanied made him uneasy. His hand stiffened the flowing, variable, luminous Mozart. He exaggerated contrasts, gaining a fleet finale at the expense of a slow-paced middle movement; let a thickened orchestral tone dull Mozartean sparkle. Nor did the pianist come to the rescue. . . . Intermission and a recovered Burgin outdoing himself, beyond all expectation, through Sibelius's First Symphony. The deputy-conductor has dwelt and worked in the North; known close contacts with the composer. Pole though Mr. Burgin is by birth, Sibelius's northern speech stimulates him. He was master of form and content in the Symphony; missed no characteristic trait or impressive moment; found and enjoined the tone that is voice to the music; deepened or heightened measure after measure. Orchestra and audience felt the impetus of remarkable performance. From both at the end there was no small applause.

Let the chemists of music play their game. We others, if we liked, could find traces—and more—of Chaikovsky, Grieg, Wagner, German here, Scandinavian there, in this Symphony of Sibelius written thirty years ago. We prefer, however, to regard them as residue from the common stock of music in that particular time, which no young composer, inquiring and assimilating, could escape at the turn of the century any more than nowadays he could cut free from Ravel or Stravinsky. As well blame a youthful poet for shaping a cadence or purpling a line after the manner of the good, the great and the fashionable around him.

Nor need we others daily, as superior persons, with the alleged neglect of Sibelius's symphonies, from this first to the last and possibly the final eighth. From the days of Gericke who introduced the second in 1904, to the days of Koussevitzky with the third, fifth, and thence onward, the Finn has been no overlooked composer at Symphony Hall. If Rabaud through seven months ignored him, Muck played him through seven years. London, Manchester, German cities hear him more than occasionally. He is household word in Stockholm, Copenhagen and Helsingfors; each a musically intelligent city. True, he is no Latin and "maestros"—the fashionable word for conductors in New York—may not be drawn to him. The Manhattanese who annually lament the disregard of Sibelius, may be mistaking their own city of light for an appreciably larger and different world.

What we others would hear, and do hear more than once, in this First Symphony is the unmistakable voice of Sibelius himself. It sounds in masculine strength and urge out of the first movement and the finale. It may be heard, stark and rough, from the scherzo. It sings the song of the slow movement, remembering, haunted, in gray tones o wan sweetness. For it forgive an occasional and ultimately alien lushness from Chaikovsky over the Russian border. We would also find the hand we have come to know upon Sibelius's later music. We feel it in measures that even thus early are written in bare line; or colored in black and gray; or so wrought that substance and sound are as one, with no superfluity between. For these individualities pass over an occasional Wagnerian fullness. The voice, the hand and also the spirit. It beats and surges, clanging, through the second half of the first movement. After the storm, the silence—and the Andante transmutes it into sound. Native wildness pierces out of the Scherzo. Darksome brooding descends upon the beginning of the finale. . . . Time and again in the retrospect of 1930, we recognize qualities of which this Symphony of 1900 was more than token.

Unless we are younger and less accustomed than many in Symphony Hall on a Friday or a Saturday, the old prepossessions persist and mi-lead when we wou d listen sympathetically to modernist music. Having heard quite as much as is good for us about the "majestic" Handel or the "heavenly" Mozart, we instinctively bid composers, born into this twentieth century, go and do likewise, if, and so far, as they can. Because Beethoven was "cosmic," is there no virtue in those a century after him, unless they also scale heights and plumb depths? "Hark, hark, the lark" and Schubert's song mounts to the skies. Because he left such an heritage, must the sons of another time and spirit go about lyric-lipped? Wagner wrought his marvels, all-embracing. We unconsciously deny hi genius, when he would have other music-making souls proportionately vasty. Our prepossessions, inherited from the nineteenth century, forbid us a music designed and accomplished "merely" to please and entertain.

To do both, and little else, seemed yesterday the purpose and plan of Krenek's "Little Symphony." A reviewer, hearing it in New York from Mr. Kleiber last November, found "nothing of special import." Need there be to stir interest and give pleasure, unless the listener is one of those too spiritualized souls who affect to descend from ivory towers into the concert-hall? Another lofty intellect carried away "no ideas." Is light and civilized entertainment so plentiful, in or out of the concert-room, that it may not be agreeably remembered when Krenek provides it through twenty-odd minutes? His orchestra promises amusement—no violas or violoncellos; instead guitar, mandolins, banjos, miscellaneous drums. Seemingly he loves not sighing strings, but would have at will metallic tones and plucked rhythms. He juggles with short-breathed motivs, switches and tosses them about, in his first movement. The game is diverting to follow—when a composer has so quick a hand at modulation, plies rhythm so insistently.

Hindemith-like, from the game to flow of feeling, light, simple, quite unsentimental—the old romantic mood new flavored. Except prejudice, there is not a reason to doubt that the song begun by the clarinet is an honest tune—a tune, moreover, keeping to its simplicity as it expands, without harmonic fat or instrumental cosmetics. The finale is dance-like, metallic sounding, with a tango-rhythm haunting it. By all odds a reflection of our time, as the younger generation in Central Europe sees, hears, thinks, feels and lives. It makes an adept din, but melancholy streaks it. It plays about, but it is restless and less than happy. . . . In short, a trifle of a piece, but agreeable and by no means empty. And atonality and linear counterpoint? They are a part of our youngsters' idiom. Whether we like them or not, we are gradually accepting them, as we agreed to Debussyan harmonies or Stravinskian rhythms. The error of Krenek, as here exhibited for the first time in Boston, is technical skill for its own sake and the connoisseurs'. It is familiar pitfall for German modernists, Schönberg prompting. Krenek's quick hand and changeful impulses do not always mask it. . . . Fortunately, the youngsters in the house gave him warm welcome.

To the Piano-Concerto of Mozart, which was middle item in the program, it is hardly necessary to return. Most of it is workaday Mozart, needing a transmuting touch and spirit that evaded both Mr. Burgin and Mr. Simonds. Of the deputy-conductor enough has been said. The pianist lacked for the time the d scriminating hand, shading here, measuring there, that he has often plied in Boston; let his tone run opaque, left fuzz on his phrases, so spaced his periods that light barely shone through. Nor, had his usual sensibility served him, would he have taken the Andante so slowly—an eighteenth-century Andante to boot, quicker by report than ours. A stodgy Mozart is not easy to bear. Both Mr. Burgin and Mr. Simonds tried too hard. H. T. P.

After many days! . . . On Sunday afternoon, Jan. 11, at Symphony Hall, Yehudi Mehunin, the celebrated prodigy of the violin, will play for the first time in Boston. To his coming City Hall now raises no objection, though it did two years ago. Nearly every other capital of music has heard Yehudi.

8" High—THE SALEM, $3.50
Postpaid $3.65

The old-fashioned foot scraper has returned, and with winter days approaching is essential to the well groomed doorway.

As Foot Scraper or Doorstop, $3.50
Catalog "Y" upon Request

YE IRON SHOPPE
Owned and Operated by E. T. Ryan Iron Works, Inc.
250 BOYLSTON ST.
KEN more 0164

(R)

A Lottery Perhaps But Cut to Pattern

IT may be set down as a matter of record that the public dis aste for musical romances in the films has reached a point where groans arise at each successive suggestion that the tenor is going to sing. At the State Theater last night there was a certain spot in the house where patrons amused themselves by prophesying what would next take place, even to expression and dialogue, in the film, "The Lottery Bride." They were right in a dismaying proportion of cases. First reaction is amazement that a picture deriving from such

---

Walter Abel, and Vera Allen are announced as two of the principal players in the new company at the Copley. For some years Mr. Abel has risen steadily in the practice of his calling on the New York stage. Miss Allen was one of the few able performers in the Leiber Company at the Wilbur last March. Both will be seen in the first play at the Copley, "Rebound."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

Dec 13 1930

THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

HENRI PRUNIERES, famous French musicologist and writer on musical subjects, visited this country recently and while in Chicago and New York heard the Chicago, New York Philharmonic Symphony, Philadelphia and Boston orchestras. Upon his return to Paris he wrote at length his impressions of these four organizations for the New York Times, of which he is the Paris musical correspondent. Permission has been granted the writer by the Times to use part of M. Prunieres' comment on our greatest American orchestras.

The great French writer says that there can be no comparison between any of these four orchestras of the United States and the best in Europe. "I am quite sure," says M. Prunieres, "that if the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which, in my opinion, is the best in Europe, were to visit America it would be adjudged as being in the fifth or sixth rank, certainly below that of the Chicago Orchestra, which seems to me to be inferior to those of Philadelphia, Boston or New York."

* * *

DISCUSSING the orchestras and their conductors in detail, M. Prunieres continues: "Which American orchestra is to be ranked the first? I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

"At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia.

"It is, in truth, a very difficult matter to determine the intrinsic worth of these orchestras without taking into consideration the conductors who have slowly fashioned them. The sonority may change according to the director. All those whom I have heard in the United States are extraordinary technicians. I will not return to Toscanini again. He is the king and every one bows before his mastery and genius.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

HUB SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS HERE AGAIN TUESDAY

Makes Its Second Visit of Season at Albee Theatre Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Providence of the season to give a concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening at 8:15.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B-minor, No. 12; Mozart's Symphony in G-minor (K. No. 550), and the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

A free lecture on this program will be given in the Providence Public Library tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock. Dr. W. Louis Chapman will describe the music to be played and illustrate the principal themes upon the piano. The lectures have been arranged by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

and for all the great new works which he has introduced. * * *

"Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third symphony, Debussy's 'La Mer' and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!

"Frederick Stock impresses me as belonging to a category other than these two directors. One feels that his taste and make-up are essentially classical. He has a profound respect for the works he interprets, and forces himself to translate all the author's intentions, effacing himself as much as possible behind the writer. For me, he and Stokowski stand at the opposite poles. Incontestably, he is a great servant of music.

"He conducts works with extreme simplicity, without any sought-after effects.

"America is fortunate in possessing such orchestras and such conductors."

* * *

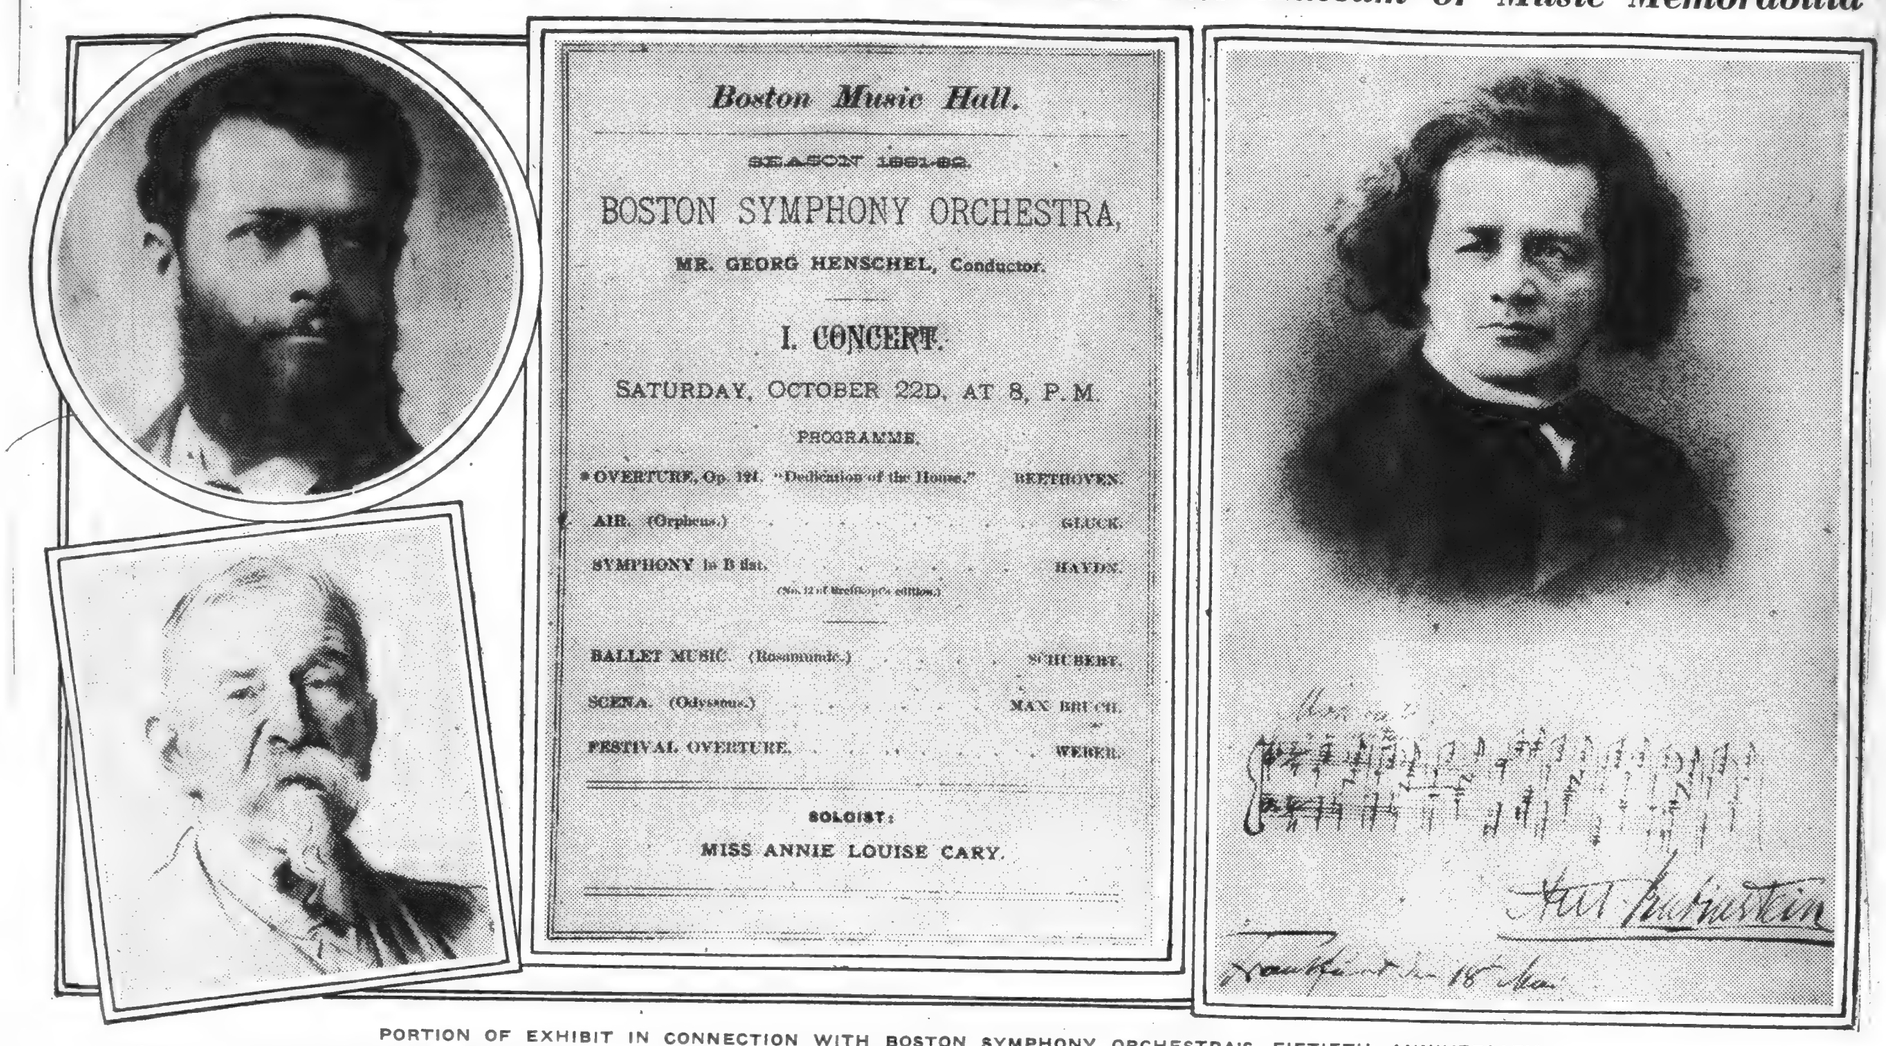
"LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI [illegible] me. I am not sure that he is always correct in his very free interpretations of masterworks, but I must admit that I have thought of this only in retrospect. During the performance, in spite of my surprise in hearing the finale of the Franck symphony so filled with personal and original effects that I no longer recognized the orchestration, I applauded enthusiastically. And then what a marvelous execution of the Debussy 'Nocturnes'! Never have I heard them played so! The 'Fetes (with the unheard-of effect of the brasses giving a pianissimo echo) struck me as being that which Debussy had dreamed, without the hope of ever hearing it realized.

"An astonishing musician is this Leopold Stokowski, and I hope with all my heart that Europe will be able to hear him some day at the head of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

* * *

"SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY is very popular in Paris, where we are grateful to him for some magnificent concerts which he has given here,

Boston Symphony Hall for the Moment Transformed Into Museum of Music Memorabilia



PORTION OF EXHIBIT IN CONNECTION WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY

Top Left—Portrait of Georg Henschel, First Conductor. Lower Left—Sargent Portrait of Henry Lee Higginson, Organizer of the Orchestra. Center—Copy of First Program. Right—Portrait of Anton Rubinstein and Scrap of His Manuscript.

pourri, with jazz and romance alternating. The composer's program note says: "The dance character of the music was suggested by my use in the score of plucked instruments; two banjos, two mandolins, guitar and harp. These instruments were not employed, however, because of their association with jazz, but because of their appropriateness to the vibrating, rattling, metallic sound which I had conceived for the expression of my music." Which recalls Stravinsky insisting that the music of the "Sacre" came to him first, the "program" afterward.

But we are concerned not with the composer's words, but with his music. There can be no doubt that he knows his way about. His play with tonalities and with free counterpoint is sufficient evidence of that, even if he had not deliberately discarded in this symphony the violas and the cellos, and added to the orchestral family some distant relations from the dance hall—this clinches the argument that he is a man of mark. We must add, however, that he has proved again that jazz does not grow at its most luxurious in European soil, and that a want of significant thematic material is not to be compensated by compositional and orchestral legerdemain. But as the

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Returning from the Beethoven Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held at Washington Dec. 2-6, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky felt that he was entitled to a respite; and not unreasonably, since his labors are seldom interrupted, and since, by report, he devoted special efforts to making successful the celebration at the national capital. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, took the baton, therefore, for the eighth pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, the first of which was held on the afternoon of Dec. 12. Mr. Burgin opened his program with a first Boston performance of Ernst Křenek's "Little Symphony," op. 58, continued it with Mozart's A major Piano Concerto (Bruce Simonds, soloist) and closed it with the First Symphony of Sibelius. It is pleasant to record that as vicar he acquitted himself with distinction.

Křenek's "Little Symphony" is to the concert hall what "Jonny Spielt Auf" is to the opera house. Although the music is clothed in symphonic form, it is, like its big brother, a pot-

Boston Symphony's Half Century Visualized in Memorial Exhibit

Portraits of Many Men Prominent in Its Development Shown With Programs, Bits of Manuscript and Other Precious Reminders of Its Early Days

A Symphonic Ode, delighting music lovers of long ago, finds the same appreciation among the music lovers of today in this complacent, cultivated "Town of Boston." All that differs, in this age of comfortable approach, is the method for arrival. Where once upon a time the rough-going hack, or the "flat"-wheeled horse car made such a trip almost an expedition, today the devotee hies himself or herself to the quiet-rolling limousine. But let Symphony Hall tell its own story.

A memorable exhibition is in town. In a rectangular room, along the Huntington Avenue side of the hall, show cases filled with things interesting for their connection with the semicentennial of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and walls hung with paintings and photographs of men famous in the world of music, await the visitor who cares to live for a brief while with the memorabilia of yesterday.

Striking, for its craftsmanship and its rightfulness of position, is the Sargent painting of Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It hangs along the wall, to the right of the main entrance, while across the room hang smaller photographs of the same man among the great composers and music masters he knew and brought to Boston.

There are other paintings that attract attention, too—the Maria Danforth Page conception of the orchestra at rehearsal, and the Duane Haley idea of the "Friday Rush Line" before the portico of Symphony Hall. So characteristic they are one might believe the baton of Koussevitsky moved, as the soft strains of the violins floated across the empty hall, or the eager chatter of the young girls, standing in line, sounded forth from the canvas to tell of the treat awaiting them.

And then, above a show case filled with precious things of the past, a picture . . . of the crowd that stood five days and five nights in line before the doors of old Music Hall that seats for the Saturday night season tickets might be procured, tells in its own way of the musical interest handed down to the present generation. It is a curious picture; at least it is curious to us of today, for the dress of the crowd is that of the late '80s.

Close by, in a case carefully guarded, is the picture of the auction room founded in 1890 and maintained until 1917. And in connection with this room, and its boards like those in brokers' offices, is the information that after subscription tickets came into vogue, more than 90 per cent of the music-loving crowds renewed their privileges annually. The tickets of the '81-'82 era were fashioned after the card one presents to the railway conductor. They were punched along the rim at each concert. Originally, they called for the Saturday night recitals. The Friday night affairs were rehearsals, and cost but 25 cents.

For those who care for photographs, autographed and thoughtfully posed, pictures of such composers as Ernest Bloch, Serg Rachmaninoff, Igor Stravinsky, Maurice Ravel and Ottomio Respighi turn one's thoughts to what such men might say of the jazz-struck 1930 period. Turn to the left and find in another case the symphonies of Roussel and Prokoffiev, the Ode by Hill, the symphony by Honneger, and the Symphonic Ode by Copeland, and perhaps the question is answered.

There is restful calmness in this rectangular room at Symphony Hall. The manuscripts, the letters of those great masters, the programs they offered to those who cared to listen, lend themselves to a yesterday that the world, at its best, may only copy. But even to copy is worth while, as those masters gazing from the walls would agree.

Until early January this exhibition will continue. At present, according to the management, only on symphony nights may the lovers of music climb those winding stairs leading to the rectangular room. Later, should there be the demand, the doors may open during the day. The public will determine all that. Meantime, the exhibition awaits, and the memorabilia of days long passed is there for those who care to look. They are all worth while.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN 2D MONDAY CONCERT

Anton Witek Soloist in Mozart Violin Concerto

Globe Dec 11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last evening the second concert of the current Monday evening series. The illness which Dr Koussevitzky contracted after arduous labors at the recent Beethoven festival in Washington, D C, has made it necessary for him to forego for a short time his work with the orchestra. Therefore, Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, conducted last evening's concert. The program was: Handel, Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, in B minor, No. 12; Mozart, Concerto for violin and orchestra, in A major (K, No. 219); Brahms, Symphony No. 2, in D major.

Anton Witek, for some years concert master of the Symphony under Dr Muck, was the soloist in the Mozart concerto. Mr Witek was all that could be asked in the matters of virtuosity and artistically tasteful playing. But in the Adagio and in the Minuetto, however, one could not escape the impression that his Mozart was timid, restrained, lacking in warmth and glow. The Mozart cantilena came forth delicately and finely shaped, but it did not flow.

Due to the necessity of attending another concert that was being given at the same time as the Symphony concert, the writer was unable to hear the Handel concerto and the Allegro of the Mozart concerto.

In the remaining portions of the program, however, one formed the firm conviction that Mr Burgin was by no means merely a substitute conductor serving in perfunctory manner in an emergency. He appeared to be in firm control of his forces, and the playing reflected deliberately conceived and authoritatively executed procedure. His orchestral accompaniment in the violin concerto was splendidly proportioned, neatly and delicately dispatched.

The Brahms of the second symphony is, to one person, a Brahms refined, rather intellectual, open-hearted, in quietly joyful contemplation and appreciation of marvelous Nature. Here, for all the symphonic joyous outpourings in the spirit of "L'Allegro," unmistakably appear musings and emotions in the manner of "Il Penseroso." This Brahms is greatly to be loved and treasured. From Mr Burgin and orchestra it received just due.

SECOND MONDAY NIGHT CONCERT

Anton Witek Soloist With Symphony Under Burgin

Post Dec 16

With a former concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Anton Witek, as soloist in a concerto of Mozart, and Richard Burgin, the present concertmaster, conducting the orchestra, the Symphony Concert of last evening, the second of the current Monday series, offered a scene and situation that will not soon be duplicated.

Dr. Koussevitzky is well on the road to recovery, but his medical advisers, believing in the principle of safety first, persuaded him to absent himself from Symphony Hall until this morning when, if all goes well, he will conduct the regular rehearsal. How fortunately, then, for the orchestra that a conductor of Mr. Burgin's abilities, which lately have ripened and blossomed to such a marked degree, stands ready to take his place. Already Mr. Burgin had covered himself with glory at last Thursday's concert in Cambridge and at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, when he brought to memorable performance the First Symphony of Sibelius; and last evening in Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso, in the Concerto of Mozart, already referred to, specifically the one in A major, numbered 5, and in the Second Symphony of Brahms he again showed his mettle. Mr. Burgin conducted last evening with an excellent choice of tempo, brought to pass orchestral performances of admirable balance and clarity, and was eloquent as interpreter with all.

Mr. Witek, well remembered by those who heard the Symphony Concerts in the days of Dr. Muck, has occupied among other posts since his departure from Boston that of concertmaster of the orchestra at the Bayreuth Festivals, and is now serving in a like capacity in the new Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra. His playing of last evening displayed familiar virtues of style and musicianship, but was prevailingly thin in tone, not always impeccable as to intonation and occasionally somewhat labored technically. The audience received him warmly. And if that audience was disappointed in not finding Dr. Koussevitzky at his accustomed post, it at least displayed no lack of cordiality to Mr. Burgin throughout the evening.

83

Concert Chronicle

Witek Returns

UNEXPECTEDLY the second concert of the Monday series of symphony concerts last evening proceeded under the guidance of Richard Burgin, exactly as had those of Friday and Saturday and the one at Cambridge on Thursday. On Saturday evening it was thought that Mr. Burgin would conduct, as he did. On Sunday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky sent word to Symphony Hall that he would be ready to proceed with rehearsals and concerts on Monday, as was reported in these columns last evening. Monday morning, however, found him with that lassitude which often follows a severe cold; and rather than risk taking a fresh cold while still in somewhat weakened condition the conductor decided to use the day for a final rest before resuming his duties. And so Mr. Burgin once more filled the breach.

Under his leadership the orchestra played Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12, for string orchcestra; the songful second symphony, in D major, of Brahms. As guest appeared Mr. Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra in Dr. Muck's regime. Mr. Witek played Mozart's fifth violin concerto in A major. Of this concert, as of those of the week-end, a chief theme must therefore be Mr. Burgin's progress in the ways of a conductor. For one found him again last evening as forceful with his energies as he was apt and persuasive with his melodies, discriminating in his distribution of light and shade, in his balancing of the various choirs, adept in his search for euphony. Not always has Mr. Burgin conducted in this manner. Within a year he has "found himself."

Thus a Monday audience heard the sonorities and the breadths of a Handel, the sound of strings deep and full, high and shining, the rhythms forward marching as only Handel knew how to make them march, the progress and the unfolding of melody to delight the ear and warm the heart. Thus also this audience of Monday heard the songfulness of Brahms as four movements of a symphony bring it. One was particularly impressed by the manner in which this symphony makes its way when left merely to run its natural course. Mr. Burgin's reading was not a "personal" reading, it was not a reading which emphasized here and pointed there, which manipulated rhythms and piled up climaxes; in short it was not a reading in which conductorial virtuosity played a part. To such Mr. Burgin does not, need not aspire. His reading was the reading of an able musician, who, freed from restraint and knowing well his music, allows that music to flow freely in its own way. It was a "natural" reading. And few symphonies (or composers) there are which would come out so well with this essentially simple sort of treatment. Like a Schubert song this symphony sings its way into the heart if and when it is free to run its course.

Had Mr. Witek played on a Friday or a Saturday he would have had many old friends among his listeners. As it was, this new Monday audience must have heard him freshly, must have received new pleasure from his playing. For the few in the audience who knew him, recollection must have come of the remembered tone, of the technic large, ample, fluent. He played his Mozart in the essentially classical manner—phrases beautifully polished, well balanced, building up into larger wholes perfectly proportioned, and Mozartean simplicity and elegance in the bargain. The few slips of intonation—one grants such even to a Kreisler. Mr. Burgin, with the diminished orchestra which has now become standard for Mozart at Symphony Hall, gave not only support but spun the fine gossamer web of tone, provided the leaping, elastic rhythms, against which Mr. Witek might ply his arts, and which in themselves played not a small part in this Mozartean Mozart. A. H. M.

After Washington

A week ago last Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra ended the four concerts of their Beethoven Festival in Washington. The aftermath has been considerable. Here, for example, are two paragraphs from a letter written to the conductor by Mr. Charles Moore, Chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts in the District of Columbia:

> Writing on behalf of those who are deeply concerned with the amenities of the national capital as well as the physical appearance of the city of Washington, I thank you for the important contribution you have just made by carrying out your desire to give the Beethoven Festival here. The immediate response must have gratified you; but the lasting impression made by such a series of concerts cannot be over-estimated.
>
> Washington is indeed the political, scientific and social center of this country. It has still far to go in recognition of the Fine Arts as an essential element in civilization. Your efforts, therefore, are appreciated as largely contributing to this end. Once enlisted in this task we hope that you will be encouraged to continue.

And here also is a paragraph of a private letter written from Washington to a member of the Transcript's staff: "You should have come down for the Beethoven Festival. . . . We lived through unforgettable days of musical joy and enthusiasm. For a few days Washington seemed completely changed. People forgot their usual diplomatic ways and attitude of condescension towards artists. . . . For once they were enthusiastic, just as ordinary people are."

Stravinsky (Summer, 1930)

Snapshot Taken at Plombières-les-Bains in the Vosges

In Psalms Stravinsky Praises God

A Remarkable New Symphony To Be Performed in Boston Tomorrow

THIS WEEK it is the turn of Igor the Great at Symphony Hall. His latest work, the "Symphonie de Psaumes," Stravinsky has dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary. Since it is short, Dr. Koussevitzky intended to play it twice on Friday afternoon and again on Saturday evening. But orchestra and chorus, to meet the composer's requirements, must be reseated before each performance. "Time out" forbade. Therefore repetitions of the new Symphony are reserved for o later pair of concerts. As originally planned, another of Stravinsky's newer works will companion the Symphony—a Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, first heard last December in Paris with the composer taking the piano-part. Here in Boston Mr. Sanromá will play it.

Upon the first leaf of the score of the Symphony, reproduced elsewhere on this page, Stravinsky has written and printed in his own hand: "Symphony of Psalms. Music composed by Igor Stravinsky. Manuscript of the orchestral score. Remarks: The three parts of this Symphony are to be played without pause. The text of the Psalms, which is that of the Vulgate, is to be sung in Latin. The Psalms are: Verses 13 and 14 of XXVIII for the first part; verses 2, 3 and 4 of XXXIX for the second part; the CL Psalm entire for the third part. The chorus should be of children's voices. Lacking these, women's voices (sopranos and altos) may be substituted. Dedication: This Symphony, composed for the glory of God, is dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of its existence. Igor Stravinsky. 1930." At the end of the score one reads, "Igor Stravinsky, Nice, 1930." It should be added that it is probably a slip of the pen in copying that makes Stravinsky write that the first part is from the twenty-eighth Psalm in the Vulgate; as a matter of fact it is the thirty-eighth. In making his Roman numerals he neglected or forgot to print his last "X." The chorus contains the usual four parts—soprano, alto, tenor, bass—and is not merely soprano and alto as might easily be presumed from Stravinsky's title-page. Arthur Fiedler chose the choir from The Cecilia and prepared it.

The manuscript, said to be in Stravinsky's own hand, is the most beautiful example imaginable of the art of putting pen to paper. The paper itself is a fine parchment. The notes are fashioned with a care at least equal to that of the engraver who prepares plates for the printer. In order not to give the appearance of crowding, thus also to make reading easier for the conductor, an exceptionally large size of paper was specially made. A curious one measured it and found it to be exactly twenty-one and three-quarters inches tall!

There are other unusual features in this score. Stravinsky abandons the use of adjectives to indicate pace or speed. Thus one may no longer read "Allegro," or "Vite," or "Schnell," or "Fast," according to the linguistic prejudice of the composer. The latest Igor would be far more accurate, depending entirely upon metronome markings. The first part of the Symphony bears the superscription, "Tempo, quarters equal 92." It is without key signature and in 2-4 meter. In the second part eighths equal 60; the key-signature is three flats; the meter 4-8. The third part, again in three flats, begins in 4-4 meter, with the quarter-note equal to 48; soon drops the key-signature and speeds up to "halves equal 80"; finally becomes again slower with "halves equal 48" and a 2-2 meter.

Nor is the orchestration conventional. The score calls for five flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo), four oboes and English horn, no clarinets, three bassoons and double-bassoon, four horns, five trumpets including a small trumpet in D, three trombones (the third a bass trombone) and tuba, tympani, bass drum, harp, two pianos, chorus and strings. A reduction of the score for piano and voices has been made by the composer's son, Svietoslav, whose picture appears on this page. Elsewhere on it Stravinsky has printed the chosen Psalms as they are to be sung, in Latin text and the English text side by side.

Musically, the texture of this so-called Symphony is contrapuntal rather than harmonic. Often the counterpoint is born of the development of certain figures which proceed with the strictest logic according to the laws of their own being, but allow themselves the greatest possible freedom in the relationship to similar developments on the part of their neighbors. Thus sharp harmonic and tonal clashes frequently arise. There results a condition of continuous harmonic flux in which new combinations are ever appearing. They can only be compared to the changing forms and colors in a kaleidoscope, which similarly result from variously timed motions of a few fundamental figures. There appears to be little or no deliberate atonality, while polytonality is an inevitable factor in such a texture.

Nor does one see in the "Symphony of Psalms" evidence of another "return" to this or that older composer. Stravinsky is composing in his own right, in his own manner. The score, however, contained certain deliberate archaisms, introduced no doubt in the attempt to suggest in some degree the musical atmosphere or nature of the Psalms of David. There is much of this suggestion in the general spirit of the music as well as in certain definte progressions.

In form, the first and the last part maintain typical contrapuntal freedom. In them matter dictates form as much as in a chorus of Palestrina or a Prelude or Fantasia of Bach. "Formalism" has never dictated these forms. The second part takes the contrapuntal form of the fugue. Thus the term, "symphony" has been stretched as far as composer has ever willed to stretch it. In the nineteenth century it connoted a formal scheme; in the eighteenth it was frequently no more than an overture; always it has been predominantly instrumental and largely formal. This "Symphony of Psalms" is neither. Yet who would deny Stravinsky the right to use the term in his own manner?

One suspects that the expressive effect will extend well beyond the archaistic suggestion of background. That is only a detail. With the Palmist, Stravinsky travels the road from prayerful penitence to reverberant praise. In the stages of this progress lies the expressive scheme of the "Symphony of Psalms." Not for their musical contours were these motivs and phrases and themes written. Not musical delectation is their function. They were conceived to act as tonal vehicle for a magnificent grouping of words, for a magnificent sequence of thought and emotion. In the union with those words must they be heard.

The Symphony begins with drab-colored arpeggio figures punctuated by sharp E minor chords. Altos begin the words of prayer with the simplest motiv that could have been devised for them, the minor second; while figurse from the introductory measures serve as accompaniment. This most sombre music continues until "Quonian advena," (see the Latin text) when a somewhat more expansive theme enters in altos and basses. The music continues its stark, almost forbidding mood. There is high emphasis upon "Remitte mihi." The movement ends strongly with a modal cadence.

The second movement is fugal. A strict fugue-exposition upon a somewhat chromatic theme begins the movement. When voices enter they introduce another fugal exposition upon another subject; while the orchestra continues with contrapuntal and imitative treatment of its own subject. An interlude upon the orchestral subject occurs between "gressus meos" and "Et immisit." With these latter words the thought enters upon a new phase. The first movement has been penitence and prayer. The first half of the second, patient waiting while God's mercies are recalled. Now, "He hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God." The chorus takes the words broadly, in full though somewhat archaic sonorities, while the orchestra continues with a further development of its own theme as announced at the very beginning of the movement.

Broadly speaking, the last movement is an ascent through various stages of praise. After a dignified beginning an orchestral interlude introduces rhythms suggestive of gaiety. (Is not the Psalm soon to enumerate psaltery and harp, timbrel and dance?) With the orchestra continuing in this wise the chorus mounts higher and higher with music of praise. Occasionally the voices join in the orchestral rhythms; oftenest they maintain their broader flow of tone. There is a second and still more lively interlude before "Laudate eum in timpano et choro." After a magnificent climax of praise, the movement ends quietly with the motivs of the "Alleluia" and the "Laudate" with which it began.

To Follow, A New-Made "Capriccio"

Stravinsky's Notable Piece For Piano and Orchestra Also to Be Heard

AS PENDANT and contrasting piece to Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," described in other columns on this page, audiences at the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Saturday will hear—also for the first times in America—his "Caprice for Orchestra with Piano-Solo, as he labels it singularly on the title page. After the original performance in Paris, Dec. 6, 1929, with the composer as pianist and Ernest Ansermet conducting, Pierre de Lapommoraye wrote this imaginative description in the weekly journal of music, "Le Menestrel":

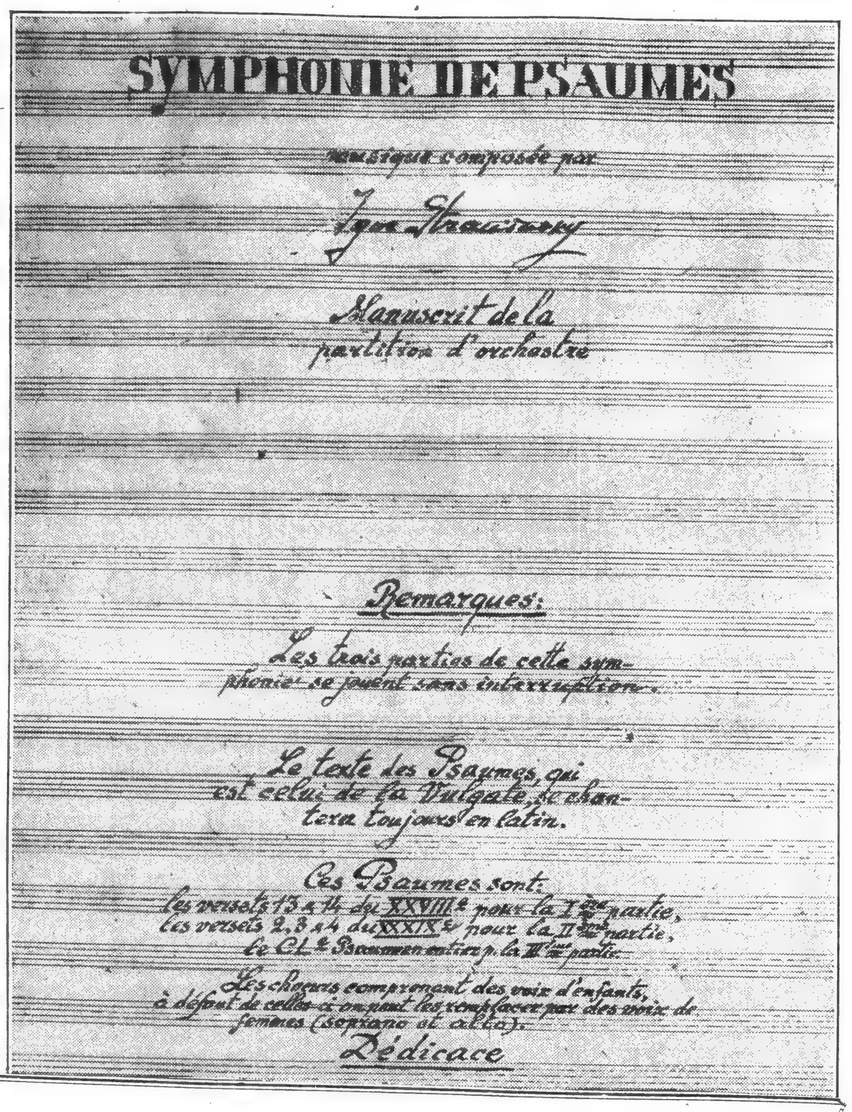
"The title, 'Capriccio' allows Monsieur Stravinsky all manner of fantasies. He begins with well-rhythmed chords, a sort of Harlequin's entry, both dazzling and brusque; à sudden leap, then our Harlequin looking quizzically to right and to left. 'Wait, wait,' he seems to say, 'this is life, now gay, now sad, now melancholy.' Pirouette follows pirouette; with ease the agile piano turns the scintillant figure. Then it indulges in a sort of recitatif—Harlequin, methinks, is talking to himself. Would life bring something grave, would there be something of love, may he look for friendship? And the piano (which I imagine to be Harlequin) converses with the orchestra, which is the invisible voice of Nature, replying with brusque chords. But the natural temperament of Harlequin gets the upper hand and he finds himself near Petrouchka, Polichinelle, Columbine. Throwing away the mask, with shining eyes he surrenders himself to the intoxication of a tumultuous gayety. Thus the finale has all the verve of a Chabrier. Of course this story, be it well understood (continues the French reviewer) is entirely my own; but since the music permits all manner of fanciful vagaries, I could not resist the temptation to write it."

Looking over the score, the analyst (congenitally disposed to look with suspicion upon "interpretive" stories) for once is willing to admit that such a fantasy may be more truthful than factual dissection. Yet for those who must have something more tangible, he submits the sober information here appended.

The "Capriccio" runs through three movements—"Presto," "Andante rapsodico," "Allegro capriccioso." It was written between January and August, 1929. It is said that the last movement, which is the main body of the work, was composed first; that the second is preparatory to it, that the first is in turn preparatory to the second. André Schaeffner, in an article in "Modern Music," wrote: "I come back always to a statement I carefully formulated in April, 1923, which seemed to me to sum up the essentials of Stravinsky's esthetic. The work of Stravinsky develops as a fan unfolds; from a single point of attachment, the units branch out in all directions, each depending on the displacement of a preceding one. This art is the more flexible, offers the more signs of a real mobility, because the author is endowed with an incomparable gift of penetration." A shrewd observation on Stravinsky's methods, and especially applicable in the 'Capriccio."

The orchestra takes its clue from the old concerto-form of Bach and Handel. Strings have their little "concertino" group. This "concertino" contains four solo-voices—a violin, a viola, a 'cello, a bass; the full string choir is also treated as a quartet (rather than a quintet) of violins, violas, 'cellos, basses. There are, of course, the usual wind instruments, and the piano is the solo voice. The 'Capriccio" has been called Stravinsky's second piano-concerto. But in style there is little or no resemblance to the first, in which the orchestra consisted wholly of wind instruments; in which the composer made one of his first attempts at a return to the classical style; in which the coloring is extremely drab and hard. The piano-part in the "Capriccio" is very prominent and highly "pianistic." Writers hint at a Chopinesque piano-style and a

Double Stravinsky -- New Symphony, New Piano-Piece -- Concerts -- Theaters



SYMPHONIE DE PSAUMES

musique composée par

Igor Stravinsky

Manuscrit de la partition d'orchestre

Remarques:

Les trois parties de cette symphonie se jouent sans interruption.

Le texte des Psaumes, qui est celui de la Vulgate, se chantera toujours en latin.

Ces Psaumes sont:
les versets 13 & 14 du XXXVIII^e pour la I^ère partie, les versets 2, 3 & 4 du XXXIX^e pour la II^ème partie, le CL^e Psaume entier p. la III^ème partie.

Les choeurs comprennent des voix d'enfants, à défaut de celles-ci on peut les remplacer par des voix de femmes (soprano et alto).

Dédicace

Stravinsky and His Sons

Left, Svietoslav, Pianist; Right, Feodor, Painter

view of the score brings assent. One would hardly say, however, that this kinship spells a "return to Chopin." The last movement, in addition to this flexible and fluid style, also makes a bow to the modern god, "jazz."

Monsieur Lapommeraye ends his review by saying that this "work may well prove to be one of the best of Stravinsky." Monsieur Schaeffer concludes his article: "The work represents the most powerful effort to which Stravinsky has as yet bent his will, but the appearance of mastery and at the same time freshness, remains undisturbed." In a new work "Stravinsky's Sacrifice to Apollo," Mr. E. W. White has this note on the "Capriccio."

It may be said in explanation of the las two sentences that the thesis of Mr. White's book seems to be that Stravinsky's greatest works are "The Rite of Spring" and Œdipus Rex"; that what went before the "Rite" was only plowing the ground for it: that, after a period of fumbling, Stravinsky's next works were really preparatory to "Œdipus"; that he may now be on the way toward another masterpiece. Mr. White remarks: "Where in 'The Fairy's Kiss' the muse of Chaikovsky was Stravinsky's crutch, in the 'Capriccio' this crutch has been thrown away, and the convalescent walks, leaning only occasionally on the helping arms of Chopin and Liszt., The music is thin and fluent, but no so contrapntal as the earlier neo-classical works. The most successful movement is the finale . . . It is obvious that Stravinsky is approaching another masterpiece (perhaps his promised setting of the Mass), which is due to arrive about 1933. Let us hope that 'The Fairy's Kiss' and the 'Capriccio' will then find full explanation, and Apollo the completest satisfaction." Can Mr. White be right? And is the Symphony of Psalms another link in the chain toward a possible master-setting of the Mass? Or can the new symphony itself be the awaited masterpiece, ahead of its prophesied time? We shall all be wiser concerning such matters on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening. But will we be wise enough to answer these questions? A. H. M.

The Psalms of Stravinsky

Latin and English Texts of the Choruses in His New Symphony

IN his new "Symphony of Psalms," written as contribution to the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra, Stravinsky has embedded the whole of one Psalm of David; excerpts from two more. Tomorrow they will be sung at the Symphony Concert by a chorus from the Cecilia, using the Latin of the Vulgate.

The numbering of these psalms and the verses differs somewhat in English Bibles from that version. Psalm XXXVIII, verses 13, 14, becomes in the English Psalter Psalm XXXIX, verses 12, 13. Psalm XXXIX, verses 2, 3, 4, becomes Psalm XL, verses 1, 2, 3. Psalm CL is the same in both versions. The Latin of the Vulgate (taken from Stravinsky's score) and the English of the King James version are here paralleled:

I

Exaudi orationem, Domine, et deprecationem meam.
Auribus percipe lacrimas meas, ne sileas.
Quoniam advena ego sum apud te et peregrinus, sicud omnes patris mei.
Remitte mihi.
Prius quam abeam et amplius non ero.

Hear my prayer, O Lord, and give ear to my cry; hold not Thy peace at my tears: for I am a stranger with Thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were.
O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more.

II

Expectans expectavi Dominum et intendi mihi.
Et exaudivit preces meas;
et eduxit me de lacu miseriae, et de latofaecis.
Et statuit super petram pedes meos:
et direxit gressus meos.
Et immisit in os meum canticum novum, carmen Deo nostro.
Videbunt multo, videbunt et timabunt:
et sperabunt in Domino.

I waited patiently for the Lord; and He inclined unto me, and heard my cry.

He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings.

And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God: many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord.

III

Alleluia.
Laudate Dominum in sanctis Ejus,
Laudate Eum in firmamento virtutis Ejus.
Laudate Eum in virtutibus Ejus.
Laudate Eum secundum multitudinem magnitudinis Ejus.
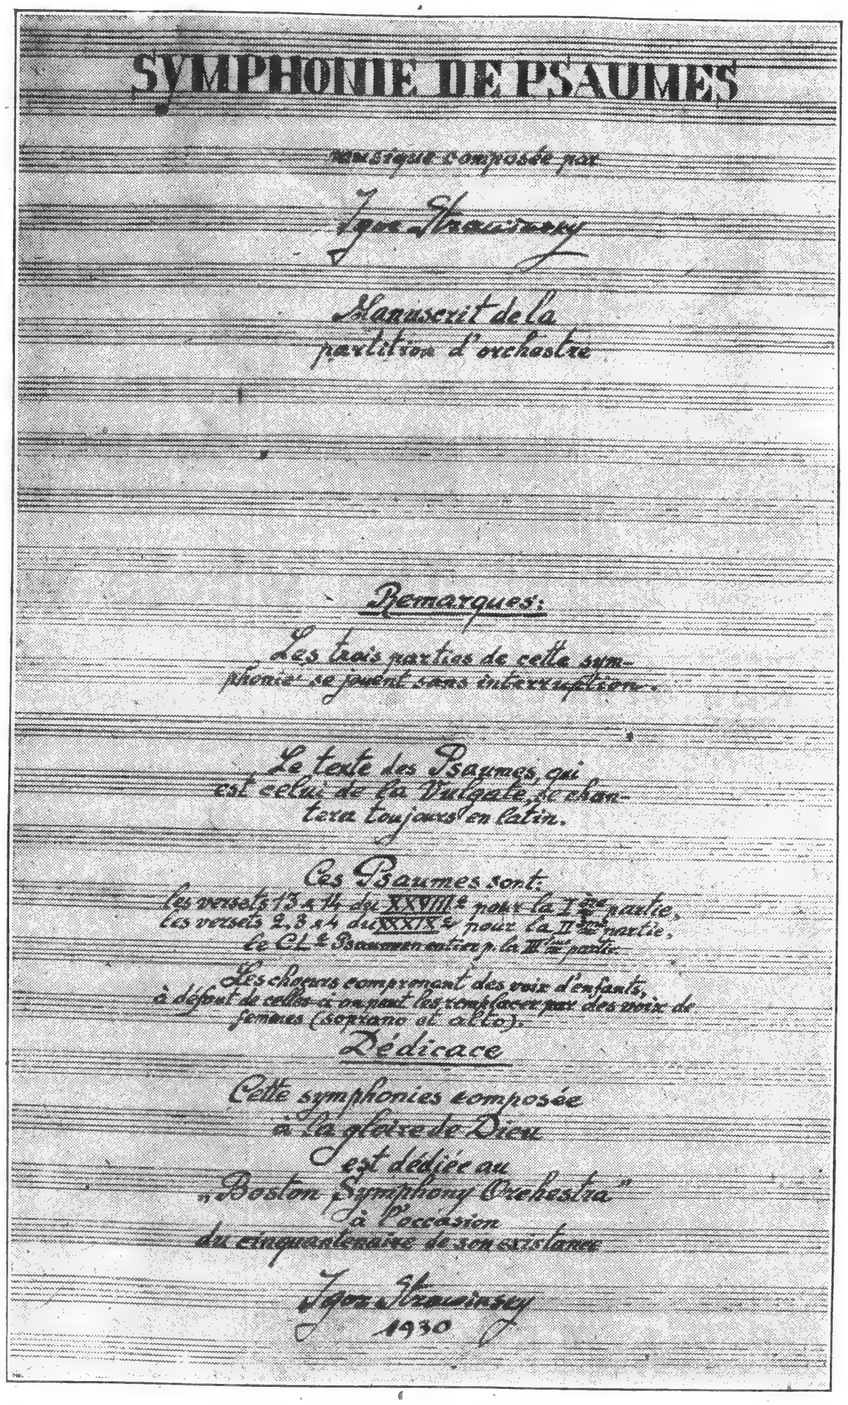
Laudate Eum in sono tubae
Laudate Eum in timpano et choro,
Laudate Eum in cordis et organo,
Laudate Eum in cymbalis bene sonantibus,
Laudate Eum in cymbalis jubilationibus.
Laudate Dominum, laudate Eum Omnis spiritus
Laudate Dominum, laudate Eum
Alleluia.

Praise ye the Lord.
Praise the Lord in His sanctuary: praise Him in the firmament of His power.
Praise Him for his mighty acts; praise Him according to His excellent greatness.
Praise Him with the sound of the trumpet: praise Him with the psaltery and harp.
Praise Him with the timbrel and dance: praise Him with stringed instruments and organs.
Praise Him upon the loud cymbals: praise Him upon the high sounding cymbals.
Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord.
Praise ye the Lord.

The three movements are thus seen to be clearascent from humble prayer to exultant praise.

Double Stravinsky -- New Symphony, New Piano-Piece -- Concerts -- Theaters



SYMPHONIE DE PSAUMES

Musique composée par

Igor Stravinsky

Manuscrit de la partition d'orchestre

Remarques:

Les trois parties de cette symphonie se jouent sans interruption.

Le texte des Psaumes qui est celui de la Vulgate, se chantera toujours en latin.

Ces Psaumes sont:
les versets 13 à 14 du XXVIIIe pour la Ire partie, les versets 2, 3 et 4 du XXIXe pour la IIme partie, le CLe Psaume entier p. la IIIme partie.

Les choeurs comprenant des voix d'enfants, à défaut de celles-ci on peut les remplacer par des voix de femmes (soprano et alto).

Dédicace

Cette symphonies composée à la gloire de Dieu est dédiée au
"Boston Symphony Orchestra"
à l'occasion
du cinquantenaire de son existence

Igor Stravinsky
1930

Stravinsky Prints His Own Title-Page (Colby)

From the Manuscript of the New Symphony in the Library at Symphony Hall

Stravinsky and His Sons

Left, Svietoslav, Pianist; Right, Feodor, Painter

view of the score brings assent. One would hardly say, however, that this kinship spells a "return to Chopin." The last movement, in addition to this flexible and fluid style, also makes a bow to the modern god, "jazz."

Monsieur Lapommeraye ends his review by saying that this "work may well prove to be one of the best of Stravinsky." Monsieur Schaeffer concludes his article: "The work represents the most powerful effort to which Stravinsky has as yet bent his will, but the appearance of mastery and at the same time freshness, remains undisturbed." In a new work "Stravinsky's Sacrifice to Apollo," Mr. E. W. White has this note on the "Capriccio."

It may be said in explanation of the last two sentences that the thesis of Mr. White's book seems to be that Stravinsky's greatest works are "The Rite of Spring" and Œdipus Rex"; that what went before the "Rite" was only plowing the ground for it: that, after a period of fumbling, Stravinsky's next works were really preparatory to "Œdipus": that he may now be on the way toward another masterpiece. Mr. White remarks: "Where in 'The Fairy's Kiss' the muse of Chaikovsky was Stravinsky's crutch, in the 'Capriccio' this crutch has been thrown away, and the convalescent walks, leaning only occasionally on the helping arms of Chopin and Liszt. The music is thin and fluent, but no so contrapntal as the earlier neo-classical works. The most successful movement is the finale . . . . It is obvious that Stravinsky is approaching another masterpiece (perhaps his promised setting of the Mass), which is due to arrive about 1933. Let us hope that 'The Fairy's Kiss' and the 'Capriccio' will then find full explanation, and Apollo the completest satisfaction." Can Mr. White be right? And is the Symphony of Psalms another link in the chain toward a possible master-setting of the Mass? Or can the new symphony itself be the awaited masterpiece, ahead of its prophesied time? We shall all be wiser concerning such matters on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening. But will we be wise enough to answer these questions? A. H. M.

May Divide Coast Into Lane Zone

Lending support to the proposed adoption of a system of double-track coastwise steamship lanes as a precaution against collisions in fog, Captain Eugene E. O'Donnell, president of the Eastern Steamship Lines, Inc., attended the meeting of the American Steamship Owners Association in New York yesterday when plans were drawn up for one-way ship lanes from Maine to the Virginia Capes. The plan is similar to one employed by the European Lines for several years.

The suggestion of double-tracks was first offered to steamship men by Dickinson N. Hoover, inspector-general of the United States Steamboat Inspection Service, following the Fairfax-Pittsburgh disaster off Scituate last June when forty-two lives were lost.

Local steamship officials, after several months of study, prepared charts of lanes with various distances between, but the preliminary hearing in Washington before the district committees were not in

THE THREEPENNY-BITS TURN

The woman in a Central London bank who cashed a cheque one day recently, and Others who assisted Vossahlik and Burke in the rescue were Ralph Dares, Ayres Chaves and William Warnock of Crescent Hill avenue, and Frederick Moriarty of Lowell street, and Frederick Moriarty Heights. The Rosa boys are sons of Mr. and Mrs. Amilio Rosa of 52 Rawson avenue, East Lexington.

The children were sliding on the ice about seventy-five feet off shore when the mishap occurred. Vossahlik was passing several companions and heard their cries for help. A human chain was formed, the young men lying on the ice, and John Rosa succeeded in grasping a hockey stick which Vossahlik held over the hole in which he and his brother were floundering. William, however, had not sufficient strength to hold to the stick and sank when a similar attempt to rescue him was made. Vossahlik then took off his overcoat and dived into the water. He located the child and swam to a place where the ice was strong enough to hold both. William Burke pulled them out, but the little boy was dead.

Appeals to Wealthy to Give to Welfare Chest

A special appeal to the wealthier communities of the State was issued last night by Mrs. Carl L. Schrader, chairman of the Massachusetts Welfare Chest, for distributed to worthy persons who are in ed. The chest committee has been appealing to the people of the State to send clothing, blankets and the like, to be all, 90 St. James avenue, or to their al women's committee on relief. Mrs.

An investigation of veterans hospitals e selections was proposed in the House.

The Judiciary Committee of the House ard witnesses on a bill to establish a ederal Commission to stabilize employment.

The Interstate Commerce Committee of e Senate today took up the bus regulaon bill.

The Seventy-Second Congress to a caucus ext Congress.

Washington about March 1 to formulate plans for an attempt to organize the ould call the Democratic members of te minority leader, has announced he

84

Dr. Koussevitsky will divide the "Chaikovsky Program," at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra, on Sunday, Dec. 28, for its Pension Fund, between the composer's Fourth Symphony and his Serenade for full string orchestra. The Serenade has not been played in Boston since Dr. Muck's time. In spite of the modest title, it runs in variegated movements, requiring a half hour for performance. The Fourth Symphony—needless to say—is a tour de force o the current season by conductor and orchestra both.

Mme. Matzenauer and Richard Crooks will be the alto and the tenor voices for Mahler's "Song of the Earth" at the Symphony Concerts next week. In the performances—the first in America—of Lourié's "Liturgical Sonata," a small picked choir from The Cecilia will assist. The Sonata runs in four chorales for orchestra with chorus.

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, will comprise Mozart's symphony in G minor; Stravinsky's Symphonie de Psaumes, written for the orchestra's jubilee, and his Capriccio for piano and orchestra, and Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E flat major orchestrated by Schoenberg. Stravinsky's Symphonie de Psaumes, for chorus and orchestra, will be performed twice. The Cecilia Society has been rehearsed by Arthur Fiedler. The text, taken from the Vulgate, includes extracts from the 39th and 40th psalms and the whole of the 150th. The Capriccio was first performed at Paris when Stravinsky played the piano part and Anvermet conducted. He visited Boston as conductor of Diaghilev's Ballet Russe. Mr. Sanroma will be the pianist in Boston. The Capriccio will be performed for the first time in the United States.

MUSICAL TREAT BY SYMPHONY

Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra Is Well Received

TRAVELER DEC. 20.

A striking and unusual program was presented yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall, in celebration, no doubt, of the Christmas season and of the return, after a brief absence, of Dr. Koussevitzky to the conductor's stand.

A blue-pencilled elimination placed Igor Stravinsky's new Symphonie de Psaumes, composed for the orchestra's 50th anniversary, only once on the program. It is permissible to wonder the purpose of the deletion. Some seasons ago, when Sept, Ils Sont Sept," another choral and orchestral work from another of the great Russian modernists, Prokofieff, had its first Boston performance, there was a repetition of the work on the same program.

Yesterday's audience was perhaps well pleased at the change, for the new work, despite its superb performance, was greeted apathetically. It becomes increasingly confusing to follow the complex measures by which the ultra-modernists arrive at their objective. Certainly it was bewildering yesterday.

The Cecelia chorus, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, sang understandingly and well, and yet a larger group of male voices would have been acceptable. The absence of a large body of stringed instruments which the composer excludes from the orchestration, lends a weird and eerie tone, thin at times, and at variance with the subject matter. Somehow the idea persists, even though it will not spell musical progress, that music that seeks inspiration in the spiritual, must be of more sustained harmony, more fluency, more tonal warmth.

The same composer's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, on the other hand, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, while lighter fare, proved a decided musical treat. Written in more humorous vein, animated, spontaneous, the Capriccio, also in its first Boston performance, found the composer and audience in more jovial mood. Mr. San Roma played his staccato measures, his rippling runs and his provocative rhythms with a clear and complete understanding of the delightful whole.

The Stravinsky was preceded by Mozart's G Minor Symphony, one of his greatest works, with the orchestra lending a splendid performance and a fine artistic discrimination to its somewhat sombre melodies.

To conclude there was an inspired reading of Schonberg's masterly arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E Flat, its swelling crescendos, and nobility of theme contributing a spiritual quality to the program.

The program will be repeated this evening, with next week's concert offering Lourie's Sonate Liturgique, in the form of four chorals, and Mahler's Song of the Earth, with Richard Crooks and Margaret Matzenauer as soloists.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston [illegible] orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Mozart symphony in G minor. Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus, composed for the jubilee of the orchestra; Capriccio for piano and orchestra (first time in this country); Bach, prelude and Fugue in E flat major for organ, orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg. The orchestra was assisted by the Cecilia Society, which had been trained by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler. The pianist was Mr. Sanroma.

It has been said that Stravinsky of late is deeply religious; that he may devote himself to the glorification of God in music. This rumor possibly arose from the fact that he dedicated his "Symphonie de Psaumes" to the orchestra, but composed it, as he states on the title page, "to the glory of God." And so Bruckner intended to dedicate his unfinished ninth symphony to the Lord God Omnipotent. But is this new symphony of Stravinsky the devout, more musical, more poetic, more imaginative than the compositions written in his supposedly pagan state? It surely is a less engrossing work, less interesting musically than the wordly Capriccio played yesterday and produced at Paris last December. Stravinsky should remember that he can show religious devotion in a ballet—even if Apollo is his hero—or in music that fascinates by jazz rhythms or by the suggestion of them. He might say with Sir Thomas Browne: "For even that vulgar and tavern music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion, and a profound contemplation of the first composer."

Stravinsky went to the Psalms for inspiration, choosing the sonorous text of the Vulgate Verses of the 39th (the number in the King James version). Verses that are a prayer, an entreaty: from the 40th in which the Psalmist rejoices that his cry was heard, that he was taken from the horrible pit and the miry clay; and the 150th in which the people are urged, and all things that have breath, to praise the Lord with the sound of all manner of instruments. His choice of instruments for these psalms is peculiar: no violins, no violas; but five flutes, many other wind instruments, a harp. He called for two pianos. Although the psalmist wished organs and high sounding cymbals to give praise, Stravinsky would not be the man to be so literal in his orchestration.

It is to be regretted that the repetition of this symphony did not take place as first announced, for much that was strange, almost foreign to the text might then have seemed pertinently eloquent. Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's organ prelude and figure might better have been omitted. Without the repetition the concert was too long as it was. The orchestral interludes are the most baffling portions of the symphony at the first hearing. They seem to be purposeless; hardly designed to put one in the mood for the following text; not a musical commentary on what has preceded. Was it the composer's endeavor to be Hebraic in his music? Hebraic in spirit, after the manner of Ernest Bloch—but not too reminiscent of the synagogue? The ending of the first psalm is indeed beautiful, originally beautiful; so is the treatment of the Alleluia later. And Stravinsky escaped the temptation of making the Psalm of Jubilation one prolonged shout: there is a most effective passage in it to be sung in a subdued manner, as by worshippers in awe of the majesty of the Lord. The symphony is of such importance that it demands a second hearing, one not too long deferred.

The Capriccio is rightly named: the capriciousness is enchanting. Here is an answer, if one were needed, to the charge that Stravinsky is not a melodist when he wishes; that he can write only patterns and rhythmic experiments: that his music is only cerebral. In this Capriccio he may at times entertain the spirit of the music hall, but there is no vulgarity: his tunes are not over-ripe. They incite spiritual gaiety, not a tapping of heels on the floor. His gaiety flags a little for a moment in the second section, but even then the diabolically clever use of orchestral instruments while the piano maintains a pleasingly monotonous figure is in itself a joy. Mr. Sanroma played the piano with a brilliance that was musical, never metallic: with the appropriate capriciousness of mood. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played as if inspired. And so yesterday the worldly Stravinsky triumphed as far as the audience was concerned over Stravinsky the devout.

There was an exquisite performance of Mozart's symphony, music and a performance of pure beauty. No detail was neglected; no one was unduly emphasized. Never have we heard for example, so charming an interpretation of the Trio in the Minuet.

Mr. Leopold Stokowski, who has tinkered some of Bach's compositions for orchestral use, explained his reasons a few days ago: "Bach was just a sleepy old man, but a wonderful musician, of course. The music appeals to me for what can be done with it. What matters is the result." No doubt Mr. Stokowski is pleased with the result of his tinkering. Herr Schoenberg has not commented on Bach's sleepiness; he looked on the organ piece as affording a study in orchestration. When Mr. Toscanini conducted Respighi's transcription of Bach's Passacaglia last week in New York Mr. William J. Henderson remarked: "Maybe it is commendable to dress Bach's organ music for orchestration lest it remain unheard by the multitude, but when listening to these metamorphoses this music lover cannot help remembering the line: 'I sometimes think 'twere better had I left the Lord alone.'"

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" (with alto voices) and Mahler's "Song of the Earth," symphony for tenor (Mr. Crooks), contralto (Mme. Matzenauer) and orchestra.

SYMPHONY HAS DAY OF STRAVINSKY

'Symphony of Psalms' and "Capriccio" Performed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitsky has recovered from his recent indisposition and, to judge by his conducting of yesterday afternoon, is none the worse and is, perhaps, even the fresher for his enforced vacation. Yesterday's was, indeed, in many ways a most diverting Symphony concert, thanks not a little to Mr. Igor Stravinsky's new and engaging custom of reminding us of composers more engrossing or entertaining than himself.

TWO STRAVINSKY NOVELTIES

There were two novelties by the Gallicized Russian, who is still the best "copy" among living composers; a "Symphony of Psalms" for orchestra and chorus, in which the Cecilia Society assisted, and a capriccio for piano and orchestra, the solo part of which fell to the exceedingly capable hands of Jesus Maria Sanroma.

The symphony is one of the many scores composed in honor of the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and had it been played last week, as originally planned, the performance in Symphony Hall would have been a world premiere. Instead the first performance took place at Brussels last Saturday; but at least yesterday's was the first performance in this country, as was that of the capriccio.

Reseats the Players

As texts for the choral portion of his symphony Stravinsky chose two verses from the 38th psalm, three from the 39th and the whole of the 40th. He scored his orchestral parts for wind and percussion instruments, two pianos, harp, 'cellos and basses. This made necessary a reseating of the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzy bade flutes, oboes and bassoons occupy the first chairs of the violins and placed the four horns where violas usually sit. Accordingly some in the audience had their first good look at a bassoon and must needs inquire of their musically more erudite neighbors just what those funny instruments were.

At the outset Stravinsky's so-called symphony arrested and gripped the listener, creating the impression that the composer had regained his old power of incisive utterance. There was a semi-barbaric wildness in the opening measures that recalled the psalms of Bloch and Honegger's "King David," although Stravinsky here speaks with his own voice.

Exactly Like "Tosca"

After that the music languished; the choral writing proved ungrateful and ineffective; there was little of the fervor, the elevation of mood that the words so plainly suggested.

Only when there was a definite and decided rhythm—and rhythm is one thing of which the present-day Stravinsky is still master—did the music regain its hold upon the hearer, until the end of the third psalm was reached and here Stravinsky has either recalled the finale of the first act of "Tosca" or miraculously hit upon the same idea. Whichever it was, it was a case of Puccini to the rescue. Like the beginning, the end of the symphony proved effective.

Seemingly the Cecilia chorus performed well its difficult and generally unrewarding task and there was much of applause when Dr. Koussevitzky brought forward Arthur Fiedler, who had trained the singers in this exacting music.

Bound to Be Popular

The new Capriccio, and in this it would seem to differ from the symphony, is bound to be popular with audiences. Although somewhat spotty and disjointed, perhaps in deference to its title, it is effectively written for the solo instrument and it is full of engaging if undistinguished and reminiscent and at times somewhat inexpensive tunes. There is suggestion in the first movement of the rhetorical and showy style of Weber and Chopin, though the second harks back to the early 18th century. There is more that is Weberish and Chopinesque in the finale, together with a good deal that misses neither vulgarity nor triviality, that recalls the type of music associated with cafe orchestras. The audience liked the Capriccio; and that one cynic could dub the piece "Ten Minutes with Old Friends" merely suggested a reason for its popularity. Again, there was applause that was redoubled when Dr. Koussevitzky escorted the young pianist to the podium and affectionately patted him on the shoulder.

Mozart's Symphony in G minor, in exquisite performance, began the concert and Schoenberg's elaborate orchestration of Bach's E-flat major organ Prelude and Fugue brought it to a sonorous close.

NEW STRAVINSKY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two new works by Stravinsky were performed for the first time in America at yesterday's Symphony concert. One of them, entitled "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra and chorus, is dedicated "To the Glory of God, and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the occasion of its 50th anniversary."

The postponement of the first performances here, caused by Dr Koussevitzky's illness, unexpectedly gave the "world premiere" to Brussels, where a performance was scheduled for Dec 13. The other is a Capriccio for piano and orchestra, first performed at Paris Dec 6, 1929.

A chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assisted in the "Symphonie de Psaumes." The pianist in the Capriccio was Jesus M. Sanroma. The concert began with Mozart's G-minor Symphony and ended with Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E flat arranged by Schoenberg.

Dr Koussevitzky at the last moment decided not to repeat the "Symphonie de Psaumes" on this week's programs. It will be performed again later in the season instead of twice at each of the same pair of concerts, as first planned.

The "Symphonie de Psaumes" is a setting for chorus and orchestra of verses from the 38th, 39th and the entire 150th Psalm, in the Latin text of the Vulgate. There are three movements. "Hear my prayer, O Lord, and give ear unto my cry" is the first line of the first of the three texts. "I waited patiently for the Lord, and He inclined unto me, and heard my cry," begins the second. "Praise ye the Lord, praise God in His sanctuary," exults the last.

Stravinsky has scored his music for an original grouping of instruments. He does not use violins or violas or clarinets. There are five flutes, four oboes, other wind and brass instruments, harp, two pianos, 'cellos and double basses.

This work is not a symphony in the sense of the term current since the time of Haydn. Stravinsky has remembered that in the 18th century "Symphonie," or more commonly "Sinfonia," was used for almost any work in one or more connected movements, regardless of formal structure.

One's impression at a first hearing is that the "Symphonie de Psaumes" is a masterpiece, and a masterpiece in a style somewhat different from anything Stravinsky has hitherto given us. Here he conceals rather than obtrudes the rhythmic complexities and subtleties that pervade so much of his work. Here, more markedly than ever before, he is able to express restrained emotion by musical means within the reach only of a master technician who makes his own rules.

One feared, looking over the text beforehand, that the setting of the 150th psalm, to which the rest of the work leads up, would prove a vulgar shout of triumph like some of the choruses in Gounod's oratorios, and the perorations of minor 19th century symphonic poems. On the contrary, the joy is mystical exultation, not pompous triumph, and there is no single big climax, but a wave-like succession of small climaxes. The end is quiet, but with no sensational pianissimo effect.

The real test of a new work is whether it stirs one's emotions. The "Symphonie de Psaumes" made a profound impression. Its originality is too great for it to have instant popular appeal. But one looks forward to a day when audiences will give it applause more unanimous than yesterday's applause was.

The Capriccio is a brilliantly written and thoroughly ingratiating piece of light music, also very ingeniously scored for orchestra. Its themes, rather surprisingly, are in the vein of Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" suite, or of the ballet music of Delibes. But the vivacity, the rhythmic ingenuities, the harmonic and contrapuntal effects display the fertility and the modernity of Stravinsky's talent.

One felt that the music ought to be banal, yet, somehow, it wasn't. The audience was enthusiastic over the Capriccio, recalling Mr Sanroma and Dr Koussevitzky again and again. Mr Sanroma had given a remarkably brilliant performance of the very exacting solo part, and quite deserved to be patted on the head for it publicly, as he was by the conductor.

Dr Koussevitzky and the performers acquitted themselves well in the Stravinsky. The Bach was eloquently played. In the Mozart symphony the tempo of the first movement was not, as it so often is, unduly rapid. On the whole, this was as good a reading of Mozart as Dr Koussevitzky has yet offered here, and an improvement over some he has given.

For next week Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" and a new "Sonate Liturgique" by Lourie fill the announced program.

P. R.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DEC. 20

Music -- Dance -- Films

Symphonic Day Of Stravinsky Doubly Tested

The "Symphony of Psalms" and the Caprice in First American Hearings

PARIS would have called yesterday's Symphony Concert a "Grand Gala Stravinsky." . . . Two pieces by the illustrious composer, each played for the first time in America; one, a "Symphony of Psalms," written for the Boston Orchestra to mark its fiftieth year; the other, a "Caprice for Orchestra, with Piano-Solo," of no more than twelve months' standing. A mixed choir from The Cecilia, schooled by Arthur Fiedler in an exacting music, assisted. The pianist was that paragon of young modernists, Mr. Sanromá. Only Igor himself was lacking. But why exchange the winter warmth of Nice for the winter cold of Boston at mid-December? Circumstance made amends. Recovered from illness, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted publicly for the first time in a fortnight. The orchestra rose to greet him; the audience prolonged the usual welcome. Plainly the recipient was touched. When, at the end of the Caprice, conductor and pianist were twice recalled and he led Mr. Sanromá upon his own platform, patting his head paternally the while, the house clapped them to the roof. Half an hour before, the "Symphony of Psalms" had received more plaudits than Mozart could win for his Symphony in G minor. Fifteen minutes later, Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, via Schönberg, also lagged appreciably behind. . . . Decidedly a Stravinskian day.

Nor was this all to entertain the matinée audience, which likes incidental pastimes. Within memory, a variation of the old parlor game of "Musical Chairs" has not been played so conspicuously and amusingly on the stage of Symphony Hall. Stravinsky not only employs a singular orchestra in the "Symphony of Psalms," using no violins or violas, asking five flutes, four oboes and such-like luxuries; he would also have it seated in prescribed fashion. Beside the conductor to the left were the arrayed flutes—Mr. Laurent in Mr. Burgin's chair; to the right the four horns, with Mr. Boettcher in the seat of honor. The violoncellos faced Dr. Koussevitzky; while between were squeezed the two pianos—one played by Mr. Sanromá, the other by Mr. Fiedler. At the back the Cecilian choir. All came on and all went off with rather less than the expected confusion. Even for the Caprice, with full orchestra around the pianist, there were a few changes of position. By this time Stravinsky equals Strauss or Ravel in sensibility to orchestral sound, and assiduity with orchestral details. . . . Decidedly an entertaining afternoon.

Two impressions rose pervasively and unmistakably from the "Symphony of Psalms." In it Stravinsky has achieved that final mastery for which most creative artists strive and to which few attain. The idea he would unfold, the emotion he would release, he can now convey to hearers with the utmost clarity, precision, intensity. The containing form seems the mold, complete and perfect, for the thought and the feeling. The conveying means and procedures fully accomplish the purpose. To neither mind nor ear do they interpose or overcloud. They do not hinder or dilute. In other words, Stravinsky has won a goal of the expressive arts—the exact correspondence of conception and conveyance. Throughout the "Symphony of Psalms," there is the thought, the mood, the emotion, in instant, exact, entire impact upon the audience. The thing has become the sound.

Second, this "Symphony of Psalms" is the work of a truly religious man, receiving the faith to the saints delivered, believing himself a child of God, contrite before his Maker; yea, smitten; yet upstanding to praise Him. Composers have been drawn to the offices and the hymns of the church, receiving from them impulses to music and to music dramatized. The high Roman mass, the mass of Requiem, with its visions of the Judgment and of Paradise, have been especial temptation. Pages of Scripture and pious poetries, so long as they be sufficiently graphic or mystical, have lured others.

Stravinsky is not of these. His "Symphony of Psalms" is born of a religious faith, deep-seated, devoutly held, honestly proclaimed. It is not the cosmic faith of Beethoven, the mystic faith of Franck, the dogmatic and hateful faith of d' Indy; still less the simple and devoted faith that possessed Bach in his churchly music and made him poet. Stravinsky's faith is grave, sombre, austere; it is spare and sinewy; by the evidence of the "Symphony of Psalms," fatalism tinges it, quasi-Russian or quasi-oriental, as the hearer chooses. But beyond doubting, it is the faith of a religious man.

In the "Rite of Spring," one of the Stravinskian summits, the composer wrought music of a primitive, pagan world. That world was embedded in darkness and haunted by dreads. It pushed away the darkness with the rites of tribal ceremony, shining before the high gods. The gods drew near and sacrifice abated fear. The folk looked around and sounded themselves. And lo! it was spring over the land and the waters; in their hearts as well. . . . "Œdipus Rex" is another Stravinskian summit. It matters little or nothing whether in it the composer harked back to Handel or would cultivate a neo-classicism. From himself, with the ancient tragedy of fate and desolation prompting, he engendered a music of rare economy and precision, austerity and power. The "Symphony of Psalms" may or may not prove a third Stravinskian summit. Time the measurer does not ply his rule at a reviewer's writing table a few hours after the birth of a music. Yet it is within belief that in the Symphony, the Stravinsky of "The Rite" and the Stravinsky of "Œdipus" are together climbing the ridge.

Consider, first the idiom and the facture of the "Symphony o Psalms." The music is persistently spare, sinewy, stripped. With equal persistence, it is economical and precise. Nothing seems obscure to the ear, even at first hearing. Nothing evades the eye as it traverses the staves. One may not add or subtract a note, set in or strike out an inflection, alter one timbre in the orchestra, one progression for the chorus, without distorting a musical texture, both close-knit and clear-knit. The idiom is unchangeably contrapuntal, yet incessantly fluid. There is line, rhythm—in the persistent play of figures in motion; but little harmonic color. Out of polytonality the dissonances are born, sharp-edged or hollow. There is fugal development in the second division. It is strict. Archaisms, especially in the choral parts, occur and recur—the archaisms of primitive directness and austerity rather than of historical or atavistic imagination. If the motivs, concise and bare almost to curtness, are suggestive of the liturgy of the Greek Church, then has that ritual been touched by the orientalisms to which early Russia was near and absorbent. Throughout there is full resource and complete mastery of orchestral and choral sonorities. Stravinsky composes as directly for an orchestra individualized, for a chorus massed, as did Strauss in prime.

Consider now the thought conceived, the emotion released. They are the expression of a single religious spirit. Yet it is fain to imagine and to compass them, as from the minds and hearts of massed men and women—the tribe, if the hearer sets store by the archaisms and orientalisms. Hence the extent and importance of the choral part. Being massed expression, Stravinsky would have it as impersonal as may be. Therefore the suggestion on the title page of children's voices—an impossible notion with so exacting a music.

The first division entreats the Lord God; bows in submission; rises in supplication. The music is persistently somber, save when it sharpens in pang or petition. The listener thinks back to the Introduction to the Second Part of the pagan "Rite"; finds here in degree, twenty years on and expressed in another idiom, its Christian counterpart. . . . Through the beginning, the second division waits in contrition—a fugue penetrated with a state of spirit. There is suspensive orchestral interlude; then gathering, upswelling sonorities. The Lord God hath put "a new song" into the minds and hearts of men. . . . The third division sings it. The orchestra begins in luminous and quasi-mystical evocation. Stravinsky touches beauty. The choral sonorities enter and upswell—"Praise ye the Lord in his sanctuary." Stravinsky releases power. "Praise Him with the psaltery and the harp . . . with the timbrel and the dance." The pulse of the music quickens; the timbres of orchestra and voices brighten; but the austerity does not much or long relax. The sequence of praise mounts, clanging deeper and higher; hushes itself with awe; poises at climax, the flight completed; sinks and stills.

The stark and sinewy musical texture has not altered: nor the directness, gravity, austerity, of thought, emotion and speech. Here sounds religious faith, stripped of upholsteries and gauds, of sentiment, almost of mystery. Yet of stark strength and darksome splendor when its voice, in contrition, in entreaty or in praise, ascends to the Lord who is God. Stravinsky reads in the Old Testament, not the New. Proclaiming an individual faith, the old tribal instinct seizes and possesses him. In this "Symphony of Psalms," hearers may suspect another height, possibly another summit. At the least, Stravinsky is again his intrinsic self.

Upon the Caprice, commentators, like the composer, have loosed the reins of fancy. One Parisian reviewer, quoted recently in these columns, imagined into it a fantastic, many-sided tale of Harlequin, life, nature. Another, reprinted in the program-book, finds it "touched with mystery," swarming "with phantoms and ghosts." Not to be behindhand, Stravinsky himself intimates that his cherished Chaikovsky was "the point of departure," apparent in "melodic material" and "certain orchestral effects." It is a pity that he did not mark them in the score. At first test, they are not apparent to the hearing ear. If there must be "a point of departure," some might suspect it to lie in a Lisztian neighborhood, with Chopin—for moments in the piano-part—not too far away. Believably, by the evidence of yesterday's performance, the Caprice is self-contained, self-sufficient, essentially Stravinskian.

Concerto-like, in the displayful day before the graver German masters would have the form symphonic, it consists of a piano and an orchestral part, as often interlaced as contrasted. Thereby, the Caprice leans upon the Russian, even the Chaikovskian, model.) The piano-part—presumably the "piano-solo" of one more fancy, the title—is virtuoso stuff, exacting, brilliant, making immediate impression. In the fashion, or the conviction, of his generation, Stravinsky counts the piano an instrument of percussion. It shall rhythm and ornament. It may juggle figures and play about in scales, arpeggios and every sort of arabesque. It may even color. But it shall not sing—for more than the passing moment. It may and does exchange witty dialogue with the orchestra; thrum at a listless figure when that orchestra bids it be still; toss out a hint of jazz and then forget it; run away into any fancy, any vagary that occurs to it—the composer prompting.

At moments, the orchestral part runs a little spare and hard in good Stravinskian fashion. It can prefer line rather than color, which is Stravinskian mode. Yet it is not insistently contrapuntal; while it has shameless moments in which it returns frankly to harmonic color. Withal it is astutely adept and tirelessly agile. Being contained in a Caprice, it can mix styles, permitting the strings to divert themselves in the ancient "concertino" groups; yet using the wind choir in full modernistic flavors. The moods are as mixed and changeful as the styles—wit, gayety, passing melancholy, petulance and brusquerie, dashes of cynicism; but everywhere and always an immense skill and an immense exhilaration. It may have been the work of many days. It sounds like a fantastic, masterful, irresistible, improvisation—Stravinsky at his play in a sunshine seldom shadowed.

The performances of both Symphony and Caprice were contrasted tours de force by orchestra and conductor. The orchestra achieved the difficult idiom of the Psalms; made it sound lean and linear, sombre and austere; passed readily to the fluidity and dazzle of the Caprice; played as though upon each several man the Stravinskian fortunes depended. Whatever qualities this review has attributed to Stravinsky emanated no less from Dr. Koussevitzky. He worked in understanding and sympathy. He accomplished by imagination, ardor and devotion. The Cecilian chorus was weak in men's voices; lacked depth and surge of tone; but better than usual it served. Seemingly Mr. Fiedler is teaching it the confidence that in time will sing out. Mr. Sanromá, by inclination as well as practice, was virtuoso with every modernism. . . . After the concert of this evening, Mozart's Symphony and Schönbergian Bach may have their turn.

H. T. P.

Stravinsky Returns to Himself

By L. A. SLOPER.

WE HAVE complained so often of the unsatisfactory musical behavior of Igor Stravinsky that it was pleasant on the afternoon of Dec. 19 to find him showing signs of grace. The Boston Symphony Orchestra then performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, for the first time in America, two of the two latest compositions by the most conspicuous of the musical modernists: the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which was heard in Paris a year ago, and the "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra and chorus. This latter work, says the title page of the score, was "composed to the glory of God and dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of its existence." It was to have had its first performance anywhere at the concerts of the Boston orchestra a week earlier. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, was then resting from the labors of the Washington Festival, and the honor of the first performance went to the Brussels Philharmonic Society, which played the "Symphonie" on Dec. 13.

Neither the Capriccio nor — we should say after a single hearing — the "Symphonie" is destined to occupy a pedestal beside that of the "Sacre," but the gratifying thing about them both is that they seem to indicate a renewal of the composer's individuality. Since the "Sacre" Stravinsky had seemed to be concerned mainly—except in the "Noces"—with "returning" to one or another classic composer: Bach or Handel, or even Tchaikovsky. With each of these side-trips he produced an impressive piece of propaganda accompanied by an inconsiderable piece of music. The only one of these excursions which yielded much booty was that to Handel, which resulted in "Œdipus Rex." That too, except for an aria, which was sung in Boston by Margaret Matzenauer, seemed more reminiscence than invention. Now Stravinsky appears to have doubled back out of—we hope—the last of these musical culs-de-sac.

It is possible to believe that one hears in the Capriccio echoes of Rimsky-Korsakoff and even of Rameau—but also of "Pétroushka." It has charm and wit, achieved by simplicity and economy of means. It was played dazzlingly by J. M. Sanromá and the orchestra.

This simplicity and economy are carried over into the "Symphonie," which is so-called because the composer so decrees. It consists of a setting of verses from the Psalms in three uninterrupted movements, opening with a supplication, proceeding to a climax of glorification and closing on a note of peace. The text is taken from the Vulgate and is sung in Latin; the verses are to be found in the King James Version in Psalms XXXIX, XL and CL. The musical scheme is elaborately contrapuntal and polytonal; but if there is no indication of concession to conservative ears, neither is there any sense of striving after effect. The music seems on a first hearing to have been written in the composer's own musical language, as the best musical expression he could contrive of the meaning of the text. The orchestration is unusual, with violins and violas discarded and great emphasis upon woodwinds: five flutes, four oboes, English horn, three bassoons and double-bassoon, four horns, and so on. The rhythmic pattern is apparently less complicated than that of the "Sacre" or of the "Noces," but it is vigorous and appropriate. There is involved contrapuntal writing in the woodwind at the beginning of the second movement which recalls the opening of the second part of the "Sacre;" indeed, the composition bears the mark of the individual Stravinsky, working on a devotional theme. It was well performed by the orchestra and the Cecilia Society chorus trained by Arthur Fiedler.

The concert opened with a superb performance of Mozart's G minor Symphony and closed with a translucent exposition of Schönberg's transcription of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat.

NEW WORKS BY STRAVINSKY ARE HEARD

By MOSES SMITH

Serge Koussevitzky returned to conduct the Boston Symphony in yesterday's concert, after more than a week of illness, and forthwith the elaborate 50th anniversary ceremonies were resumed.

Specifically, the orchestra, with the help of the Cecilia Society Chorus (trained by Arthur Fiedler) performed Stravinsky's new "Symphonie de Psaumes," composed for the occasion. Curiously, this latest work of one of the greatest composers in the world was performed yesterday for the first time in America, but not in the world, for Brussels heard it last week.

The same composer's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra was also played yesterday for the first time in America, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Although but a year separates the creation of these two scores, they are centuries apart in style. The Capriccio is a continuation of Stravinsky's neo-classic style, with which he has been pre-occupied for the last decade, though there are more than traces of nonconformist diablerie. The Symphony, on the other hand, employing three psalms from the Vulgate for texts, is a return to the barbaric manner of "Sacre de Printemps" that revolutionized the world of music. Although it is unsafe to express such an opinion after a single hearing, Stravinsky seems to us to have been influenced here by the work of his junior contemporary and countryman Prokofiev.

Mozart's Symphony in G minor began, and Schonberg's arrangement of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat ended, a concert about which much might be written.

Conductors Again

With Timely Hint That Each Listener Is Entitled to Notions About Them

WITH Arturo Toscanini conducting in Philadelpha and Leopold Stokowski in New York, notions about celebrities of the baton are to the musical scene just now what the Spirituals are to "The Green Pastures." The conductor who can do no wrong and the conductor who can do no right are by no means new upon this scene, and the same sorts of bias for and against men who contrive to transcend routine probably will agitate these airs long after all present personalities have vanished and television has combined with radio to bring their predecessors into the households of millions—front view, at that. How much more important personality may be then than now, how much more the gleaming eye or the glittering smile, how much more the cut of an afternoon coat or the sweep of an arm may figure in the making of mass notions is conjectural to a degree, but one thing is certain: conductors are going to have to learn to sing better or give up singing entirely.

Add television to radio so that listeners who look up from their soup to discover what's wrong with the English horn find out that it is only the dirigent ah-ing along with the solo instrument in the voice of a crow, and it will become evident that the technique of ah-ing, as of interjecting pum-pum, will be scarcely second to the technique of holding the baton. Mr. Stokowski seems to have decided to dispense with the baton. Perhaps, in due time, conductors of equal individuality will be persuaded to dispense with their coloratura. Either that or radio engineers will find some means of eliminating it, along with static; perhaps by absorbing it in some new amplification of the Theremin machine. If conductors must sing, composers at least ought to be permitted to put in their own markings with respect to when to use the chest voice and when falsetto.

The legends of the perfect performance persists, in spite of broken batons and an occasional smashed cabinet. There may be reason to suspect that nothing annoys Mr. Toscanini more than to be applauded with all the customary fervor, perhaps more, at the end of a work in which there has been raggedness of attack and in which some solo passage has been muffed altogether—as we are informed by a dependable musician (who was following his score) happened in the last Brooklyn concert of the Philharmonic.

With respect to Toscanini, opinion has fairly well crystallized two ways. Either he is equally supreme in everything he undertakes or he is to be regarded as having one variable if not vulnerable deficiency, that of the more literary or philosophical music of the German romantics. Only a few can seriously entertain any such idea as that expressed in a recent magazine article, that he has but one great gift, that of a phenomenal capacity for beating time. Among notions, this is one as reckless as some that have been spoken out with respect to Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky. Frequently we have heard it said of certain conductors that they could not read an orchestral score. Sometimes, when they have been called upon to conduct for soloists, we have observed that they were more than a little busy reading something. And if conducting is for these men primarily a matter of memory and motions, it is rather difficult to understand why memory and motions would not have had their usual effect when there was a soloist to keep an eye on, without the additional strain of turning the pages and pretending to follow music the conductor couldn't read.

Notions like these are passed on from one era to another, irrespective of the men who happen to be at the top. But it is always about the men who are at the top that they are told. The number of successful conductors who have not been good musicians is truly amazing; indeed, if all these notions as to the lack of fundamental musicianship could be chalked opposite the great names of the past in orchestral music, we might be led to conclude that to be a musician is to be no conductor; and that, perhaps, after all, there is a reason for conductors taking so universally to singing.

OSCAR THOMPSON

[Reprinted from the New York Evening Post]

Old Music Hall

Dec 26

An Off-Night for the Symphony

The Crowd: Get on to the Dude Comin' in with His Girl. Doorkeeper: Them Tickets Ain't No Good. The Lady and the Gentleman: What! Is This Not the Symphony Night? Doorkeeper: Don't Know Nawtin' 'Bout Sinfonus. We're Runnin' a Sluggin' Match

(Cartoon of The 'Nineties in the Exhibition at Symphony Hall from the Archives of the Boston Orchestra)

Programs of the Week

Dr Koussevitzky plans to repeat at this week's Symphony concerts Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," which he introduced here two years ago. This time the important contralto solo part will be sung by Mme Matzenauer.

Globe Dec 2

and not by Mme Cahier, who sang it two years ago, as she had done at the first performances in Germany before the war. Matzenauer was the soloist at the first pair of Symphony concerts this season, the anniversary program. Has anybody ever been soloist before twice in the same season? The tenor soloist will be Richard Crooks, who recently made his American operatic debut in Philadelphia. Mr Crooks has for some years past been admired in Boston concert halls.

The novelty on this week's Symphony program is a work entitled "Sonate Liturgique," by a young Parisian composer, Lourie, none of whose music has yet been played publicly in Boston. This piece is in four sections, for orchestra and chorus. The movements are entitled "Sequentia," "Cantus Passionis," "Prosa," and "Horae Passionis." It is not clear why he calls it a sonata.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr Koussevitzky, is offering next Sunday afternoon a Tchaikovsky program, at an extra concert of which the proceeds will go to its pension fund. Here is a chance for nonsubscribers to buy single tickets and listen to the orchestra in music in which its conductor excels all others. There are very few single tickets to be had for concerts in the subscription series, all of which are practically sold out for the season. But for the pension fund concert next Sunday subscribers and nonsubscribers are on an equal footing. It will be first come, first served at the box office.

Koussevitsky Plans of Symphony Orc

Post Dec. 21

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

According to Dr. Koussevitsky's present plans, but two pieces will make the Tchaikovsky programme at the concert which the Symphony Orchestra will offer in aid of its Pension Fund next Sunday afternoon. These compositions are the Serenade for string orchestra, unheard here in its entirety for several seasons, and the Fourth Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitsky recently brought to such notable performance at the Symphony concerts.

* * * *

The present hard times have hit the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, which has been forced to reduce its personnel by some dozen players. A campaign is now in progress to procure enough subscribers to the concerts to crowd the Curran Theatre, where they are given. In Boston we may proudly state, the problem is rather one of finding accommodations for all who wish to hear our Symphony concerts.

T

Her Dec 27 MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, comprised Arensky's Variations for string orchestra on a theme of Tchaikovsky's and Mahler's "Song of the Earth," which was performed here for the first time on Dec. 7, 1928. The singers in the latter composition were Madame Matzenauer, contralto, and Richard Crooks, tenor. Their predecessors in Boston were Madame Charles Cahier and George Maeder.

Tchaikovsky was fond of Arensky. Perhaps for this reason he scolded him for choosing "La Dame aux Camelias" as the subject of a Fantasia. He asked Arensky how an educated musician—when there were Homer, Shakespeare, Gogol, Pushkin, Dante, Tolstoi and others—could feel any interest in the history of a demi-mondaine adventuress, "which even if written with French cleverness, is in truth false, sentimental and vulgar." He wrote him a long letter. Did Arensky repay his friend's interest by writing these Variations? He had an example, for Tchaikovsky after Nicolas Rubinstein's death, wrote a Piano Trio in memory of the man who at first could see nothing in Tchaikovsky's piano concerto in B flat minor, and was so scornful that he wounded the sensitive Peter to the quick.

Arensky took for his theme the familiar legend of the Christ child, which as a chorus has been sung here more than once. In its original form it is one of the 16 children's songs composed by Tchaikovsky in 1883. The variations are for the most part amiably melancholy, as befits the content of the verses. There are sets of variations in which the chief interest of the hearer lies in detecting the theme itself. Then he smiles, and says to himself: "Ha, ha! now I've got you!" Such variations are to be avoided, no matter whose name is signed to them. Either Arensky's inventive faculty was not strong enough, or he had a heart and allowed the hearer the pleasure of being able to hum the tune even to the end. These variations were beautifully played, so charmingly that they had a significance which otherwise might have been wanting.

The singers in Mahler's symphony sang in German. It would be interesting to know whether Hans Bethge, who selected and translated these Chinese poems did with them as Fitzgerald treated Omar Khayyam, amplified, rejected, introduced lines of his own. Some of the lines seem to be more German in their sentiment and sentimentalism than Chinese.

The cycle is frankly pessimistic. Life as well as death is gloomy. As the old song by Thomas Jordan has it, speaking of the "beautiful Bit":

"Whose lightness and brightness doth cast such a splendor
That none but the stars
Are thought to be fit to attend her,
Though now she seems pleasant and sweet to the sense,
Will be damnably mouldy a hundred years hence."

But, brethren, there's the wine cup to console one, says Chinese Bethye, and the poets he calls on felt as the Third Kalandar in the wild Arabian tale: "And the bowl went merrily round. Hereupon such gladness possessed me that I forgot the sorrows of the world one and all and said, 'This is indeed life; Oh, sad that 'tis fleeting!'"

Mahler in the music for the drinking songs is boisterous, perhaps appropriately, and has given the tenor a muscular task, for he must sing against a raging orchestra which no conductor can subdue and, at the same time, do justice to Mahler's intention. Mr. Crooks strove courageously and for the most part successfully in making himself heard. When the composer was compassionate, the vocal art and the intelligence of the singer were more clearly revealed. When Mahler, like John Ford, wrote in deliberately doleful dumps to convey the message of the poets—and he himself in his later years was something of a Dismal Jemmy—he found out music that has genuine emotion, music that while it is charged with sadness, yet is so full of beauty, even serenity that it breathes resignation—not despair. Man goes to his long home—but the distant skies are blue; the heart is at peace while it is waiting. Mme. Matzenauer was an eloquent interpreter, and to the contralto Mahler gave his more inspired, also his more personal music.

As for the work as a whole, it shows Mahler at his best and at his worst; now with great ideas, now with trivialities in thought and expression; now almost childlike, now super-sophisticated; now startlingly original, now remembering in orchestral measures the manner of illustrious contemporaries. The orchestral performance, no matter how eccentric, how extravagant at times is the instrumentation, was of the highest order. Mahler, who was himself a great conductor, would have applauded Dr. Koussevitzky. The audience was deeply impressed.

The performance will be repeated tonight. Next week Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" (first time here), Walton's viola concerto (Mr. Lefranc, solo viola, first time in the United States), Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

Y, DECEMBER 27,

SYMPHONY PERFORMS A MAHLER

"Song of the Earth" Fills Greater Part of Concert

Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was not exactly the conventional holiday programme that Dr. Koussevitzky offered at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon: Mahler's "Song of the Earth," that filled the greater part of it, is, for all its occasional lightness of mood, a solemn music, although Dr. Koussevitzky did, on second thought, defer till next week Lourie's "Liturgical Sonata," that has to do with Good Friday, and substitute for it Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky.

WITH TWO VOICES

But if there was little yesterday that was gay or festive, the audience seemed not to mind. Arensky's music, slight but graceful, marked by an unobstrusive scholarship and at times as Tchaikovskian as though the elder composer had written variations as well as theme, quite obviously pleased. And whether the applause after the intermission was for Mahler's music or for Margaret Matzenauer and Richard Crooks who sang it, and for conductor and orchestra, it was unmistakably 'fervent, especially at the end when there were many recalls and players as well as singers and leaders must needs bow their acknowledgments.

In the face of Dr. Koussevitzky's eloquence with Mahler's score it is almost ungrateful to complain of his cavalier treatment of Mr. Crooks in the first of the six songs that make this so-called symphony, "The Drinking Song of Earthly Woe." Granted that the composer with his large orchestral apparatus and his indication "Allegro Pesante" is through most of this movement inconsiderate of the singer, Dr. Koussevitzky by his zeal made matters worse. At least Mr. Crooks, unlike Mr. Meader who sang in the first Boston performance of Mahler's monumental work two years ago, was not completely overpowered and obliterated in the stormier passages; but it was a pity that he must so force and strain his beautiful voice in order to make his presence felt. And even then, though the voice was heard, the words of the text were often lost.

His Song "Of Youth"

In Mr. Crooks two remaining opportunities, the third song, "Of Youth," and the fifth, "The Drunkard in Spring-Time," both composer and conductor were kinder to him; and of his singing of them nothing but praise may be written. The gaiety of the one, the abandon and the occasional poetry of the other he both sensed and transmitted. Nothing that Mr. Crooks has done here has so redounded to his credit.

In that she must step into the shoes of Mme. Cahier, who sang this music of Mahler so memorably in the performances of December, 1928, Mme. Matzenauer was faced yesterday with a difficult task of which she acquitted herself with the artistry, and the intelligence, not to mention the sheer beauty of vocal tone, that were but to be expected from her. That she could sing her long and taxing part without the aid of notes proved of itself that her acquaintance with the music was by no means a superficial one. Furthermore, like Mme. Cahier before her, Mme. Matzenauer entered into the performance of this "Lied von der Erde" in the manner of one taking part in a rite.

Music Notes and Comment

Dec 28 Globe

Dr Koussevitzky has changed the program for the pension fund concert this afternoon. He has substituted for the Tchaikovsky suite originally announced the new piano capriccio of Stravinsky, which greatly delighted the Friday audience the other day at the first Boston performance. This piece is in a style which Stravinsky himself says was suggested by the music of Tchaikovsky, not aggressively modern at all. For good measure two Wagner excerpts have been added.

The soloist in the Stravinsky capriccio today will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, the brilliant young Porto Rican pianist well known in this city, where he received most of his musical education.

Again Mahler And His "Song Of the Earth"

With Mme. Matzenauer and Richard Crooks to Give It Voice

IT was in December—two years ago—that Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Mahler's "Das Lied vonder Erde" to Boston. In accordance with his wise custom, a work once introduced, remains not on the shelves to gather dust, but is brought forth for repeated hearings. And again at the close of 1930 a December audience was the gainer. Neither of the soloists of that first Bostonian performance returned yesterday. This time one heard Madame Matzenauer and Mr. Crooks. To precede Mahler, itself almost a novel piece, Dr. Koussevitzky brought a set of variations—as yet unplayed at these concerts—from Arensky, upon a song of Chaikovsky, "A Legend," of the childhood of Christ.

Gustav Mahler, having completed his tremendous eighth symphony, and, as some think, with premonition that he would not have long to live, set to work upon "Das Lied von der Erde." With the ninth and the incomplete tenth it has often been called Mahler's swan song. For "The Song of the Earth" he found a collection of old and new Chinese poems which Hans Bethge had put into German verse. From this collection Mahler selected seven poems that he thought beautiful, that expressed the melancholy, the pessimism, the brooding, the cynicism, finally the attained peace of the state of mind in which he found himself. Like the Biblical writer of "All is Vanity," Mahler through Chinese poets and the German Bethge, finds life a mockery, his "soul's gardens desolate"; bitterly contrasts the less than a hundred years of man's life with the endlessness of eternity; laments that those short years are but filled with sorrow.

Better the goblet of wine, better forgetfulness in pleasure, for, "Dark is life, is death." He continues through a plaint of loneliness, of the weariness of his life, for he now views that life in its autumn season. He reviews life, he thinks of youth, playful, happy youth; he recalls beauty, beauty that calls youths and maidens to each other. From the promises of the springtide of life he turns away. It has had its disappointments, it has brought disillusion. Again to benumbing pleasure. The "Drunkard in Spring" lives only to drink and to sleep. Let him drink till he can drink no more; waken him only for more of his one solace. And finally, a soul that has worked its way through disappointments to lasting peace: "My heart is at rest and awaits its hour." He peers into eternity. All space about him seems of endless azure. He would open the veil of the future. "Eternally . . . Eternally. . . ."

—

For a single mood thus many-sidedly developed the music is fit vehicle. Mahler is assuredly giving of himself. For all this is more than artist at play (or work) with his materials. It is the artist baring his soul, revealing the inmost recesses of the self, going down more deeply than mind can go, delving into the things the heart cherishes—that hearers may experience a rarely touched emotion—if one questions at all, in this resulting sea of beauty, it is whether this difficult mood of melancholy, and of passion tinged with melancholy, may with wisdom be asked to endure for an almost uninterrupted sixty-five minutes. Only once, in the poem of Youth, does the composer give relief from this single mood. For the rest, darksome elegiac brooding. Yet, who may cavil, when sustained beauty results, such as the beauty of "The Song of the Earth?"

Witness now the music which Mahler has written for this symphony of brooding upon the vanities of life, of peace and rest attained at the last. Mahler is no modernist, though he wrote when the innovations of Debussy had all been made, when that composer had written most of the best of his works; though he wrote just before Stravinsky burst upon the scene to become a world-figure. He is not of this innovating movement. He is not a "reformer" in musical style and musical language. The musical problems that interest him are problems of form rather than of style—but that is another story. Though not of the innovators he nevertheless eschews the rhetoric of the romantics—in his day all the world other than that part which had gone into the Debussy camp. Economical, clear and clean as a whistle, his style is strangely prophetic of the stripped and spare manner of the later modernists. Now and again it approaches the tenuous outlines of chamber music. Of the trappings of Wagnerianisms only one item remains: a single motif runs through the entire six pieces; and that motif is more in evidence to the eye of the studious analyst than to the ear of the hearer—say on a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening. Otherwise, in the scheme of the Mahlerian symphony, with weightiest movement at the end rather than at the beginning, "Das Lied von der Erde" follows and unites with the text of the seven poems cast into six pieces.

—

Like a challenge horns fling out the motif that introduce the ardors and the ambitions of the verses of the "Drinking Song of Earthly Woe." In defeat all sinks back in each verse with the refrain "Dark Is Life, is death." If horns were a challenge in the poem, they were also a challenge yesterday to the abilities of Mr. Crooks. Dr. Koussevitzky laid on and spared not. Into the symphonic tutti the voice of Mr. Crooks plunged, daring to pit itself against the mass of sound. Mr. Meader, two years ago was utterly unable to cope with it. Mr. Crooks yesterday answered it in kind. Standing with feet wide apart, singing with all the might his by no means spare body found itself able to project into his tones, he conquered in this most gruelling test. His voice retained its just place in the ensemble, lost not in quality, was the voice of the music of Gustav Mahler as well as of the person of Richard Crooks.

Wistfulness, the matter that impressionism is made of, is the substance (if that is not too solid a word) of which the second poem is compounded. Jade-dust and lotus flowers are the background for the loneliness of the poet's spirit. The mood Mahler—and with him Madame Matzenauer (singing, as is her wont at symphony concerts, from memory), renders exquisitely. Witness the greyness of the music as these artists express the infinite weariness of the poet; the peace as they sing and play of restful abiding place; the warmth of voice and orchestra when the words bring them to the "sun of love."

Again: Mr. Crooks sings of youth. Playful is the music, picturing an Oriental scene (for these poems are Chinese, after all). Koussevitzkian orchestra and tenor are as one in these playfully jolly measures. . . . "Beauty" falls to the lot of Madame Matzenauer. The one departure from the prevailing mood of the piece has been accomplished. The exquisiteness of the previous song is resumed. Yes, beauty is picturing beauty.

Comes the "Drunkard in Spring." The music grows heavier. The pessimism and the tragedy continue through the recklessness born of despair. Mahler has of course resisted the obvious temptation to become openly realistic. A certain abandon he allows himself, no more. In the frame of the work as a whole this song is cast. As Mahler wills so Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Crooks play and sing. Finally the music of farewell, with Madame Matzenauer again singing. Fitting conclusion, outcome of ineffable peace — though Mahler might have used the pruning shears to advantage. But one will never forget the final measures. What "eye hath not seen nor ear heard," Mahler approaches more nearly than it is given to mortals usually to attain. "Ewig, . . . ewig . . ." the words linger, and reviewing stammerings are powerless to do more than suggest the emotion as the listener finds himself on the brink of the other world. The tension of those final words and sounds over, applause came. Not tentatively, but in volume. Of bowing and acknowledgements there seemed no end, until all on the platform were on their feet.

Of Arensky's little preluding variations there is little need to go into detail. The melody which is theme is charmingly expressive. Through half a dozen of variations it is modestly and pleasingly decorated. Never is the simple tune even partially lost sight of. Arensky is exactly the composer to vary Chaikovsky. The strings of the Boston Symphony yesterday were perfect voice for both.

A. H. M.

— Yes, leisure is great—provided you know how to use it. Those who would know best what to do with their leisure usually never have any. [The Open Road

Music

Mon Dec 27

Boston Symphony

Two numbers constituted the program for the tenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Boston, Dec. 26 and 27. They were Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky and Mahler's "Song of the Earth."

The Arensky item presumably was Dr. Koussevitzky's seasonal gesture, since the Tchaikovskyan song which provides the theme is a setting of verses by Pletscheev on a legend of the childhood of Jesus. Unfortunately, the program book did not contain this information, probably because the decision to include this number was made too late to permit of changing the analytical notes. This work for string orchestra is familiar, we believe, to many audiences, but we do not recall its having been played before in Symphony Hall. One carried away the impression that the theme —which is lovely, very Russian, quite Tchaikovskyan and rather liturgical—is superior to the variations, which are workmanlike but also workaday. The piece served nevertheless to display the superb tone and flexibility of the string choirs.

The Mahler opus had been heard two years ago at these concerts for the first time in Boston. The present hearing renewed the feeling that the composer is entitled to our respectful admiration for his work, even while it again reminded us forcibly of his debt to his predecessors. Unquestionably there are passages of great beauty in this work, both for voices and for instruments—as in Part II and elsewhere. There are also periods of great tediousness—as notably in the orchestral interlude between the last two songs. Mahler surely allowed himself more time than was strictly necessary for the conveyance of his ideas.

Richard Crooks permitted us to appreciate the qualities of the tenor solo parts as we had not been able to enjoy them at the previous Boston hearing. Besides possessing an excellent voice, well trained, Mr. Crooks has musical intelligence. And from a fine lyric tenor he has developed into a quite heroic singer. His rendition of Parts III and V won enthusiastic applause. That splendid artist, Margaret Matzenauer, was the contralto soloist. Like Mme. Charles Cahier (the original singer in this part) she sang without notes or words, thereby enhancing the dramatic quality of her contribution. We have heard Mme. Matzenauer in better voice, but with her rare artistry she achieved a splendid performance.

L. A. S.

Concert-Chronicle

Hans Dec 26

Brussels before Boston

AS originally arranged, Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" was to be heard for the first times at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (to which it is dedicated) on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 12 and 13. The illness of Dr. Koussevitzky deferred production here until Dec. 19 and 20. Meantime the Philharmonic Society of Brussels had played and sung it on Saturday Dec. 13, as item in a "Stravinsky Festival." Next day the correspondent of the London Morning Post telegraphed:

> This new work is far from being composed according to the usual plan of a symphony; for the development of themes seldom occurs except in the third movement. The three parts of the symphony—the Prelude, the Double Fugue, and Symphonic Allegro—are nevertheless well balanced. In spite of the capital rôle played by the human voice, it is not a lyric work like a cantata. The oboe accompaniment in the vocal scene of the Prelude provides the leitmotif on which the entire work is built. The "Symphony of Psalms" has great power and sonority, which were well brought out by the orchestra and the chorus of the Philharmonic Society. The work was conducted by Ernest Ansermet with such understanding that one had the impression at certain moments of listening not to human voices and to string and wind instruments, but to the powerful voice of an organ.
>
> The program also included the Capriccio for piano and orchestra in which Stravinsky himself played the piano. The rhythmical formulæ of the Capricco and its curious disharmonies form a study full of movement and life. . . . The Queen, who attended the concert, called Stravinsky to the royal box, and congratulated both the composer and Mr. Ansermet; while composer, conductor, singers, and orchestra received a great ovation from the large audience.

—

Incidents and Prospects

Stravinsky's "Caprice," with Mr. Sanromá as pianist, will be played for the first time in New York on the next visit of the Boston Orchestra, at the concert of Thursday, Jan. 8. At the following Saturday matinée Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat Prokoffiev's new Symphony, heard at Symphony Hall a month ago.

Concert-Chronicle

Mahler's Orchestra

Hans Dec 29

WHILE Mahler's "Song of the Earth," repeated in notable performance at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, is still sounding in many ears, it is worth the space to reprint from the Manchester Guardian a discerning paragraph about his handling of the orchestral voices. It was written a fortnight ago, by Neville Cardus, principal reviewer for The Guardian, after the first performance, in Manchester, of "The Song of the Earth."

"Mahler, in his ripest works, seems to have anticipated the orchestral writers of our own day by his insistence not on a mass of tone, but on significant individual colors and contrasts. 'The Song of the Earth' and his Ninth Symphony have little or no texture in the ordinary sense of the term. Most of the instruments are allotted music which thrives on their own individuality. Mahler is fond of a wide spacing of his parts, and the effect aimed at is not a rich canvas but rather a sort of orchestral silverpoint. The thick scoring of the nineteenth century romantic writers does not call for a perpetual sense of responsibility in orchestral players. They can conceal certain insensibilities of style under the general mass of tone. Mahler, idealist that he was, expected each of his players to possess the subtle and flexible technique of a soloist and the imagination of an artist. Music for him had to be rendered full of meaning by the most skilful and pointed expression; his art is an art of nuance.

"You have only to study Mahler's directions in his scores to understand how much he distrusted the professional instrumentalists' ability as a class to distinguish between notes and music. He tells his players bar by bar what they are to do. Maybe he distrusted, also, the power of his own art to say all that he had in his mind to say. He certainly had reason for occasional doubts about his music, goodness knows. But if he was a failure, how great was his fall! He went straight to heaven, we can be sure, and is now walking the Elysian fields—with Bruckner. Perhaps he will find his ideal orchestra there."

—

Wagner, Chaikovsky And New Stravinsky

As a Pension Fund Concert With Sanroma for Soloist Sets Them Forth

JUST as certain artists have their own particular publics, so the Pension Fund concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have their own programs. On them the works of Wagner and of Chaikovsky have always been prominent. They have, upon occasion, consisted entirely of the works of the one chosen composer. Yesterday both were represented on a single program. One of Wagner's masterpieces, the prelude to "Lohengrin" stood upon the list; another of that master's works, too much slighted probably because it comes from an "early" opera, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," had preceded it. Chaikovsky brought the fourth symphony, in F minor. And as if for good measure, Igor Stravinsky was there with a work that might well have been designed for popular consumption, the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, as yet unheard in the United States outside of Boston. The latter meant that there was a soloist, too. Jesus Maria Sanromá. More widely ranging a program that keeps within the limits of the works desired on a Sunday afternoon, could hardly have been. And an audience, almost but not quite filling Symphony Hall, loosed applause that shook the rafters. If something is needed to hit this audience "squarely between the eyes," the fervors of Chaikovsky, Koussevitzky-heightened, amply provided it.

All of this must by no means be taken to signify that the program, or even Chaikovsky, brought nothing beside fervid eloquence. Subtleties, moments of sheer, unalloyed beauty there were also, passages steeped in delineative suggestion. In the prelude to "Lohengrin" words can scarcely describe the superearthly ascent, the superb burst of tone when the heights have been reached, the equally wondrous return from the heights. But that, much as it is, is not all. That sonorities, tonal coloring—the shimmer of high strings, the warmth of brass—should match and give reality to the poetic idea, as perfectly as Wagner here provides, is matter for marvel. The poetic idea itself is of no less beauty in its own right—the idea of the mystic Grail approaching the company of spotless knights, being uncovered before them. Though such impressions have been written a thousand times, they remain pertinent. Yet wait—they came to one through one's ears, not through study of note printed upon music paper; which means that there must have been an instrumentality for bringing them to one's ears, to parallel and make real and audible, Wagner's thought. It is, of course, easy to say that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were the instrumentality. But in the glib saying of it, it is all too easy to forget that to rouse these impressions it was necessary for them to re-create Wagner's music after him. And this re-creation, as witnessed again on Sunday, is not the least of marvels. . . . The various elements of the "Flying Dutchman" overture Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday held securely within their frame. Perhaps the dominant impression of it all was as music of the sea with its surging and roaring, with its far-flung suggestion.

The dominant impression of Stravinsky's "Cappriccio" was of a piece designed—and successfully—solely to give pleasure; pleasure not chiefly to the erudite, nor merely to those who follow closely the musical stars in their courses, but pleasure, say, to a multitude dropping in at Symphony Hall on a Sunday afternoon to hear beautiful sounds and exciting rhythms. The scalpel and forceps of the analyst finds not too much in this score; assuredly no man has ever created more out of less material, unless perchance that man be Stravinsky himself; for with Stravinsky material has always been next to nothing, the totality of his creation everything. Themes, invented or borrowed, where are they in this Capriccio? "Motives" A few scraps of them perhaps, here and there. But the totality? Watch the faces, the eyes of man after man, and realization comes that with this whimsical piece of fancy, this play of decorative passages and jazzy rhythms, Stravinzky has again performed an act of creation the validity of which is hard to question.—And once more, coming to performers, there is Mr. Samromá persuasive and able with the difficulties of the piano part, Dr. Koussevitzky illuminating with the orchestral score; both fusing and welding their separate parts into a unity unimpeachable in the singleness of its purpose.

Then Chaikovsky's "Fourth." A piece perhaps too much overshadowed by its later brothers, the "Fifth" and the "Sixth." With it Dr. Koussevitzky proclaims, with it he whips up frenzies, with it he sings gently, with it he makes magic with flicks of tonal color, sets waltz periods a-going, with rarest of delicacies throws piquant rhythms from strings against similar rhythms from brass.

A. H. M.

Dupe

NDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1930

PENSION FUND CONCERT GIVEN

Brilliant Program by Symphony Orchestra Stirs Enthusiasm

With the familiar and resounding overture to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman," yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of the pension fund, opened a brilliant program.

Following it was the prelude to "Lohengrin," both now become somewhat too often the standardized examples of the great operatic genius. Yet with Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of them, there is an infusion of excitement to otherwise stale measures, an excellence of performance, a regard for exacting details of rhythm and tempo, that lend to them a new vigor and interest.

The Wagner, together with Stravinsky's Capriccio, with Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma as piano soloist, replaced a previously announced Tchaikovsky work. It was not amiss to hear the new Stravinsky again, although it was just before the holidays that it found a place on the regular Friday afternoon program. The Capriccio has obviously been written in one of the Russian composer's jollier moods.

The piano and orchestra carry on a light and amusing repartee; there are marked originalities of harmony and rhythm. Mr. Sanroma's playing is at all times well balanced in tone, his technique clear and concise, his interpretative powers exceptional. Interesting as is the Capriccio, however, there are not many opportunities—not nearly enough—to disclose his splendid musicianship.

But undoubtedly the high light of the afternoon was the orchestra's superb performance of Tchaikovsky's F minor symphony. It may be a flight of fancy to believe that Dr. Koussevitzky's bond of sympathy with his fellow countryman is an exceptionally strong one. And yet his performance of the great work yesterday most certainly created great emotional response in his large audience. Not content to maintain silence until the four movements were completed, there was spontaneous applause at the conclusion of the long and complicated first movement.

There is something in the powerful introduction in the horns and bassoons, and in the seductive waltz time of one of the principal themes, in the unity and excitement of the music itself, that is not conducive to a merely placid acceptance. The exquisitely sad canzona, which is the second movement, the plucked strings and delicate pizzicato of the Scherzo and the tumultuous and striking gaiety of the finale, all were heard at their magnificent best.

The audience remained several moments at the conclusion of the program to appreciatively applaud conductor and orchestra.

after-recital.

Dec 29

Pension Fund Concert

For innovation on a pension fund program, Dr. Koussevitzky offered a contemporary novelty at the orchestral benefit concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. This was Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, heard only a little more than a week earlier for the first time at the subscription concerts. Mr. Sanromá was again the soloist. The concert opened with the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which was followed by the Prelude of "Lohengrin." The concluding number was Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor.

A rehearing of the Capriccio confirmed the impression that it is well named—an amusing jeu d'esprit, cleverly contrived, which deserves the applause which greeted it after its brilliant publication yesterday; but not, of course, a masterpiece destined to entertain indefinitely.

The Wagner items were delivered, the one with the customary dramatism, the other with a poetic atmosphere which narrowly missed the necessary ethereality. But it was in the symphony that conductor and players achieved the supreme utterance of the day. Koussevitzky is the superlative interpreter of Tchaikovsky, and this performance revealed him and the men at the top of their bent.

MONITOR

L. A. S.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S EARLY DAYS RECALLED BY CHARLES A. ELLIS; MAJ. HIGGINSON'S VISION TRUE

Being the first manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra was no easy task, according to Charles A. Ellis, now retired and living in Boston. "It was real work," he declared. "However, I managed to get along without much thouble. I made it a point to mind my own business, which is probably the reason why," he said with a smile.

"In those days good orchestra players were not as numerous as they are today, and it was hard to get a good orchestra together. The first Symphony orchestra was made up of musicians from Boston and New York. There were about 75 of them, and they were the best available. However, they had to be taken where they could be found, and while there was much good talent, they were not accustomed to playing together. It takes long association of the players to get the best results. Now there are few changes from year to year and naturally the artistic results are better," he explain ".

FIRST CONCERTS WON IMMEDIATE FAVOR

"The concerts, which were held in the old Music hall, on the corner of Winter street and Hamilton place: won immediate favor with the public. Every seat was taken the whole season for the concerts in Music hall, which had a seating capacity of about 2400," he said.

"In those first yea.s there were a number of people who were skeptical about the success of Maj. Higginson's enterprise. Even some of his best friends feared, and enemies hoped, that it would not be permanently successful. There were many who declared that the love of symphonic music was : affectation. They said that Henschel had caught the town, and it was fashionable to attend the concerts, but that after a while the attendance would dwindle away. I am happy to say that the record of 50 years has changed this forecast.

"It all proved," continued Mr. Ellis, "that Maj. Higginson was foresighted, for from the very start, back in 1881, he was positive that his project was going to prove a great success."

Asked if the men were nervous the night of their first public appearance with the Symphony, Mr. Ellis declared they were not, adding, "That first concert went off very well, and made a great impression. Most of the critics were hostile—and some never changed their minds," he laughed.

"It was very fortunate that Maj. Higginson chose George Henschel to organize and conduct the first Boston Symphony. It was a difficult task, and he was just the man to do it. Beginning with nothing at all, he had to seek out and engage the best musicians he could find, as well as select the library. George Henschel, with his great musical gifts, his knowledge, enthusiasm and tact, was the ideal man for that work. He gave it a fine start, and we owe much to him. Every one was very happy that he could come back and direct the Symphony in its 50th year."

"Back in 1885, under Mr. Gericke, with a view to improving the quality of the orchestra, about 20 young men who had just graduated from the Vienna Conservatory, were brought over," said Mr. Ellis reminscently. "They were all excellent musicians, and pupils of the well known Prof. Grun. Among them were Roth, Svecenki, Moldaner, Fiedler, Zach and others who are well remembered. It was my duty and pleasure to meet these gentlemen upon their arrival, and I shall never forget their first impressions, and how they gazed with wonder at the big buildings in New York. Also how the passersby wondered at them on account of their oddities of dress. It took only a short time for them to become used to American ways and customs. Among these men was the father of Arthur Fiedler, who is also prominent among the Symphony members."

One outstanding event, according to Mr. Ellis, was the journey of the Symphony orchestra to San Francisco in 1915 to play at the San Francisco exposition. Mr. George W. Stewart, musical director of the exposition, had been abroad and had made arrangements with many of the famous European organizations, when the outbreak of the war made it impossible for them to fulfill their contracts. It was then suggested to him that perhaps the best orchestra in the world might fill the bill. He laid the matter before his directors, and after long consideration and rather strong opposition in certain quarters, the Boston Symphony was engaged for 12 concerts, to be played on 12 successive days.

"These concerts were given in the music hall on the exposition grounds. It was stipulated that they would give no other concerts on that tour, though they had plenty of invitations to do so. The orchestra went by special train from Boston to San Francisco. Upon their arrival in the city they were met by the mayor of San Francisco and a committee from the city government. Dr. Muck and his orchestra aroused great enthusiasm by the brilliancy of their performance and many entertainments were given in their honor.

"To the surprise of every one, and particularly the managers of the exposition, the concerts not only paid for themselves," said Mr. Ellis, "but left a margin of profit. In that respect they made a better showing than any other department of the exposition.

"They've been doing wonderful work ever since, too," he added proudly. "They are still going ahead, and bid fair to continue for another 50 years and more."

SUN. HER. DEC. 28-30

Concerts

By PHILIP HALE Herald Dec. 28

Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" will at last be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. It was to have been played last Friday and yesterday, but it occurred to the conductor that as the text had reference to the Passion the "Sonate" was hardly appropriate to Christmastide. So the variations of Arensky on Tchaikovsky's Legend of the Christ child replaced the Good Friday music. The repertory of the orchestra includes specifically Christmas music, as Bach's Pastorale from the Christmas Oratorio; as Liszt's March of the Three Kings.

Lourie's Sonata is in four sections. For the second "Cantus Passionis" and the fourth, "Horae Passionis" alto voices are added to the orchestra.

The program of the Pension Fund concert tonight has also been changed. As it now stands it will have a miscellaneous character; yet it might have been a pleasure to hear Tchaikovsky's Serenade for strings, which has not been played here by the orchestra at the subscription concerts for many years. Tchaikovsky composed it at the time that he worked on the "1812" overture, which had been requested by Nicholas Rubinstein for the consecration of the Cathedral of the Saviour at Moscow. Tchaikovsky wrote Mme. Meek that this overture would be very noisy. "I wrote it without much warmth of enthusiasm, therefore, it has no artistic value. Nothing is more unpleasant to me than the manufacturing of music for such occasions."

Jean Lefranc at the Symphony concerts this week will play William Walton's Viola concerts. We believe that this will be the first performance in the United States. The concerto was performed at the Liege Music Festival on Sept. 4, 1930, when Lionel Tertis was the viola player. The name of Walton has been three times on Symphony programs since Dr. Koussevitzky came to Boston.

Mr. Lefranc took a first prize for viola playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1907, and in that year became the viola soloist of the Opera-Comique Orchestra. In 1911 he was the viola soloist of the concerts Cobonne. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1925 and on Dec. 11 of that year played with the orchestra Bloch's Suite, which he had performed in Paris with Nadia Boulanger, pianist, in 1922 and with the Colonne Orchestra in 1924. In Paris he was the viola of the Quartet Tourret; in Boston he is the viola of the Burgin Quartet.

Globe Dec 29

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Koussevitsky conducting, gave yesterday afternoon the first of the concerts this year in aid of the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra.

The program, announced originally as being devoted entirely to music by Tchaikovsky, was altered. It included, yesterday, the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," and the prelude to his "Lohengrin"; Tchaikovsky's fourth, F minor, symphony; and the new "Capriccio for Orchestra With Piano Solo" by Stravinsky. Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist in the latter work.

The "Capriccio" was performed for the first time in America at the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony on Dec 19 and 20 of this year, with Mr Sanroma playing the solo part. Then, as yesterday, the work was received very cordially.

Generally supeaking, the piece is of a light-hearted character. It impressed one listener chiefly with its rather welcome and refreshing spirit of drollery. This drollery, however, is not unrestrained, and there are interludes of serious nature. Because of this, the piece might, by a stretch of imagination, be compared to some present-day popular American music that presents a certain intermittent, deadly determined, seriousness, for no great reason at all.

The "Capriccio" is intricate and pungent instrumental portions, played with the first desk men of the four string sections, and those of the wood-wind section (as far as one could observe) grouped closely about the piano, is invigorating and not at all appalling in its dissonances and rhythms. One who is accustomed to extreme vehemence, in the matter of syncopated rhythms, found himself wishing yesterday that such rhythms were being done with more verve and emphasis. But possibly Stravinsky didn't intend that at all.

Mr Sanroma acquitted himself excellently in the seemingly complicated piano part, and received from both conductor and audience expressions of great admiration.

One doubts whether any conductor could do Tchaikovsky any more brilliantly, forcefully, with greater emotional zeal and fire, than does Dr Koussevitzky. In this music he is without doubt a master of masters. Under his readings, portions of that composer's works take on new meaning.

One does not hold Tchaikovsky's music to be a well-spring of highest spiritual exaltation, or to be of the utmost profound emotional significance. But one does admit, when Dr Koussevitzky conducts this music, to a greater respect, and, perhaps, affection for it.

SYMPHONY PENSION CONCERT

Stravinsky's Capriccio Outstanding Piece on List

Dec 29 Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is by now a truism that when Dr. Koussevitzky revises a programme he always does so for the better. Instead of merely playing two pieces by Tchaikovsky at the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund concert of yesterday afternoon, the Serenade for strings and the Fourth Symphony, he prefaced the Symphony with Wagner's "Dutchman" Overture and "Lohengrin" Prelude and Stravinsky's new Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist.

NOT FOR REGULARS

Granted that those in yesterday's audience who go regularly to the Symphony Concerts might have welcomed the chance to hear in its entirety the attractive and seldom played Serenade, the fact remains that the Pension Fund concerts are addressed primarily, not to these frequenters of Symphony Hall, but to the lovers of orchestral music who for one reason or another cannot hear the Symphony Orchestra week in and week out. For them the miscellaneous programme that was finally offered must have proved considerably more satisfying.

And even the aforesaid regular subscribers, whatever their attitude toward this music, must have been gratified to hear so soon again Stravinsky's Capriccio. Even those who believe that Stravinsky's powers are on the wane, that his present music lacks both the conviction and the originality of his earlier works, particularly those three remarkable ballets, "The Fire Bird," "Petroushka" and "The Rite of Spring," must confess that anything Stravinsky writes should be heard more than once before a final judgment can be passed upon it. The redoubtable Igor is still a composer to be reckoned with.

Confirms First Opinion

In the case of the present reviewer the consequences of this re-hearing may be summarized by saying that whether for good or ill his first impressions were yesterday strengthened. Where Stravinsky has written with serious intent his music improves on further acquaintance. When he has been frankly and unashamedly trivial in his musical thought, familiarity brings about its traditional result.

When the Capriccio was first played here a little more than a week ago one member of the audience was of the opinion that there were passages in the music which ought to sound banal and, for some reason, did not. To that suggestion this member of yesterday's audience will make the counter-suggestion that these same passages ought to sound banal and do.

Well Worth Hearing

But whatever one's opinion of this and other manifestations of the later Stravinsky, yesterday's performance of the Capriccio and this applies equally to the part played in it by pianist, conductor and orchestra was well worth hearing for itself alone. In rare degree was it finished, brilliant, pungent and incisive. Surely the composer, had he been privileged to hear it, would have rejoiced. Notable, too, was the playing of the other numbers on the programme.

It is another truism that the Symphony Orchestra always outdoes itself at these Pension Fund concerts. Of these things the audience, which did not quite fill the hall, was plainly sensible. Particularly did it lavish applause on Mr. Sanroma and at the end of the concert upon Dr. Koussevitzky. Both deserved it.

87

MUSIC

Dec 29 Herald

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The program of the concert give yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in aid of its pension fund was as follows: Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin"; Stravinsky, Capriccio for piano and orchestra; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4, in F minor, op. 36. The solo part of Stravinsky's Capriccio was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

An unusual feature of this, the 62d pension fund concert, was the inclusion of a recent "novelty," introduced to regular subscribers no more than eight or nine days earlier. Pension fund concerts have tended to tread the safe ground of all-Wagner, all-Tchaikovsky programs and the like, and while such a program as yesterday's may not fill the hall quite so effectively, yet much good is done by letting a significant new composition be heard outside the closed circle of subscribers to the various series of Boston symphony concerts. It was evident that Stravinsky's new Capriccio, played as it was with consummate skill and admirable spirit by both orchestra and soloist, aroused both interest and enjoyment. It merits its title more than do most similarly-named works; it is capricious in its abrupt and vehement changes of mood, in its prevailing gaiety and the contrasted and unexpected melancholy of its rhapsodic andante, in its excitingly irregular rhythms, its lively and impudent melodies. There is apparent caprice even in the strange contradictions of style that emerge from this music—the characteristic harmonic asperities alternate with euphonious banalities, reminiscences of minor 19th century music, snatches of Viennese elegance, conventional harmonic progressions slightly soured, in which the intention of parody may be guessed. The rhythmic and melodic idioms of jazz—in its lighter, happier mood—are strongly present, but only as one of the many disparate ingredients that go to make up their amusing work. Mr. Sanroma's delightfully neat and alert performance of this difficult music earned him much applause and caused him to be recalled several times to the platform. Dr. Koussevitzky received equal commendation for his and the orchestra's remarkably effective share in the performance.

The concert had opened with a finely dramatic, beautifully suave performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture, with its foreshadowing of the later Wagner of the "Ring of the Nibelungen" and its reminiscences of the symmetrical cantilena of Weber. The "Lohengrin" prelude, with the unearthly beauty of its high-pitched floating chords, had followed.

Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, which concluded the concert, was performed with a dramatic force and conviction, with an expressive beauty, with an unfailing appropriateness of tempo and style, that could hardly be surpassed. It was a performance which minimized the weaknesses of the work and lent dignity and vitality to its inflated tragedy. The melancholy charm of the andantine, the delicious lightness and grace of the scherzo were memorable. The orchestra surpassed itself by the beauty and virtuosity of its playing and achieved in the last movement a climax of overwhelming brilliance and power. Vigorous and prolonged applause rewarded conductor and orchestra alike.

S. S.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S EARLY DAYS RECALLED BY CHARLES A. ELLIS; MAJ. HIGGINSON'S VISION TRUE

Being the first manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra was no easy task, according to Charles A. Ellis, now retired and living in Boston. "It was real work," he declared. "However, I managed to get along without much thouble. I made it a point to mind my own business, which is probably the reason why," he said with a smile.

"In those days good orchestra players were not as numerous as they are today, and it was hard to get a good orchestra together. The first Symphony orchestra was made up of musicians from Boston and New York. There were about 75 of them, and they were the best available. However, they had to be taken where they could be found, and while there was much good talent, they were not accustomed to playing together. It takes long association of the players to get the best results. Now there are few changes from year to year and naturally the artistic results are better," he explain '.

FIRST CONCERTS WON IMMEDIATE FAVOR

"The concerts, which were held in the old Music hall, on the corner of Winter street and Hamilton place, won immediate favor with the public. Every seat was taken the whole season for the concerts in Music hall, which had a seating capacity of about 2400," he said.

"In those first years there were a number of people who were skeptical about the success of Maj. Higginson's enterprise. Even some of his best friends feared, and enemies hoped, that it would not be permanently successful. There were many who declared that the love of symphonic music was . . affectation. They said that Henschel had caught the town, and it was fashionable to attend the concerts, but that after a while the attendance would dwindle away. I am happy to say that the record of 50 years has changed this forecast.

"It all proved," continued Mr. Ellis, "that Maj. Higginson was foresighted, for from the very start, back in 1881, he was positive that his project was going to prove a great success."

Asked if the men were nervous the night of their first public appearance with the Symphony, Mr. Ellis declared they were not, adding, "That first concert went off very well, and made a great impression. Most of the critics were hostile—and some never changed their minds," he laughed.

"It was very fortunate that Maj. Higginson chose George Henschel to organize and conduct the first Boston Symphony. It was a difficult task, and he was just the man to do it. Beginning with nothing at all, he had to seek out and engage the best musicians he could find, as well as select the library. George Henschel, with his great musical gifts, his knowledge, enthusiasm and tact, was the ideal man for that work. He gave it a fine start, and we owe much to him. Every one was very happy that he could come back and direct the Symphony in its 50th year."

"Back in 1885, under Mr. Gericke, with a view to improving the quality of the orchestra, about 20 young men who had just graduated from the Vienna Conservatory, were brought over," said Mr. Ellis reminiscently. "They were all excellent musicians, and pupils of the well known Prof. Grun. Among them were Roth, Svecenki, Moldaner, Fiedler, Zach and others who are well remembered. It was my duty and pleasure to meet these gentlemen upon their arrival, and I shall never forget their first impressions, and how they gazed with wonder at the big buildings in New York. Also how the passersby wondered at them on account of their eddities of dress. It took only a short time for them to become used to American ways and customs. Among these men was the father of Arthur Fiedler, who is also prominent among the Symphony members."

One outstanding event, according to Mr. Ellis, was the journey of the Symphony orchestra to San Francisco in 1915 to play at the San Francisco exposition. Mr. George W. Stewart, musical director of the exposition, had been abroad and had made arrangements with many of the famous European organizations, when the outbreak of the war made it impossible for them to fulfill their contracts. It was then suggested to him that perhaps the best orchestra in the world might fill the bill. He laid the matter before his directors, and after long consideration and rather strong opposition in certain quarters, the Boston Symphony was engaged for 12 concerts, to be played on 12 successive days.

"These concerts were given in the music hall on the exposition grounds. It was stipulated that they would give no other concerts on that tour, though they had plenty of invitations to do so. The orchestra went by special train from Boston to San Francisco. Upon their arrival in the city they were met by the mayor of San Francisco and a committee from the city government. Dr. Muck and his orchestra aroused great enthusiasm by the brilliancy of their performance and many entertainments were given in their honor.

"To the surprise of every one, and particularly the managers of the exposition, the concerts not only paid for themselves," said Mr. Ellis, "but left a margin of profit. In that respect they made a better showing than any other department of the exposition.

"They've been doing wonderful work ever since, too," he added proudly. "They are still going ahead, and bid fair to continue for another 50 years and more."

SUNDAY HER. DEC. 28-30

Concerts

By PHILIP HALE Herald Dec. 28

Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" will at last be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. It was to have been played last Friday and yesterday, but it occurred to the conductor that as the text had reference to the Passion the "Sonate" was hardly appropriate to Christmastide. So the variations of Arensky on Tchaikovsky's Legend of the Christ child replaced the Good Friday music. The repertory of the orchestra includes specifically Christmas music, as Bach's Pastorale from the Christmas Oratorio; as Liszt's March of the Three Kings.

Lourie's Sonata is in four sections. For the second "Cantus Passionis" and the fourth, "Horae Passionis" alto voices are added to the orchestra.

The program of the Pension Fund concert tonight has also been changed. As it now stands it will have a miscellaneous character; yet it might have been a pleasure to hear Tchaikovsky's Serenade for strings, which has not been played here by the orchestra at the subscription concerts for many years. Tchaikovsky composed it at the time that he worked on the "1812" overture, which had been requested by Nicholas Rubinstein for the consecration of the Cathedral of the Saviour at Moscow. Tchaikovsky wrote Mme. Meek that this overture would be very noisy. "I wrote it without much warmth of enthusiasm, therefore, it has no artistic value. Nothing is more unpleasant to me than the manufacturing of music for such occasions."

Jean Lefranc at the Symphony concerts this week will play William Walton's Viola concerts. We believe that this will be the first performance in the United States. The concerto was performed at the Liege Music Festival on Sept. 4, 1930, when Lionel Tertis was the viola player. The name of Walton has been three times on Symphony programs since Dr. Koussevitzky came to Boston.

Mr. Lefranc took a first prize for viola playing at the Paris Conservatory in 1907, and in that year became the viola soloist of the Opera-Comique Orchestra. In 1911 he was the viola soloist of the concerts Cobonne. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1925 and on Dec. 11 of that year played with the orchestra Bloch's Suite, which he had performed in Paris with Nadia Boulanger, pianist, in 1922 and with the Colonne Orchestra in 1924. In Paris he was the viola of the Quartet Tourret; in Boston he is the viola of the Burgin Quartet.

Globe Dec 29

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Koussevitsky conducting, gave yesterday afternoon the first of the concerts this year in aid of the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra.

The program, announced originally as being devoted entirely to music by Tchaikovsky, was altered. It included, yesterday, the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," and the prelude to his "Lohengrin"; Tchaikovsky's fourth, F minor, symphony; and the new "Capriccio for Orchestra With Piano Solo" by Stravinsky. Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist in the latter work.

The "Capriccio" was performed for the first time in America at the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony on Dec 19 and 20 of this year, with Mr Sanroma playing the solo part. Then, as yesterday, the work was received very cordially.

Generally supeaking, the piece is of a light-hearted character. It impressed one listener chiefly with its rather welcome and refreshing spirit of drollery. This drollery, however, is not unrestrained, and there are interludes of serious nature. Because of this, the piece might, by a stretch of imagination, be compared to some present-day popular American music that presents a certain intermittent, deadly determined, seriousness, for no great reason at all.

The "Capriccio" is intricate and pungent instrumental portions, played with the first desk men of the four string sections, and those of the wood-wind section (as far as one could observe) grouped closely about the piano, is invigorating and not at all appalling in its dissonances and rhythms. One who is accustomed to extreme vehemence, in the matter of syncopated rhythms, found himself wishing yesterday that such rhythms were being done with more verve and emphasis. But possibly Stravinsky didn't intend that at all.

Mr. Sanroma acquitted himself excellently in the seemingly complicated piano part, and received from both conductor and audience expressions of great admiration.

One doubts whether any conductor could do Tchaikovsky any more brilliantly, forcefully, with greater emotional zeal and fire, than does Dr Koussevitzky. In this music he is without doubt a master of masters. Under his readings, portions of that composer's works take on new meaning.

One does not hold Tchaikovsky's music to be a well-spring of highest spiritual exaltation, or to be of the utmost profound emotional significance. But one does admit, when Dr Koussevitzky conducts this music, to a greater respect, and, perhaps, affection for it.

SYMPHONY PENSION CONCERT

Stravinsky's Capriccio Outstanding Piece on List

Dec 1 Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is by now a truism that when Dr. Koussevitzky revises a programme he always does so for the better. Instead of merely playing two pieces by Tchaikovsky at the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund concert of yesterday afternoon, the Serenade for strings and the Fourth Symphony, he prefaced the Symphony with Wagner's "Dutchman" Overture and "Lohengrin" Prelude and Stravinsky's new Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist.

NOT FOR REGULARS

Granted that those in yesterday's audience who go regularly to the Symphony Concerts might have welcomed the chance to hear in its entirety the attractive and seldom played Serenade, the fact remains that the Pension Fund concerts are addressed primarily, not to these frequenters of Symphony Hall, but to the lovers of orchestral music who for one reason or another cannot hear the Symphony Orchestra week in and week out. For them the miscellaneous programme that was finally offered must have proved considerably more satisfying.

And even the aforesaid regular subscribers, whatever their attitude toward this music, must have been gratified to hear so soon again Stravinsky's Capriccio. Even those who believe that Stravinsky's powers are on the wane, that his present music lacks both the conviction and the originality of his earlier works, particularly those three remarkable ballets, "The Fire Bird," "Petroushka" and "The Rite of Spring," must confess that anything Stravinsky writes should be heard more than once before a final judgment can be passed upon it. The redoubtable Igor is still a composer to be reckoned with.

Confirms First Opinion

In the case of the present reviewer the consequences of this re-hearing may be summarized by saying that whether for good or ill his first impressions were yesterday strengthened. Where Stravinsky has written with serious intent his music improves on further acquaintance. When he has been frankly and unashamedly trivial in his musical thought, familiarity brings about its traditional result.

When the Capriccio was first played here a little more than a week ago one member of the audience was of the opinion that there were passages in the music which ought to sound banal and, for some reason, did not. To that suggestion this member of yesterday's audience will make the counter-suggestion that these same passages ought to sound banal and do.

Well Worth Hearing

But whatever one's opinion of this and other manifestations of the later Stravinsky, yesterday's performance of the Capriccio and this applies equally to the part played in it by pianist, conductor and orchestra was well worth hearing for itself alone. In rare degree was it finished, brilliant, pungent and incisive. Surely the composer, had he been privileged to hear it, would have rejoiced. Notable, too, was the playing of the other numbers on the programme.

It is another truism that the Symphony Orchestra always outdoes itself at these Pension Fund concerts. Of these things the audience, which did not quite fill the hall, was plainly sensible. Particularly did it lavish applause on Mr. Sanroma and at the end of the concert upon Dr. Koussevitzky. Both deserved it.

MUSIC

Dec 29 Herald

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The program of the concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra in aid of its pension fund was as follows: Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin"; Stravinsky, Capriccio for piano and orchestra; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4, in F minor, op. 36. The solo part of Stravinsky's Capriccio was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

An unusual feature of this, the 62d pension fund concert, was the inclusion of a recent "novelty," introduced to regular subscribers no more than eight or nine days earlier. Pension fund concerts have tended to tread the safe ground of all-Wagner, all-Tchaikovsky programs and the like, and while such a program as yesterday's may not fill the hall quite so effectively, yet much good is done by letting a significant new composition be heard outside the closed circle of subscribers to the various series of Boston symphony concerts. It was evident that Stravinsky's new Capriccio, played as it was with consummate skill and admirable spirit by both orchestra and soloist, aroused both interest and enjoyment. It merits its title more than do most similarly-named works; it is capricious in its abrupt and vehement changes of mood, in its prevailing gaiety and the contrasted and unexpected melancholy of its rhapsodic andante, in its excitingly irregular rhythms, its lively and impudent melodies. There is apparent caprice even in the strange contradictions of style that emerge from this music—the characteristic harmonic asperities alternate with euphonious banalities, reminiscences of minor 19th century music, snatches of Viennese elegance, conventional harmonic progressions slightly soured, in which the intention of parody may be guessed. The rhythmic and melodic idioms of jazz—in its lighter, happier mood—are strongly present, but only as one of the many disparate ingredients that go to make up their amusing work. Mr. Sanroma's delightfully neat and alert performance of this difficult music earned him much applause and caused him to be recalled several times to the platform. Dr. Koussevitzky received equal commendation for his and the orchestra's remarkably effective share in the performance.

The concert had opened with a finely dramatic, beautifully suave performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture, with its foreshadowing of the later Wagner of the "Ring of the Nibelungen" and its reminiscences of the symmetrical cantilena of Weber. The "Lohengrin" prelude, with the unearthly beauty of its high-pitched floating chords, had followed.

Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, which concluded the concert, was performed with a dramatic force and conviction, with an expressive beauty, with an unfailing appropriateness of tempo and style, that could hardly be surpassed. It was a performance which minimized the weaknesses of the work and lent dignity and vitality to its inflated tragedy. The melancholy charm of the andantine, the delicious lightness and grace of the scherzo were memorable. The orchestra surpassed itself by the beauty and virtuosity of its playing and achieved in the last movement a climax of overwhelming brilliance and power. Vigorous and prolonged applause rewarded conductor and orchestra alike.

S. S.

Herald MUSIC Jan. 3

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 11th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall was as follows: Beethoven, symphony C major, No. 1, Lourie "Sonate Liturgique" in the form of four chorales (with alto voices). Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben."

Arthur Lourie, or Lurye, born at Leningrad in 1889 (some say 1892), was, according to a Russian biographer, a roaring and ramping "futurist" in his younger years. He was to be seen, and no doubt heard, at "The Stray Dog," frequented by writers, musicians, painters, and all entertaining extremely "advanced" views. The revolution possibly sobered him; at any rate under the soviet rule he became a government official to maintain friendly artistic relations with other nations. In 1923 he left Russia to make Paris his home. Some of his music has been performed in New York as well as in Paris; for example, his Concerto Spirituale for piano and chorus, heard in New York last March.

This sonata was performed yesterday for the first time in the United States. Composed in 1928 it was brought out in Paris last February at a concert conducted by Walter Straram, who used to live in Boston as a conductor of the ill-fated Boston Opera Company. The sonata is in four movements. The first a "Sequence" and the third a "Prose," are instrumental; the second with a text, "Cantus Passionis"—describing the Crucifixion is taken from a lesson in 'Feria VI in Parascave"—and the fourth, a hymn in three verses—"The Hours of the Passion"—author unnamed—are for orchestra and alto voices. The orchestra is composed of a few wind instruments, a few double basses and a piano.

Now a sonata in old times was a word applied to any piece of music. From the derivation of the word it is easily to be inferred that this piece of music should "sound." Whether the sound should ravish the ear or rasp the nerves, is left to the ability of the composer and the executants, and to the predilection and taste of the hearer.

Lourie's sonata, when the altos sang the sacred words—their voices were euphonious in themselves and well-trained—sounded as if bolshevistic instruments were attempting to discompose the singers, if not to jeer and mock their pious office. Seldom, if ever, have we heard such a laborious, ineffectual, needlessly cacophonic use of instruments, which, when treated kindly and skilfully, respond gratefully to the wish of a composer who would be picturesque, dramatic, or emotional by the assemblage and disposition of sounds. Puccini did his best to give musical emphasis to the torture scene in "Tosca." That music is of pastoral mellifluence compared to the excruciating sounds that came from M. Lourie's tortured instruments. The sounds were not illustrative of the Divine passion; they might have served at the black mass with Satan grinning hideously as the celebrant.

M. Lourie is not brainless; he has written fluently and often shrewdly about music, but it is easier to write about music than to write it. Years ago Fontenelle asked: "Sonata, what do you wish of me?" The hearers yesterday would not answer this question in an equivocal manner.

But there was much to enjoy in the concert; the sonate was only a passing disturbance in the air of the hall. There was a charming performance of Beethoven's symphony by a reduced orchestra; one that for clarity, fine taste, sheer beauty could not be surpassed. This performance in its way was as severe a test of the players and the interpretative ability of Dr. Koussevitzky as was the superbly glowing and stirring performance of Strauss' autobiography with its amazingly egotistic pages. Much of this tone poem is of the too fluent poorer Strauss, but the performance almost persuaded the hearer that the music was worthy the composer of "Till," "Don Juan," "Don Quixote" and "Der Rosenkavalier." Certain pages in "Ein Heldenleben" still worked their spell. Those depicting the hero's wooing, with the solo violin played brilliantly by Mr. Burgin. It was pleasant to hear the quotations from Strauss' earlier works. Then there is the peaceful contemplative ending, pages that Strauss has seldom surpassed, perhaps only in the "recognition" scene of "Elektra" and the presentation of the rose by the cavalier.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The next concerts will be on Jan. 16, 17, when Arthur Hadley will conduct. His program is thus arranged: Haydn, Symphony, E flat major, No. 1; McKinley, "Masquerade" (first time at these concerts). Hadley "Salome" (after Oscar Wilde); also Hadley's suite, "Streets of Pekin," which will be played for the first time in Boston. The conductor of the concerts of Jan. 23, 24, will be E. Fernandez Arbos.

"HELDENLEBEN" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strauss' Tone Poem Given Brilliant Performance

Globe Jan. 3

The chief item on a curiously assorted program at yesterday's Symphony concert was Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben." Beethoven's First Symphony, and a work entitled "Sonate Liturgique, in the form of Four Chorales," by Arthur Lourie, performed for the first time in America, were the other numbers.

"Ein Heldenleben" was more warmly applauded yesterday than it has usually been at these concerts. Its greater length and complexity, as well as its less salient thematic material, have in the past made it less appealing than "Don Juan" or "Till Eulenspiegel" have long since proved to be to the audiences here and elsewhere.

One may now dismiss the problem of relating the music to the legend of the hero as unimportant. It does not matter whether the quotations from other works by Strauss indicate that the composer is his own hero. It does not matter just which measures indicate the low earthly nature of the hero's detractors, and which indicate his soul taking its final flight. Most musicians now are agreed that it is fuiile to endeavor to tell a circumstantial story, or paint a detailed picture in tones. Absolute music is again in fashion, and the 19th century with its program music is dead and gone.

Love Music

What really matters in "Ein Heldenleben" is that Strauss has run out of musical ideas. His themes are no more vital, no more powerful than those in his "Alpine Symphony." Nor can all his mastery of instrumentation and of polyphony hide the essential poverty of this score. The love music, its most appealing page, is commonplace. The hero's struggles, though magnificently sonorous, delight only by sheer volume and quality of tone.

One has only to imagine "Ein Heldenleben" transcribed for string quartet to perceive the weakness of Strauss' music. Yesterday's applause was a tribute to the interpretative talent of Dr Koussevitzky, and to the magnificent outpouring of orchestral tone from the players. Nor should Mr Burgin's admirable playing of the taxing cadenza-like passages for solo violin be forgotten.

Lourie, or Lurye (the name is spelled both ways), is a Russian Jew, whose family is said to have been converted to Catholicism some generations back. He is a well-to-do resident of Paris, where he has a hand in many musical ventures. He has composed a good deal of music. He is writing a biography of Dr Koussevitzky, which is announced for publication in New York next Spring.

The work by Lourie heard yesterday is unlike anything else ever played in Boston. It is scored for a small group of wind instruments, double basses, piano, and alto voices. There are four movements, with titles taken from the Roman Catholic liturgy. The first is instrumental, though its title "Sequentia" would make one expect a setting of, say, "Victimae paschali laudes." The second is "Cantus Passionis," for altos and instruments. Its text is the "Tenebrae factae sunt." The third movement is called "Prosa," a liturgical term which would also lead one to expect verses spoken or sung, but it, like the first, is for instruments. The last is verses for alto chorus about the hours of suffering of Christ on the cross. The singers were from the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler.

Wished to Be Original

The title, "sonata in the form of four chorals," is nonsense, according to received notions of musical form. One felt in the music, also, that the composer wished to be original and believed that originality means breaking all the rules. But any child can do that. It takes a Schoenberg or a Stravinsky to do it well. Lourie's music is not devoid of talent. He plainly has harmonic sense and a devotion to medieval liturgical music. But the work heard yesterday is amateurish.

Beethoven's first is, by common consent, the least interesting of his symphonies. In it he played the sedulous ape to Mozart without attaining to anything like the style of the G minor and "Jupiter" symphonies of that composer. Yesterday's performance, inaccurate in detail in the first movement, was spirited and lively in minuet and finale.

There are no Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday. Dr Henry Hadley will appear as guest conductor Jan 16 and 17. P. R.

SYMPHONY GLORIFIES STRAUSS

Post Jan 3

"A Hero's Life" Given Superbly Artistic Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To the eye as to the ear the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon presented curious contrasts. For Beethoven's First Symphony, which began the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky reduced the number of strings, as is now his judicious way with 18th century pieces. Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique," which followed, called for a band of 13, plus 10 alto singers, while Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," assembled, as it seemed by comparison, a veritable army of instrumentalists.

LOURIE'S MUSIC DISMAL

The oddly styled sonata by Arthur Lourie, a Russian, who lives in Paris, a Jew whose forebears turned to Christianity, was first intended by Dr. Koussevitzky for performance at the concerts of last week. Fortunately, Dr. Koussevitzky saw the light and postponed it. Here is no music for the holiday season, even if the Latin words of the second and fourth sections, in which the singers are used, had not specifically to do with the crucifixation. For Lourie's music, scored for wind instruments, four stringed basses and pianoforte, is dismal, lugubrious; music suggestive of sackcloth and ashes.

When the final chord of this sonata died away the audience seemed not to realize that the piece was ended, and there was no answering applause until Dr. Koussevitzky turned on the stand as if to signify that hand-clapping was in order. Indeed he had completed part of his journey toward the green room ere the perfunctory plaudits were forthcoming. Plainly few had found Lourie's sonata, music of undoubted sincerity and individuality of expression, to their liking.

Make Strauss Imposing

How different was the reception accorded the "Heldenleben," which yesterday, for all its extreme length, and the strain it imposes on the listening ear and the receiving mind, scored a popular success.

In turn these long-continued signs of approbation were acknowledged by Dr. Koussevitzky, who had conducted with sympathy, understanding and a quickening ardor; by Mr. Burgin, who had played as virtuoso and poetizing musician the difficult and important part for solo violin, and by all the players of the orchestra who had responded nobly to Dr. Koussevitzky's efforts to make songful each strand of the contrapuntal web, to bring clarity and proportion out of Strauss' maze of notes, to characterize the hero, his snarling adversaries, his coy, yet tender helpmeet, his brave challenge to the world, his mighty struggle, and his final retreat from the sphere of action into that of contemplation.

32 Years of Age

Next March will bring the 32nd anniversary of the first performance of this remarkably conceived, remarkably executed tone-poem which at that time must have seemed, as we know in fact that it did, a baffling, confusing, overwhelmingly distracting music. Today "A Hero's Life" is far easier of comprehension, yet not all who sit in critical places are willing to admit that the later symphonic Strauss is the greater Strauss, to accept the obvious parallel with Wagner and place the second Richard's "Don Juan," "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel" with the "Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser" and "Lohengrin," his "Zarathustra," "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote" and Alpine Symphony with "Tristan," "Meistersinger," "Parsifal" and the "Ring."

Like Mahler and Bruckner, the Strauss of the later tone-poem is a debatable figure, by some adored, by others suspected.

FOR MORE JAN. Comments see Page 957 to 103

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 14 1930

MUSIC NOTES

Revised Symphony Program for Tuesday Night Concert

Handel and Mozart Brought Up to Fill Line When Stravinsky and Nabokov Have to Be Dropped. Koussevitzky Retains Tschaikowski

Instead of the program originally announced, Handel and Mozart will replace the moderns, Stravinsky and Nabokov, at the Boston Symphony concert Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre. These revisions have been made because of a temporary illness suffered by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the lack of time to rehearse the new works, as is stated by Warren Storey Smith in his program notes elsewhere on this page. Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, with which the band is of course familiar, remains the sole survivor of what was once to have been an all-Russian concert. Now it is, broadly speaking, an all-classic one. The Handel work is the Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B-minor, No. 12, and for Mozart Dr. Koussevitzky will present his Symphony in G-minor (K. No. 550). The Tschaikowsky symphony will close the program.

In his free lecture at the Providence Public Library this afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, Dr. W. Louis Chapman will describe the music to be played and illustrate the principal themes upon the piano. Books on music and composers and the scores in the library's possession will be reserved for those who wish to consult them. The lecture is under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

* * *

The next meeting of the MacDowell Club will be held tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock at the home of Mrs. Frank E. Waterman, 205 Elmgrove avenue. Following the business meeting a musical program, arranged by Mrs. E. Lindsey Cummings, will be given as follows: Soprano solos by Mrs. Howard Bacon, with Mrs. Walter C. Slade, accompanist. 'Cello solos, "Song of Vermland," Sandby; "Gavotte in D," Popper; "Apres un Reve," Faure. Miss Louise S. Waterman, Mrs. Louise Farnum Durfee, accompanist. Group of contralto solos. Mrs. Charles Clarke, Mrs. Raymond W. Perry, accompanist. Piano solos. "Nocturne," Griffes; "Rhapsody," Dohnanyi; "Intermezzo," Brahms, Mrs. Dorothy Joslin Pearce.

* * *

The series of noonday organ recitals given by J. Sebastian Matthews at Grace Church will be continued Tuesday and Friday, with Miss Elizabeth Allsop, violinist, assisting. The program for this, the last week, will include old "noels" by the early composers Le Begue, Pachelbel, Clerambault and Bach. Monday and Friday at the same time, Mr. Matthews's talks at the hymn-singing services will conclude the Advent series at the church.

* * *

The second of the series of concerts at the Stewart Street Baptist Church comes Wednesday night at 8:15 o'clock with the following taking part: Vesper Trio, Benjamin Premack, violinist; Everett Brown, 'cellist, and Eva Webber, pianist; Stewart Street Duo, Elsie Waddington and Thomas Barks; Vivian Place, harpist; assisting pianist, Annie Rienstra; organist at M. E. Tabernacle; Harry Hughes, baritone, Eva Webber, organist and director. The program will be: "Noel Languedocien," Schumann-Guilmant, Stewart Street Duo; soprano and tenor duet, harp solos, "Reverie," Rogers; "Priere," Hasselmans. Baritone solos, "The Gypsy Trail," Galloway; "A Chip of the Old Block," Squire. Vesper Trio, "Bouree," Bach; "Symfoni," Mendelssohn-Bartholdy; "Bauerntanz," Hartmann. 'Cello solo, "Fond Recollections" violin solos, "Chant Negre," Kramer; Waltz in A-major, Brahms-Hochstein. Baritone solos, "Banjo Song," Homer; "Coming Home," Willeby. Harp solos, Adagio, Verdalle; "Filpse" ("Spinning Song"), Hasselmans. Organ and piano, "Hallelujah Chorus," Handel

* * *

At the meeting of the Ensemble Club at Miss Larry's studio Wednesday morning at 8:30 o'clock the subject will be "Handel." Music from "The Messiah" will be played.

OUTSIDE READING ON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The music collection of the Providence Public Library has all the music to be played by the Boston Symphony Tuesday night including the Handel and Mozart works that have been substituted for the Stravinsky and Nabokov numbers. There is a miniature orchestral score of the Tschaikowsky symphony and arrangements for piano one of the latter included in the Ampico Symphony series, edited by Percy Grainger, which music students find helpful.

Following its custom of ordering music lacking from its files as soon as a symphony program is announced, the library procured Stravinsky's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, recently, which was to have been played, it is in an arrangement for two pianos, four hands, made by the composer. The Nabokov symphony is not yet available for general distribution.

The "Program Book" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contains Mr. Nabakov's symphony with extracts from Boston (Oct. 31-Nov. 1) issue of the American newspaper criticisms of the premiere by Olin Downes, on the occasion of its performance in New York and, earlier, in Paris, Sabaneev, when it was first given in Paris. Sabaneev is the author of "Modern Russian Composers," which contains an interesting account of Stravinsky's life and music.

Some other good reading on Stravinsky is found in "Contemporary Russian Composers," by Montagu-Nathan; "Musical Portraits," by Rosenfeld; and "Music After the Great War," by Via Vechten.

Tschaikowski himself gave the programmatic basis of his Fourth Symphony in his correspondence which has been published under the title "Life and Letters of Peter Ilich Tschaikowski," edited from the Russian by Rosa Newmarch. A good analysis of it and musical notation of the principal themes is found in "Master of the Symphony," by Goetschius, one of the books adopted by the National Federation of Music Clubs for its study course in music understanding.

The Russian folk melody "The Birch Tree," the theme of the final movement, is included in many collections. "Folk Songs of Many Peoples," by Botsford, and "Chansons Nationales Russes," by Rimsky-Korsakow.

Among other material which will aid in the study and enjoyment of the symphony are such books as "Story of Symphony," by Lee; "Symphonies and their Meaning," by Goepp; "Modern Symphonic Forms," by Stoeckel; "The Lure of Music," by Downes; and a series of biological sketches as "Master Musicians," by Finck; and "Famous Composers," by Dyer.

PUBLIC MUSICALE BY CHOPIN CLUB

The Chopin Club [illegible] its third musicale [illegible] which will take place Thursday [illegible] at 8:15 o'clock in the Beneficent Congregational Church [illegible] arranged by [illegible] will feature compositions by Mrs. Florence Newell Barbour, honorary member, and Miss Margaret A. Gardner, librarian of the club. In addition to the members, Bertil O. Larson, tenor, and Millard E. Ashley, bass, will appear. A luncheon for members of the executive board will be held in the private dining room of the Plantations Club following the musicale. The numbers follow:

Organ, overture to the opera "Alcina," Handel; "Pastorale," Ole Bull; Allegro ma con troppo, from the Organ Sonata in A-Minor, Felix Borowski; "A Summer Morning," Florence Newell Barbour, Herbert Chandler Thrasher. Recitative, "Comfort Ye My People," Handel; aria, "Every Valley Shall be Exalted," from the "Messiah," Berrick Schloss, tenor. Duet, "He Shall Feed His Flock," Handel; "Come Unto Him," from "The Messiah," Adele Durrant Kean, alto; Edith Woodhead Marshall, soprano. Harp and organ, Largo, from "New World" Symphony, Dvorak; "Holy Night," Gruber, Marion Waterman Wilson, harpist; Herbert Chandler Thrasher, organist. Aria, "O bona patria"), from "Hora Novissima," Horatio W. Parker, Edith Woodhead Marshall, soprano. Song, "Holy Night," Adam, Berrick Schloss, tenor; Marion Waterman Wilson, harpist; Herbert Chandler Thrasher, organist. Quartet, "America the Beautiful" (dedicated to Mrs. G. W. [illegible] Ritchie), Margaret A. Gardner; "Hear My Cry, O God," Kopyloff; "Open Our Eyes," W. C. Macfarlane; Russian Christmas carols, "Christmas Bells," Rebikoff; "In a Manger," Ippolitoff-Ivanoff; "Glory to God," Archangelsky. Edith Woodhead Marshall, soprano; Adele Durrant Kean, alto; Bertil O. Larson, tenor; Millard E. Ashley, bass.

Mary G. Ledgerwood, contralto, of New York, and Rene Viau, pianist, will be the soloists at the annual "Artists' Concert" of the Chaminade Club on Friday afternoon, Jan. 2, in the Plantations auditorium. Harvey O. Brown will be accompanist for Miss Ledgerwood.

* * *

A program of French music will be offered at the third musicale of the Beethoven Club Thursday evening in Harris Hall, Woonsocket. The soloists will be Eva Meunier, soprano; Leonard Mailloux, baritone; John Pietribiasi, violinist, and Rene Viau, pianist. The accompanists will be Mr. Viau and Alfred Plante.

Mr. Mailloux's numbers include "Qui Donc Commande," from Saint-Saens's opera, "Henry VIII;" Massenet's "Elegie" and "Serenade," and an aria from Gounod's "Philomen et Baucis." Mrs. Meunier will sing "Je Dis Qui Rien ne M'Epouvante," from "Carmen" and "Les Filles de Cadix," by Delibes. Both will sing songs by Chaminade. French instrumental music will be represented by Cesar Franck's violin and piano sonata. Those interested in attending the musicale should communicate with Mrs. Florence Mulvy-Vanasse at 103 Prospect street, Woonsocket.

Handel and Mozart Works Replace Russian Moderns

Lack of Time for Rehearsal Prevents Stravinsky and Nabokov From Being Played by Boston Symphony. Tschaikowski Remains as Scheduled

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Had Dr. Koussevitzky not fallen ill at the end of the Beethoven Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave in Washington a fortnight ago, Providence would have heard from him and his band at the Albee Theatre Tuesday evening an all-Russian program with compositions by Stravinsky, Nabokov and Tschaikowski. Now, owing to lack of time for rehearsal, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, as yet unheard in Boston, has disappeared from the list, and with it the symphony of Nabokov. In their place stand two classics, Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, in B-minor, and the G-minor Symphony of Mozart.

As Providence would have discovered had things remained unaltered, neither the present-day Stravinsky of the Capriccio nor the youthful Nabokov is especially formidable. But for every hearer who craves the new in music there are at least a dozen who prefer the tried and true (which incidentally was itself once new and debatable), so that the change of program will undoubtedly please more than it disappoints.

Although he did not wear his heart upon his sleeve and although he avowed no program for his music, in which content is always subservient to form, the Mozart of the G-minor Symphony, one of the three which he wrote in the summer of 1789, is himself something of a romanticist, anticipating by some three decades the Schubert of the "Unfinished" Symphony, also classic in structure but distinctly personal in expression. The little G-minor, the symphony without trumpets or drums, is tinged with a melancholy that must have represented something more than the pattern-making in tones, the fashioning of beautiful sounds and of melodies spirited, gay or placid, that was the be-all and end-all of the classical symphony.

The chromaticism of the G-minor Sympany, too, hints of music's new day that was to dawn with the turning of the century. For their own time Mozart's modulations were daring; in a symphony in G-minor such keys as F-sharp minor and C-sharp minor were employed, and even emphasized. And the slow movement strikes a profounder note than any that Mozart had sounded before. There is, indeed, an intensity of expression that suggests not Beethoven, but Beethoven's successors. It is the G-minor Symphony more than any other of his works that makes us feel the tragedy of Mozart's early death. Beside it the first two symphonies of Beethoven, for all their greater vigor and brilliance, are superficial and immature.

But if we cannot find the simon-pure classicist in Mozart of this symphony, we can find him in Handel of the 12 Concerti Grossi for strings which he wrote in the space of one month in the autumn of 1739. This Twelfth Concerto, in B-minor, has long been overlooked by Dr. Koussevitzky's predecessors, and most unjustly, since its general level of interest is sufficiently high and its slow movement is one of Handel's finest. The broad chief melody of this movement, in which Italian sweetness and German strength are happily blended, is as typically Handelian, as that of the celebrated Largo from "Xerxes."

The remaining piece, Tschaikowski's Fourth Symphony, is, of course, romanticism of the deepest dye. Tschaikowski had no inhibitions. That which he felt, re expressed. And his feelings were considerably more violent than those of most people. They were violent even for a Russian. The Fourth Symphony, composed in 1878 and dedicated to Tschaikowski's benefactress, Mrs. Von Meck, whose face he never beheld, was written to an avowed program. This program, set forth at great length in a letter to the wealthy widow, will be quoted in full in Mr. Hale's program notes. Reduced to the fewest possible words, it represents man's endeavor to escape from his fate, his crushing destiny. That anyone's destiny might be a pleasant or a favorable one would never have occurred to the morbid, self-tortured and introspective composer of the "Pathetic" Symphony. The fate motive in the Fourth Symphony, announced at the outset, recurs ever and anon as a reminder that the sword of Damocles still hangs over a man's head. Incidentally Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Fourth Symphony has recently and to an uncommon degree stirred audiences and astonished reviewers both in Boston and in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, O.
SUN

DEC 14 1930

Bringing gifts of composers on its fiftieth jubilee year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the first time this season with a sold-out subscription recently in New York at Carnegie Hall and large audiences in Brooklyn.

Serge Koussevitzky introduced at the concert the new symphony of Albert Roussel which has been especially written for the anniversary of the orchestra and was performed last month in Boston in the presence of the composer.

The "Symphonie Lyrique" of Nicolas Nabokoff was the new piece of the afternoon concert, which had an all-Russian program. Nabokoff, a young composer who has received considerable attention in Europe recently, was introduced by this symphony to America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES

DEC 14 1930

Koussevitzky

The Boston conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, has enjoyed making some records of his double-bass playing. While they are notable as examples of the expressiveness possible to the slow-speaking bass viol the limitations of this instrument, which at best sounds like a heavy 'cello, preclude any great beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
EVE. WORLD HERALD

DEC

Hanson Sym

Musical Journals Tell Orchestra

Leading musical journals this week bring the first account of the premiere of the "Romantic Symphony," the work of Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, Neb., now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y.

The work, written at the order of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was played first on November 28, and will be included in the orchestra's repertory. It marks the jubilee celebration of the founding of the Boston orchestra.

Of his work, Dr. Hanson writes, in the program notes:

Composer Tells Purpose.

"Concerning my second symphony, as the subtitle implies, it represents for me a definite and acknowledged embracing of the romantic phase. My aim in this symphony has been to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament, simple and direct in expression."

Musical America said of the symphony:

"Dr. Hanson's symphony is constructed somewhat upon the Franckian and D'Indyan idea of germination from one or two motives. The work progresses

phony Played

of Premiere at Boston 's Jubilee.

through an introduction and three movements. The first measure of the introduction provides the material most used in the symphony.

Describes Symphony.

"Toward the end of the introduction, an ascending figure of two successive fourths constitutes another recurrent theme.

"The first movement is in sonata form. The second, andante con tenerezza, in addition to its chief theme in flutes, refers back to material used in the first movement. The final allegro con brio brings a concluding development of the most significant themes of the work."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 17 1930

Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony

Noted Orchestra Plays Second Providence Concert of Season.

Two symphonies and a concerto, representing the traditional school of 18th century music and the modern of the 19th as distinguished from what may be termed the ultra-modern of the 20th, formed the programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence last evening. It was the second visit of the Boston players to the Albee Theatre this season, and the audience, as usual, filled the playhouse to its capacity.

To those accustomed to the administration of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston players there comes a mild surprise on reading a programme such as this, for one confidently depends upon him to produce a novelty. The hearer may not like it on the first hearing, but he has moved along with musical history and so appreciates the opportunities offered. Last evening, however, Dr. Koussevitzky did not conduct, as he was forced to rest because of illness. His place was ably taken by the talented, scholarly concert master, Richard Burgin, and the programme consisted of these numbers: Handel's 'Concerto Grosso," for string orchestra; Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony in F minor.

Too much can hardly be said in appreciation of the graceful, devoted interpretation given by Mr. Burgin and the players to the first two numbers, and of these perhaps the Mozart work made the greatest impression. Beautiful as they are, the compositions of Mozart seem far away when viewed in the light of the moderns, yet when they are played as this symphony was rendered last evening the hearer is inclined for the moment to forget that there is really any great music other than that of Mozart and his time.

But such an expression would be dispelled by the splendid Tchaikovsky symphony which followed. Rough, even rude in comparison with Mozart, the great Russian also could call up the daintiest beauties and utilize them according to his own noble purposes. The fourth symphony was given magnificent treatment by Mr. Burgin, who led with vigor and power, the great band responding as one man. Like the march of a conquering army with banners flying, drums beating and cannon thundering, momentarily halted by an interruption represented by the fanciful thrumming of the [illegible] the famous third movement, the work sweeps onward to a glorious finish which brings the auditor up from his seat. Mr. Burgin and the whole orchestra are to be congratulated on the splendid spirit with which they played this number, a fitting ending to a notable concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COVINGTON, KY.
POST

DEC 16 1930

RUSSIAN WILL CONDUCT HERE

Berezowsky To Be Guest Conductor of Symphony

The young Russian composer and conductor, Nicolai Berezowsky, has been engaged as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra for the 11th pair of concerts, Jan 16 and 17, Herbert G. French, chairman of the Symphony Board has announced.

BEREZOWSKY

Berezowsky is coming to America expressly to conduct concerts in Cincinnati and as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will return to Europe immediately following these engagements.

Berezowsky, born in Leningrad—then St. Petersburg—in 1900, displayed his musical talents early, so that at 8 he was appointed to the Royal Capella, from which he was graduated with highest honors at 16. He continued his studies at Moscow and Vienna, later becoming a student in the Juilliard Graduate School in New York.

Shortly after his arrival in America, Berezowsky became a member of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Returning to Europe, Berezowsky entered the concert field, and soon attracted attention by his talent as a conductor. His original compositions also made a favorable impression. Recently he scored a great personal triumph as guest conductor of the famous Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 17 1930

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Season's Second Concert

Richard Burgin Conducts in Absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, and Critic Says Concert Was "Most Delightful and Satisfying"—Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony is Rendered.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season last night at the Albee Theatre. In the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, concert-master, conducted.

Whether or not so intended, this program represented in a striking way the progress and development of the art of music for the past 200 years, comprising as it did the Concerto Grosso of about 1720 with so many familiar and quite characteristic Handelian figures, the symphony in G-minor of Mozart, who in many ways followed and improved upon Haydn, and the large sculptured Tschaikovsky with a barbaric militarism and contrasting folk songs.

The program:

Handel....Concerto Grosse for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro
Mozart.....Symphony in G minor (Koechel No. 550)
I. Allegro molto
II. Andante
III. Menuetto: Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro assai
Tschaikowsky...Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto: moderato con anima (In movimento di valse)
II. Andantino in modo di canzona
III. Scherzo: pizzicato ostinato
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco

These compositions represent also the march of the history and culture of the periods and countries to which they belonged. The union of these musical and period associations is most interesting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the past few years under the directorship of Dr. Koussevitzky, has played more of the compositions of Bach and Handel than ever before in its history, with resulting proficiency and perfection of performance. Under his vigorous and learned direction it has become straight-forward in intent, rounded in form and graceful in line to a point where his readings are authoritative and entirely consonant with the composer's intentions.

Stately largo and larghetto paired with crisp and rhythmic allegro together with largeness of string beauty made this grand old concerto a thing to be remembered and played with more interest than ever before.

Perfect Interpretation

Although the G-minor symphony of Mozart recalls the sonata period of our youth, yet it may be justly claimed that no one should ever outgrow that time of life or its music. The orchestra gave this beautiful work with the lightness and tuneful artistry which entirely suits its changing moods, and its interchange of brass, wood wind and string choirs [illegible] virtuosity of a pres[illegible] with such [illegible]s. The An[illegible]e and lovelio[illegible]zart's most [illegible] be read an[illegible] emotions. [illegible]s it in sim[illegible]c invention. [illegible]inuetto and [illegible]y finale "Al[illegible]ed as one of [illegible] beautiful ex[illegible] samples of Mozart's orchest[illegible]dic facility. Its contrapu[illegible]ments are perfect and hol[illegible] and the episode in B flat[illegible] a pleasing change from [illegible] more severe mood of G [illegible] Mr. Burgin the orchestra [illegible] movement with admirable [illegible] and at a pace that would overtax any but the ablest players.

In the Tschaikovsky fourth Symphony the scene is changed from the court drawing room to the Russian village, from the powdered wigs and swords of Muscovite cimiters, from silk stockings and buckled shoes to boots, saddles and dolmans. Barbaric fanfare supplants the minuet, crashing chords and sturdy waltz the runs and trills.

The grace of Tschaikovsky is impressive and more profound in its emotion and the more elaborate orchestration with additional parts and orchestra twice the size offers opportunities for musical expression of which Mozart hardly dreamed. The orchestra was quick to rise to the artistic heights of this great symphony and long knowledge of it gave an impression of ripe maturity which was evident throughout the performance. The brass choir was splendid in its richness, the strings sonorous in their mass or plaintive in simplicity, as opportunity offered, and the perfection of intonation of the percussion and its impeccable accent added immeasurably to the presentations.

Splendid Wood Wind

In many florid passages for wood wind in this symphony, clarity of articulation, precision of attack and release and beauty of tone quality were everywhere evident. The tossing of musical figures back and forth among the choirs is quite characteristic of Tschaikowsky and a thing which calls for the highest virtuosity on the part of the performers. At no time were there hesitation of tempo, technical errors or lack of nuance to mar the perfection of the performance.

The unity of ensemble of the strings in the pizzicato movements was most unusual in its pianissimo. This is the longest number of its kind in music and was superbly played. The string section of this orchestra is surpassed by none and the technical brilliance of the plucked strings contrasts interestingly with the luscious beauty of bowed passages. Many of the members play upon fine old Italian instruments which greatly assists in the esthetic results. The spirit of the Old Luthiers still lives among these fine musicians and beautifies their interpretations of the great masters of music.

With a friendly orchestra Mr. Burgin made a splendid impression upon a devoted public. He was recalled after each appearance and at the end of the concert both conductor and orchestra received the warmest and most cordial applause. This reception was distinctly merited. In the Concerto Grosse Mr. Burgin led the strings with great artistry in true and traditional Handelian fashion. Those who might be familiar with this work would notice with great satisfaction his long retards placed a dozen or more measures before cadences instead of with the last bar or two as is so often done. The soloists were given sufficient prominence to make their voices plainly heard but without obtrusion.

In the Mozart symphony rhythmic sensitiveness and carefully measured tone values and colors made a worthy presentation of this beautiful work. The Allegro assai was taken at a very rapid pace almost alla breve, yet all articulation was clear and precise, all phrasings clean and limpid.

In the Tschaikowsky no ordinary conducting but veritable interpretation. Many times it was possible to discern instant responses to the conductor's wishes and his reserve in parts that may be easily rushed or clouded was particularly to be praised. Mr. Burgin made a thing of beauty and delight of a work that may easily be noisy and coarse.

Almost delightful and satisfying concert.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

-:- MUSIC -:-

MR. BURGIN CONDUCTS

Because the renowned Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is still suffering from the effects of a cold, the baton at last night's Boston Symphony Concert in the Albee Theatre was in the hands of Richard Burgin. Mr. Burgin, whose established position is that of concert-master, has been performing like service in Boston during the last few weeks. Naturally he needed no introduction to Providence where he is regarded as one of the two outstanding stars of a completely stellar system, the other being of course, Jean Bedetti, the famous 'cellist.

Mr. Burgin must have been highly pleased by his reception here, which was both warm-hearted and well-deserved. At the outset he seemed to lack self-confidence, but as he warmed to his work, that indispensable quality came into evidence. Without the magisterial air or flaming temperament of Dr. Koussevitzky, he has admirable qualities of his own including a scrupulous regard for accurate readings. You can hardly imagine Mr. Burgin saying to any composer what Toscanini recently said to Ravel, for example. Ravel remonstrated with the great master for playing the brilliant "Bolero" too fast. "You don't play it as it is written," said Ravel. "No," said Toscanini coolly, "but I play it much better."

All three of the compositions in which Mr. Burgin led last night have Orchestra in B-minor, No. 12; Mozart's Symphony in G-minor (Koechel No. 550), and Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F-minor.

Mr. Burgin made no attempts at conductorial virtuosity. Able and sincere musician that he is, he let the music, as far as possible, speak for itself, helping it only to say what sound tradition holds it should say. In the case of absolute music such as the Handel and Mozart compositions really are, the advantages of such an attitude are greatest, but they are not always so evident in programme music which lends itself to such highly individualized interpretation as does the Tchaikowsky symphony. It was in the latter that the brilliant intuition of Dr. Koussevitzky was missed most last night. So that the general impression left by the evening was that of a lovely but unexciting adventure, the placidity of a lake at sunset (in spite of all the deep protests and challenge of the Tchaikowsky exception.) We left happy, indeed, and well satisfied but without that mood of slightly bewildered ecstasy in which Di[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 17 1930

Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony

Noted Orchestra Plays Second Providence Concert of Season..

Two symphonies and a concerto, representing the traditional school of 18th century music and the modern of the 19th as distinguished from what may be termed the ultra-modern of the 20th, formed the programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence last evening. It was the second visit of the Boston players to the Albee Theatre this season, and the audience, as usual, filled the playhouse to its capacity.

istration of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston players there comes a mild surprise on reading a programme such as this, for one confidently depends upon him to produce a novelty. The hearer may not like it on the first hearing, but he has moved along with musical history and so appreciates the opportunities offered. Last evening, however, Dr. Koussevitzky did not conduct, as he was forced to rest because of illness. His place was ably taken by the talented, scholarly concert master, Richard Burgin, and the programme consisted of these numbers: Handel's 'Concerto Grosso," for string orchestra; Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony in F minor.

Too much can hardly be said in appreciation of the graceful, devoted interpretation given by Mr. Burgin and the players to the first two numbers, and of these perhaps the Mozart work made the greatest impression. Beautiful as they are, the compositions of Mozart seem far away when viewed in the light of the moderns, yet when they are played as this symphony was rendered last evening the hearer is inclined for the moment to forget that there is really any great music other than that of Mozart and his time.

But such an expression would be dispelled by the splendid Tchaikovsky symphony which followed. Rough, even rude in comparison with Mozart, the great Russian also could call up the daintiest beauties and utilize them according to his own noble purposes. The fourth symphony was given magnificent treatment by Mr. Burgin, who led with vigor and power, the great band responding as one man. Like the march of a conquering army with banners flying, drums beating and cannon thundering, momentarily halted by an interruption represented by the fanciful thrumming of the strings in the famous third movement, the work sweeps onward to a glorious finish which brings the auditor up from his seat. Mr. Burgin and the whole orchestra are to be congratulated on the splendid spirit with which they played this number, a fitting ending to a notable concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
EVE. BEE NEWS

DEC 17 1930

Journals Review Hanson Symphony

The symphony written by Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., for the Boston Symphony orchestra is reviewed in leading musical journals this week. The symphony is entitled "Romantic Symphony" and was written for the jubilee celebration of the founding of the Boston orchestra. It was first played on Nov. 28.

The symphony will be added to the repertory of the Boston orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
WORLD HERALD

Hanson Symp

Musical Journals Tell Orchestra's

Leading music journals this week bring the first account of the premiere of the "Romantic Symphony," the work of Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, Neb., now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y.

The work, written at the order of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was played [illegible] November 28, and will be included in the orchestra's repertory. It marks the jubilee celebration of the founding of the Boston orchestra.

hony Played

f Premiere at Boston Jubilee.

Of his work, Dr. Hanson writes, in the program notes:

Composer Tells Purpose.

"Concerning my second symphony, as the subtitle implies, it represents for me a definite and acknowledged embracing of the romantic phase. My aim in this symphony has been to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament, simple and direct in expression."

Musical America said of the symphony:

"Dr. Hanson's symphony is constructed somewhat upon the Franckian and D'Indyan idea of germination from one or two motives. The work progresses through an introduction and three movements. The first measure of the introduction provides the material most used in the symphony.

Describes Symphony.

"Toward the end of the introduction, an ascending figure of two successive fourths constitutes another recurrent theme.

"The first movement is in sonata form. The second, andante con tenerezza, in addition to its chief theme in flutes, refers back to material used in the first movement. The final allegro con brio brings a concluding development of the most significant themes of the work."

INTENTIONAL SECOND EXPOSURE

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, O.
SUN

DEC 14 1930

...ringing gifts of composers on its ...iftieth jubilee year, the Boston ...ymphony Orchestra was heard for ...he first time this season with a ...old-out subscription recently in ...ew York at Carnegie Hall and ...arge audiences in Brooklyn.

Serge Koussevitzky introduced at ...he concert the new symphony of ...Albert Roussel which has been ...pecially written for the anniversary ...f the orchestra and was performed ...st month in Boston in the pres...nce of the composer.

The "Symphonie Lyrique" of Nico... Nabokoff was the new piece of ...e afternoon concert, which had ...all-Russian program. Nabokoff, a ...une composer who has received ...nsiderable attention in Europe re...ntly, was introduced by this sym...phony to America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES

Koussevitzky

The Boston conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, has enjoyed making some records of his double-bass playing. While they are notable as examples of the expressiveness possible to the slow-speaking bass viol the limitations of this instrument, which at best sounds like a heavy 'cello, preclude any great beauty.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
EVE. WORLD HERALD

Hanson Sym...

Musical Journals Tell ... Orchestra

Leading ... journals this week bring the first account of the premiere of the "Romantic Symphony," the work of Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, Neb., now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y.

The work, written at the order of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was played first on November 28, and will be included in the orchestra's repertory. It marks the jubilee celebration of the founding of the Boston orchestra.

Of his work, Dr. Hanson writes, in the program notes:

Composer Tells Purpose.

"Concerning my second symphony, as the subtitle implies, it represents for me a definite and acknowledged embracing of the romantic phase. My aim in this symphony has been to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament, simple and direct in expression."

Musical America said of the symphony:

"Dr. Hanson's symphony is constructed somewhat upon the Franckian and D'Indyan idea of germination from one or two motives. The work progresses through an introduction and three movements. The first measure of the introduction provides the material most used in the symphony.

...phony Played

... of Premiere at Boston ...'s Jubilee.

Describes Symphony.

"Toward the end of the introduction, an ascending figure of two successive fourths constitutes another recurrent theme.

"The first movement is in sonata form. The second, andante con tenerezza, in addition to its chief theme in flutes, refers back to material used in the first movement. The final allegro con brio brings a concluding development of the most significant themes of the work."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 17 1930

Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony

Noted Orchestra Plays Second Providence Concert of Season.

Two symphonies and a concerto, representing the traditional school of 18th century music and the modern of the 19th as distinguished from what may be termed the ultra-modern of the 20th, formed the programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence last evening. It was the second visit of the Boston players to the Albee Theatre this season, and the audience, as usual, filled the playhouse to its capacity.

To those accustomed to the administration of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston players there comes a mild surprise on reading a programme such as this, for one confidently depends upon him to produce a novelty. The hearer may not like it on the first hearing, but he has moved along with musical history and so appreciates the opportunities offered. Last evening, however, Dr. Koussevitzky did not conduct, as he was forced to rest because of illness. His place was ably taken by the talented, scholarly concert master, Richard Burgin, and the programme consisted of these numbers: Handel's "Concerto Grosso," for string orchestra; Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony in F minor.

Too much can hardly be said in appreciation of the graceful, devoted interpretation given by Mr. Burgin and the players to the first two numbers, and of these perhaps the Mozart work made the greatest impression. Beautiful as they are, the compositions of Mozart seem far away when viewed in the light of the moderns, yet when they are played as this symphony was rendered last evening the hearer is inclined for the moment to forget that there is really any great music other than that of Mozart and his time.

But such an expression would be dispelled by the splendid Tchaikovsky symphony which followed. Rough, even rude in comparison with Mozart, the great Russian also could call up the daintiest beauties and utilize them according to his own noble purposes. The fourth symphony was given magnificent treatment by Mr. Burgin, who led with vigor and power, the great band responding as one man. Like the march of a conquering army with banners flying, drums beating and cannon thundering, momentarily halted by an interruption represented by the fanciful thrumming of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM COVINGTON, KY.
POST

DEC 16 1930

RUSSIAN WILL CONDUCT HERE

Berezowsky To Be Guest Conductor of Symphony

The young Russian composer and conductor, Nicolai Berezowsky, has been engaged as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra for the 11th pair of concerts, Jan 16 and 17, Herbert G. French, chairman of the Symphony Board has announced.

BEREZOWSKY

Berezowsky is coming to America expressly to conduct concerts in Cincinnati and as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will return to Europe immediately following these engagements.

Berezowsky, born in Leningrad—then St. Petersburg—in 1900, displayed his musical talents early, so that at 8 he was appointed to the Royal Capella, from which he was graduated with highest honors at 16. He continued his studies at Moscow and Vienna, later becoming a student in the Juilliard Graduate School in New York.

Shortly after his arrival in America, Berezowsky became a member of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Returning to Europe, Berezowsky entered the concert field, and soon attracted attention by his talent as a conductor. His original compositions also made a favorable impression. Recently he scored a great personal triumph as guest conductor of the famous Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
EVE. BEE NEWS

Journals Review Hanson Symphony

The symphony written by Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., for the Boston Symphony orchestra is reviewed in leading musical journals this week. The symphony is entitled "Romantic Symphony" and was written for the jubilee celebration of the founding of the Boston orchestra. It was first played on Nov. 28.

The symphony will be added to the repertory of the Boston orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

89

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Season's Second Concert

Richard Burgin Conducts in Absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, and Critic Says Concert Was "Most Delightful and Satisfying"—Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony is Rendered.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season last night at the Albee Theatre. In the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, concert-master, conducted.

Whether or not so intended, this program represented in a striking way the progress and development of the art of music for the past 200 years, comprising as it did the Concerto Grosso of about 1720 with so many familiar and quite characteristic Handelian figures, the symphony in G-minor of Mozart, who in many ways followed and improved upon Haydn, and the large sculptured Tschaikovsky with a barbaric militarism and contrasting folk songs.

The program:

Handel ..... Concerto Grosse for String Orchestra in B minor No. 12
Largo—Allegro, Larghetto e piano, Largo—Allegro

Mozart ..... Symphony in G minor Koechel No. 550
I. Allegro molto
II. Andante
III. Menuetto—Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro assai

Tschaikowsky ..... Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto, moderato con anima—In movimento di valse
II. Andantino in modo di canzona
III. Scherzo: pizzicato ostinato
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco

These compositions represent also the march of the history and culture of the periods and countries to which they belonged. The union of these musical and period associations is most interesting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the past few years under the directorship of Dr. Koussevitzky, has played more of the compositions of Bach and Handel than ever before in its history, with resulting proficiency and perfection of performance. Under his vigorous and learned direction it has become straight-forward in intent, rounded in form and graceful in line to a point where his readings are authoritative and entirely consonant with the composer's intentions.

Stately largo and larghetto paired with crisp and rhythmic allegro together with largeness of string beauty made this grand old concerto a thing to be remembered and played with more interest than ever before.

Perfect Interpretation

Although the G-minor symphony of Mozart recalls the sonata period of our youth, yet it may be justly claimed that no one should ever outgrow that time of life or its music. The orchestra gave this beautiful work with the lightness and tuneful artistry which entirely suits its changing moods and its interchange of brass, wood wind and string choirs with such ... The Andante and lovely ... Mozart's most ... be read an ... emotions. ... as it in sim... invention. ... minuetto and ... finale "Al... ed as one of ... beautiful ex... which Mr. Burgin led last night have hardly dreamed. The orchestra was quick to rise to the artistic heights of this great symphony and long knowledge of it gave an impression of ripe maturity which was evident throughout the performance. The brass choir was splendid in its richness, the strings sonorous in their mass or plaintive in simplicity, as opportunity offered, and the perfection of intonation of the percussion and its impeccable accent added immeasurably to the presentations.

Splendid Wood Wind

In many florid passages for wood wind in this symphony, clarity of articulation, precision of attack and release and beauty of tone quality were everywhere evident. The tossing of musical figures back and forth among the choirs is quite characteristic of Tschaikowsky and a thing which calls for the highest virtuosity on the part of the performers. At no time were there hesitation of tempo, technical errors or lack of nuance to mar the perfection of the performance.

The unity of ensemble of the strings in the pizzicato movements was most unusual in its pianissimo. This is the longest number of its kind in music and was superbly played. The string section of this orchestra is surpassed by none and the technical brilliance of the plucked strings contrasts interestingly with the luscious beauty of bowed passages. Many of the members play upon fine old Italian instruments which greatly assists in the esthetic results. The spirit of the Old Luthiers still lives among these fine musicians and beautifies their interpretations of the great masters of music.

With a friendly orchestra Mr. Burgin made a splendid impression upon a devoted public. He was recalled after each appearance and at the end of the concert both conductor and orchestra received the warmest and most cordial applause. This reception was distinctly merited. In the Concerto Grosse Mr. Burgin led the strings with great artistry in true and traditional Handelian fashion. Those who might be familiar with this work would notice with great satisfaction his long retards placed a dozen or more measures before cadences instead of with the last bar or two as is so often done. The soloists were given sufficient prominence to make their voices plainly heard but without obtrusion.

In the Mozart symphony rhythmic sensitiveness and carefully measured tone values and colors made a worthy presentation of this beautiful work. The Allegro assai was taken at a very rapid pace almost alla breve, yet all articulation was clear and precise, all phrasings clean and limpid.

In the Tschaikowsky no ordinary conducting but veritable interpretation. Many times it was possible to discern instant responses to the conductor's wishes and his reserve in parts that may be easily rushed or clouded was particularly to be praised. Mr. Burgin made a thing of beauty and delight of a work that may easily be noisy and coarse.

A most delightful and satisfying concert.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

-:- MUSIC -:-

MR. BURGIN CONDUCTS

Because the renowned Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is still suffering from the effects of a cold, the baton at last night's Boston Symphony Concert in the Albee Theatre was in the hands of Richard Burgin. Mr. Burgin, whose established position is that of concert-master, has been performing like service in Boston during the last few weeks. Naturally he needed no introduction to Providence where he is regarded as one of the two outstanding stars of a completely stellar system, the other being of course, Jean Bedetti, the famous 'cellist.

Mr. Burgin must have been highly pleased by his reception here, which was both warm-hearted and well-deserved. At the outset he seemed to lack self-confidence but as he warmed to his work, that indispensable quality came into evidence. Without the magisterial air or flaming temperament of Dr. Koussevitzky, he has admirable qualities of his own including a scrupulous regard for accurate readings. You can hardly imagine Mr. Burgin saying to any composer what Toscanini recently said to Ravel, for example. Ravel remonstrated with the great master for playing the brilliant "Bolero" too fast. "You don't play it as it is written," said Ravel. "No," said Toscanini coolly, "but I play it much better."

All three of the compositions in ... Orchestra in B-minor, No. 12; Mozart's Symphony in G-minor (Koechel No. 550), and Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F-minor.

Mr. Burgin made no attempts at conductorial virtuosity. Able and sincere musician that he is, he let the music, as far as possible, speak for itself, helping it only to say what sound tradition holds it should say. In the case of absolute music such as he Handel and Mozart compositions really are, the advantages of such an attitude are greatest, but they are not always so evident in programme music which lends itself to such highly individualized interpretation as does the Tchaikowsky symphony. It was in the latter that the brilliant intuition of Dr. Koussevitzky was missed most last night. So that the general impression left by the evening was that of a lovely but unexciting adventure, the placidity of a lake at sunset (in spite of all the deep protests and challenges of the Tchaikowsky exception.) We left happy, indeed, and well satisfied but without that mood of slightly bewildered ecstasy in which Dr. ... sounds us back

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 17 1930

Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony

Noted Orchestra Plays Second Providence Concert of Season.

Two symphonies and a concerto, representing the traditional school of 18th century music and the modern of the 19th as distinguished from what may be termed the ultra-modern of the 20th, formed the programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence last evening. It was the second visit of the Boston players to the Albee Theatre this season, and the audience, as usual, filled the playhouse to its capacity.

...istration of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston players there comes a mild surprise on reading a programme such as this, for one confidently depends upon him to produce a novelty. The hearer may not like it on the first hearing, but he has moved along with musical history and so appreciates the opportunities offered. Last evening, however, Dr. Koussevitzky did not conduct, as he was forced to rest because of illness. His place was ably taken by the talented, scholarly concert master, Richard Burgin, and the programme consisted of these numbers: Handel's 'Concerto Grosso," for string orchestra; Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony in F minor.

Too much can hardly be said in appreciation of the graceful, devoted interpretation given by Mr. Burgin and the players to the first two numbers, and of these perhaps the Mozart work made the greatest impression. Beautiful as they are, the compositions of Mozart seem far away when viewed in the light of the moderns, yet when they are played as this symphony was rendered last evening the hearer is inclined for the moment to forget that there is really any great music other than that of Mozart and his time.

But such an expression would be dispelled by the splendid Tchaikovsky symphony which followed. Rough, even rude in comparison with Mozart, the great Russian also could call up the daintiest beauties and utilize them according to his own noble purposes. The fourth symphony was given magnificent treatment by Mr. Burgin, who led with vigor and power, the great band responding as one man. Like the march of a conquering army with banners flying, drums beating and cannon thundering, momentarily halted by an interruption represented by the fanciful thrumming of the strings in the famous third movement, the work sweeps onward to a glorious finish which brings the auditor up from his seat. Mr. Burgin and the whole orchestra are to be congratulated on the splendid spirit with which they played this number, a fitting ending to a notable concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
WORLD HERALD

Hanson Symp...

Musical Journals Tell ... Orchestra's

Leading music journals this week bring the first account of the premiere of the "Romantic Symphony," the work of Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, Neb., now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y.

The work, written at the order of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was played first on November 28, and will be included in the orchestra's repertory. It marks the jubilee celebration of the founding of the Boston orchestra.

...hony Played

...f Premiere at Boston ... Jubilee.

Of his work, Dr. Hanson writes, in the program notes:

Composer Tells Purpose.

"Concerning my second symphony, as the subtitle implies, it represents for me a definite and acknowledged embracing of the romantic phase. My aim in this symphony has been to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament, simple and direct in expression."

Musical America said of the symphony:

"Dr. Hanson's symphony is constructed somewhat upon the Franckian and D'Indyan idea of germination from one or two motives. The work progresses through an introduction and three movements. The first measure of the introduction provides the material most used in the symphony.

Describes Symphony.

"Toward the end of the introduction, an ascending figure of two successive fourths constitutes another recurrent theme.

"The first movement is in sonata form. The second, andante con tenerezza, in addition to its chief theme in flutes, refers back to material used in the first movement. The final allegro con brio brings a concluding development of the most significant themes of the work."

Prov. Journal Dec 17

IN TERMS OF MUSIC,
Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Second Concert of Season at Albee Theatre.—Richard Burgin Substitutes for Dr. Koussevitzky As Director

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season last night at the Albee Theatre. In the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, concert-master, conducted.

Whether or not so intended, this program represented in a striking way the progress and development of the art of music for the past 200 years, comprising as it did the Concerto Grosso of about 1720 with so many familiar and quite characteristic Handelian figures, the symphony in G-minor of Mozart, who in many ways followed and improved upon Haydn, and the large sculptured Tschaikovsky with a barbaric militarism and contrasting folk songs.

These compositions represent also the march of the history and culture of the periods and countries to which they belonged. The union of these musical and period associations is most interesting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the past few years under the directorship of Dr. Koussevitzky, has played more of the compositions of Bach and Handel than ever before in its history, with resulting proficiency and perfection of performance. Under his vigorous and learned direction it has become

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro

Mozart .....Symphony in G minor (Koechel No. 550)
I. Allegro molto
II. Andante
III. Menuetto: Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro assai

Tschaikowsky...Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto: moderato con anima (In movimento di valse)
II. Andantino in modo di canzona
III. Scherzo: pizzicato estinato
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco straight-forward in intent, rounded in form and graceful in line to a point where his readings are authoritative and entirely consonant with the composer's intentions.

Stately largo and larghetto paired with crisp and rhythmic allegro together with largeness of string beauty made this grand old concerto a thing to be remembered and played with more interest than ever before.

Perfect Interpretation

Although the G-minor symphony of Mozart recalls the sonata period of our youth, yet it may be justly claimed that no one should ever outgrow that time of life or its music. The orchestra gave this beautiful work with the lightness and tuneful artistry which entirely suits its changing moods, and its interchange of brass, wood wind and string choirs illustrated what the virtuosity of a present day orchestra can do with such charming and classic works. The Andante was of particular grace and loveliness. Into this, one of Mozart's most beautiful utterances, may be read an infinite variety of poetic emotions. Nothing of Mozart surpasses it in simplicity and beauty of melodic invention.

The more ponderous Minuetto and "Trio" prepare for the lively finale "Allegro."

This may well be accepted as one of the most interesting and beautiful examples of Mozart's orchestral and melodic facility. Its contrapuntal involvements are perfect and hold the interest and the episode in B flat major affords a pleasing change from the somewhat more severe mood of G Minor. Under Mr. Burgin the orchestra played this movement with admirable elan and brio and at a pace that would overtax any but the ablest players.

In the Tschaikovsky fourth Symphony the scene is changed from the court drawing room to the Russian village, from the powdered wigs and swords of Muscovite cimiters, from silk stockings and buckled shoes to boots, saddles and dolmans. Barbaric fanfare supplants the minuet, crashing chords and sturdy waltz the runs and trills.

The grace of Tschaikovsky is impressive and more profound in its emotion and the more elaborate orchestration with additional parts and orchestra twice the size offers opportunities for musical expression of which Mozart hardly dreamed. The orchestra was quick to rise to the artistic heights of this great symphony and long knowledge of it gave an impression of ripe maturity which was evident throughout the performance. The brass choir was splendid in its richness, the strings sonorous in their mass or plaintive in simplicity, as opportunity offered, and the perfection of intonation of the percussion and its impeccable accent added immeasurably to the presentations.

Splendid Wood Wind

In many florid passages for wood wind in this symphony, clarity of articulation, precision of attack and release and beauty of tone quality were everywhere evident. The tossing of musical figures back and forth among the choirs is quite characteristic of Tschaikowsky and a thing which calls for the highest virtuosity on the part of the performers. At no time were there hesitation of tempo, technical errors or lack of nuance to mar the perfection of the performance.

The unity of ensemble of the strings in the pizzicato movements was most unusual in its pianissimo. This is the longest number of its kind in music and was superbly played. The string section of this orchestra is surpassed by none and the technical brilliance of the plucked strings contrasts interestingly with the luscious beauty of bowed passages. Many of the members play upon fine old Italian instruments which greatly assists in the esthetic results. The spirit of the Old Luthiers still lives among these fine musicians and beautifies their interpretations of the great masters of music.

With a friendly orchestra Mr. Burgin made a splendid impression upon a devoted public. He was recalled after each appearance and at the end of the concert both conductor and orchestra received the warmest and most cordial applause. This reception was distinctly merited. In the Concerto Grosse Mr. Burgin led the strings with great artistry in true and traditional Handelian fashion. Those who might be familiar with this work would notice with great satisfaction his long retards placed a dozen or more measures before cadences instead of with the last bar or two as is so often done. The soloists were given sufficient prominence to make their voices plainly heard but without obtrusion.

In the Mozart symphony rhythmic sensitiveness and carefully measured tone values and colors made a worthy presentation of this beautiful work. The Allegro assai was taken at a very rapid pace almost alla breve, yet all articulation was clear and precise, all phrasings clean and limpid.

In the Tschaikowsky no ordinary conducting but veritable interpretation. Many times it was possible to discern instant responses to the conductor's wishes and his reserve in parts that may be easily rushed or clouded was particularly to be praised. Mr. Burgin made a thing of beauty and delight of a work that may easily be noisy and coarse.

A most delightful and satisfying concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 13 1930

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its second visit of the season to Providence to give a concert in the Albee Theatre, next Tuesday evening, at 8:15.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present Handel's "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12," Mozart's "Symphony in G Minor (K. No. 550)," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Tschaikovsky.

A free lecture on this program will be given in the Providence Public Library tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock. Dr. W. Louis Chapman will describe the music to be played and illustrate the principal themes upon the piano. The lectures have been arranged by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 1

Broadcasters don't make the front page often. They don't attack enough. Nothing like a good attack to attract attention.

Wonder why the networks don't give more consideration to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston organization is still the best known symphonic band in the land. There ought to be room for it regularly on the radio.

Whenever the microphone chiefs are hard pressed for musical programmes they go to their pantry for what they call "songs of gay Paree."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

Boston Brings New Music by Stravinsky

Myra Hess Soloist on Beethoven Program Saturday

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra which recently gave a Beethoven festival in Washington, D. C., is to be heard in a Beethoven program at the second Saturday afternoon concert of the New York season, to be given in Carnegie Hall Saturday at 2.30. Serge Koussevitzky will then present the overture, "Egmont," the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist and the Seventh Symphony in A.

At the concert of Thursday evening, Jan. 8, in Carnegie Hall, Koussevitzky will introduce to New York the new Capriccio for piano and orchestra by Stravinsky, which recently had its first American performances in Boston. Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the solo part. The program will also include Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

DEC 21

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present next Friday and Saturday in Boston Lourié's "Sonate Liturgique" in the form of four choral with a female chorus from the Cecilia Society. The Schola Cantorum of New York gave this composer "Concerto Spirituale" last year this city. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct on the same program Mahler "Das Lied von der Erde," with Richard Crooks, tenor, and Margar Matzenauer, contralto, as soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
MORN. BEE NEWS

DEC 18 1930

MUSIC JOURNALS REVIEW SYMPHONY BY DR. HANSON

The symphony written by Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., for the Boston Symphony orchestra is reviewed in leading musical journals this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TRUMPETS AMERICAN MADE.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In the music section of THE TIMES Dec. 7 there appeared an article by Henry Prunières, who in this article proceeded to state that the trumpeters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra use instruments of both French and German manufacture. This is not correct. The entire trumpet section uses Bach "C" trumpets, which were made in our factory here in New York.

In fairness to American manufacturers and as a matter of national pride, we believe you will want to correct this statement in your paper.

VINCENT BACH,
President Vincent Bach Corporation.
New York, Dec. 13, 1930.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

DEC 20 1930

New Stravinsky Works Played in Boston Concert

Ninth of Symphony Orchestra Series Also Presents Mozart and Bach Music

Psalms Give Inspiration

Critic Urges Second Hearing, Not Long Deferred

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Dec. 19.—The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, took place in Symphony Hall today. The program offered Mozart's symphony in G minor, Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," composed for the jubilee of the orchestra and played today for the first time, and his Capriccio for piano and orchestra, played for the first time in this country, and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat for organ, orchestrated by Arnold Schönberg. The orchestra was assisted by the Cecilia Society, which had been trained by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler. The pianist was J. M. Sanroma.

About the new Stravinsky works Philip Hale, music critic of "The Boston Herald," wrote as follows:

"Stravinsky went to the Psalms for inspiration, choosing the sonorous text of the vulgate verses of the 39th (the number in the King James version), verses that are prayer, an entreaty; from the 40th, in which the Psalmist rejoices that his cry was heard, that he was taken from the horrible pit and the miry clay; and the 150th, in which the people are urged, and all things that have breath, to praise the Lord with the sound of all manner of instruments. His choice of instruments for these Psalms is peculiar: no violin, no violas; but five flutes, many other wind instruments, a harp. He called for two pianos. Although the Psalmist wished organs and high sounding cymbals to give praise, Stravinsky would not be the man to be so literal in his orchestration.

Second Hearing Is Urged

"It is to be regretted that the repetition of this symphony did not take place as first announced, for much that was strange, almost foreign to the text might then have seemed pertinently eloquent. Schönberg's arrangement of Bach's organ prelude and fugue might better have been omitted. Without the repetition the concert was too long as it was.

"The orchestral interludes are the most baffling portions of the symphony at the first hearing. They seem to be purposeless; hardly designed to put one in the mood for the following text; not a musical commentary on what has preceded. Was it the composer's endeavor to be Hebraic in his music? Hebraic in spirit, after the manner of Ernest Bloch, but not too reminiscent of the synagogue? The ending of the first Psalm is indeed beautiful, originally beautiful; so is the treatment of Alleluia later. And Stravinsky escaped the temptation of making the Psalm of jubilation one prolonged shout; there is a most effective passage in it to be sung in a subdued manner, as by worshipers in awe of the majesty of the Lord. The symphony is of such importance that it demands a second hearing, one not too long deferred.

Sanromá Wins Praise

"The Capriccio is rightly named; the capriciousness is enchanting. Here is an answer, if one were needed, to the charge that Stravinsky is not a melodist when he wishes; that he can write only patterns and rhythmic experiments; that his music is only cerebral. In this Capriccio he may at times entertain the spirit of the music hall, but there is no vulgarity; his tunes are not overripe. They incite spiritual gaiety, not a tapping of heels on the floor. His gaiety flags a little for a moment in the second section, but even then the diabolically clever use of orchestral [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

21

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

DEC 27 1930

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make a second New York visit this season to Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 8 and 10. At the Thursday concert Serge Koussevitzky will introduce Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, which, played in Paris last summer, had its first American performance in Boston December 19 and 20. Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the solo part. The program will open with Mozart's Symphony in G minor and close with Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." At the Saturday matinee Koussevitzky will perform Prokofieff's new symphony, which was especially composed for the anniversary of this orchestra. The opening number will be two preludes of Bach arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli. The closing number will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

(Continued [illegible])

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

DEC 24 1930

A Visitor's Estimate.

Henry Prunieres, a French music critic, writes interestingly for the New York Times of his impressions of our symphony orchestras which he made special efforts to hear during a recent visit.

As to which American orchestra is to be considered the best, he says:

"I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

"At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. There are simply nuances to differentiate these three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

"Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!

"Frederick Stock impresses me as belonging to a category other than these two directors. One feels that his taste and make-up are essentially classical. He has a profound respect for the works he interprets, and forces himself to translate all the author's intentions, effacing himself as much as possible behind the writer. For me, he and Stokowski stand at the opposite poles. Incontestably, he is a great servant of music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second pair of New York appearances this season at Carnegie Hall on January 8 and 10. In the Thursday program, Serge Koussevitzky will introduce here Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, which had its first American performance in Boston on December 19. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist. The other numbers will be Mozart's G minor symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Revel. On the Saturday program Dr. Koussevitsky will give the symphony composed by Serge Prokofieff for the jubilee of this orchestra, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

"For the season's second set of Carnegie Hall concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has announced two novelties: for Thursday, Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, first heard in this country in Boston on December 19, and, for Saturday, Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony, Op. 47, composed for the fiftieth anniversary observance of this orchestra, and heard, for the first time anywhere, in Boston on November 14. The symphony was composed in 1929. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist in the Stravinsky work.

The other numbers for Thursday are Mozart's G minor symphony and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; for Saturday, two Bach preludes arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The program for Friday evening, January 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music has not yet been announced.

90

Prov. Journal Dec 17

IN TERMS OF MUSIC,
Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Second Concert of Season at Albee Theatre.—Richard Burgin Substitutes for Dr. Koussevitzky As Director

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season last night at the Albee Theatre. In the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, concert-master, conducted.

Whether or not so intended, this program represented in a striking way the progress and development of the art of music for the past 200 years, comprising as it did the Concerto Grosso of about 1720 with so many familiar and quite characteristic Handelian figures, the symphony in G-minor of Mozart, who in many ways followed and improved upon Haydn, and the large sculptured Tschaikovsky with a barbaric militarism and contrasting folk songs.

These compositions represent also the march of the history and culture of the periods and countries to which they belonged. The union of these musical and period associations is most interesting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the past few years under the directorship of Dr. Koussevitzky, has played more of the compositions of Bach and Handel than ever before in its history, with resulting proficiency and perfection of performance. Under his vigorous and learned direction it has become

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Handel . . Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12
Largo Allegro Larghetto e piano Largo Allegro

Mozart . . . . . Symphony in G minor (Koechel, No. 550)
I. Allegro molto
II. Andante
III. Menuetto. Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro assai

Tschaikowsky . . Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto' moderato con anima (In movimento di valse)
II. Andantino in modo di canzona
III. Scherzo: pizzicato estinato
IV. Finale Allegro con fuoco

straight-forward in intent, rounded in form and graceful in line to a point where his readings are authoritative and entirely consonant with the composer's intentions.

Stately largo and larghetto paired with crisp and rhythmic allegro together with largeness of string beauty made this grand old concerto a thing to be remembered and played with more interest than ever before.

Perfect Interpretation

Although the G-minor symphony of Mozart recalls the sonata period of our youth, yet it may be justly claimed that no one should ever outgrow that time of life or its music. The orchestra gave this beautiful work with the lightness and tuneful artistry which entirely suits its changing moods, and its interchange of brass, wood wind and string choirs illustrated what the virtuosity of a present day orchestra can do with such charming and classic works. The Andante was of particular grace and loveliness. Into this one of Mozart's most beautiful utterances, may be read an infinite variety of poetic emotions. Nothing of Mozart surpasses it in simplicity and beauty of melodic invention.

The more ponderous Minuetto and "Trio" prepare for the lively finale "Allegro."

This may well be accepted as one of the most interesting and beautiful examples of Mozart's orchestral and melodic facility. Its contrapuntal involvements are perfect and hold the interest and the episode in B flat major affords a pleasing change from the somewhat more severe mood of G Minor. Under Mr. Burgin the orchestra played this movement with admirable elan and brio and at a pace that would overtax any but the ablest players.

In the Tschaikovsky fourth Symphony the scene is changed from the court drawing room to the Russian village, from the powdered wigs and swords of Muscovite cimiters, from silk stockings and buckled shoes to boots, saddles and dolmans. Barbaric fanfare supplants the minuet, crashing chords and sturdy waltz the runs and trills.

The grace of Tschaikovsky is impressive and more profound in its emotion and the more elaborate orchestration with additional parts and orchestra twice the size offers opportunities for musical expression of which Mozart hardly dreamed. The orchestra was quick to rise to the artistic heights of this great symphony and long knowledge of it gave an impression of ripe maturity which was evident throughout the performance. The brass choir was splendid in its richness, the strings sonorous in their mass or plaintive in simplicity, as opportunity offered, and the perfection of intonation of the percussion and its impeccable accent added immeasurably to the presentations.

Splendid Wood Wind

In many florid passages for wood wind in this symphony, clarity of articulation, precision of attack and release and beauty of tone quality were everywhere evident. The tossing of musical figures back and forth among the choirs is quite characteristic of Tschaikowsky and a thing which calls for the highest virtuosity on the part of the performers. At no time were there hesitation of tempo, technical errors or lack of nuance to mar the perfection of the performance.

The unity of ensemble of the strings in the pizzicato movements was most unusual in its pianissimo. This is the longest number of its kind in music and was superbly played. The string section of this orchestra is surpassed by none and the technical brilliance of the plucked strings contrasts interestingly with the luscious beauty of bowed passages. Many of the members play upon fine old Italian instruments which greatly assists in the esthetic results. The spirit of the Old Luthiers still lives among these fine musicians and beautifies their interpretations of the great masters of music.

With a friendly orchestra Mr. Burgin made a splendid impression upon a devoted public. He was recalled after each appearance and at the end of the concert both conductor and orchestra received the warmest and most cordial applause. This reception was distinctly merited. In the Concerto Grosse Mr. Burgin led the strings with great artistry in true and traditional Handelian fashion. Those who might be familiar with this work would notice with great satisfaction his long retards placed a dozen or more measures before cadences instead of with the last bar or two as is so often done. The soloists were given sufficient prominence to make their voices plainly heard but without obtrusion.

In the Mozart symphony rhythmic sensitiveness and carefully measured tone values and colors made a worthy presentation of this beautiful work. The Allegro assai was taken at a very rapid pace almost alla breve, yet all articulation was clear and precise, all phrasings clean and limpid.

In the Tschaikowsky no ordinary conducting but veritable interpretation. Many times it was possible to discern instant responses to the conductor's wishes and his reserve in parts that may be easily rushed or clouded was particularly to be praised. Mr. Burgin made a thing of beauty and delight of a work that may easily be noisy and coarse.

A most delightful and satisfying concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its second visit of the season to Providence to give a concert in the Albee Theatre, next Tuesday evening, at 8:15.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present Handel's "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12, Mozart's "Symphony in G Minor (K. No. 550)," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Tschaikovsky.

A free lecture on this program will be given in the Providence Public Library tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock. Dr. W. Louis Chapman will describe the music to be played and illustrate the principal themes upon the piano. The lectures have been arranged by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

Broadcasters don't make the front page often. They don't attack enough. Nothing like a good attack to attract attention.

Wonder why the networks don't give more consideration to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston organization is still the best known symphonic band in the land. There ought to be room for it regularly on the radio.

Whenever the microphone chiefs are hard pressed for musical programmes they go to their pantry for what they call "songs of gay Paree."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

Boston Brings New Music by Stravinsky

Myra Hess Soloist on Beethoven Program Saturday

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra which recently gave a Beethoven festival in Washington, D. C., is to be heard in a Beethoven program at the second Saturday afternoon concert of the New York season, to be given in Carnegie Hall Saturday at 2.30. Serge Koussevitzky will then present the overture, "Egmont," the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist and the Seventh Symphony in A.

At the concert of Thursday evening, Jan. 8, in Carnegie Hall, Koussevitzky will introduce to New York the new Capriccio for piano and orchestra by Stravinsky, which recently had its first American performances in Boston. Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the solo part. The program will also include Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

New Stravinsky Works Played in Boston Concert

Ninth of Symphony Orchestra Series Also Presents Mozart and Bach Music

Psalms Give Inspiration

Critic Urges Second Hearing, Not Long Deferred

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Dec. 19.—The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, took place in Symphony Hall today. The program offered Mozart's symphony in G minor, Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," composed for the jubilee of the orchestra and played today for the first time, and his Capriccio for piano and orchestra, played for the first time in this country, and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat for organ, orchestrated by Arnold Schönberg. The orchestra was assisted by the Cecilia Society, which had been trained by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler. The pianist was J. M. Sanroma.

About the new Stravinsky works Philip Hale, music critic of "The Boston Herald," wrote as follows:

"Stravinsky went to the Psalms for inspiration, choosing the sonorous text of the vulgate verses of the 39th (the number in the King James version), verses that are prayer, an entreaty; from the 40th, in which the Psalmist rejoices that his cry was heard, that he was taken from the horrible pit and the miry clay; and the 150th, in which the people are urged, and all things that have breath, to praise the Lord with the sound of all manner of instruments. His choice of instruments for these Psalms is peculiar: no violin, no violas; but five flutes, many other wind instruments, a harp. He called for two pianos. Although the Psalmist wished organs and high sounding cymbals to give praise, Stravinsky would not be the man to be so literal in his orchestration.

Second Hearing Is Urged

"It is to be regretted that the repetition of this symphony did not take place as first announced, for much that was strange, almost foreign to the text might then have seemed pertinently eloquent. Schönberg's arrangement of Bach's organ prelude and fugue might better have been omitted. Without the repetition the concert was too long as it was.

"The orchestral interludes are the most baffling portions of the symphony at the first hearing. They seem to be purposeless; hardly designed to put one in the mood for the following text; not a musical commentary on what has preceded. Was it the composer's endeavor to be Hebraic in his music? Hebraic in spirit, after the manner of Ernest Bloch, but not too reminiscent of the synagogue? The ending of the first Psalm is indeed beautiful, originally beautiful; so is the treatment of Alleluia later. And Stravinsky escaped the temptation of making the Psalm of jubilation one prolonged shout; there is a most effective passage in it to be sung in a subdued manner, as by worshipers in awe of the majesty of the Lord. The symphony is of such importance that it demands a second hearing, one not too long deferred.

Sanroma Wins Praise

"The Capriccio is rightly named: the capriciousness is enchanting. Here is an answer, if one were needed, to the charge that Stravinsky is not a melodist when he wishes: that he can write only patterns and rhythmic experiments; that his music is only cerebral. In this Capriccio he may at times entertain the spirit of the music hall, but there is no vulgarity: his tunes are not overripe. They incite spiritual gaiety, not a tapping of heels on the floor. His gaiety flags a little for a moment in the second section, but even then the diabolically clever use of orchestral [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make a second New York visit this season to Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 8 and 10. At the Thursday concert Serge Koussevitzky will introduce Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, which, played in Paris last summer, had its first American performance in Boston December 19 and 20. Jesus Maria Sanroma will play the solo part. The program will open with Mozart's Symphony in G minor and close with Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." At the Saturday matinee Koussevitzky will perform Prokofieff's new symphony, which was especially composed for the anniversary of this orchestra. The opening number will be two preludes of Bach arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli. The closing number will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

(Continued on Page [illegible])

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
MORN. BEE NEWS

DEC 18 1930

MUSIC JOURNALS REVIEW SYMPHONY BY DR. HANSON

The symphony written by Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., for the Boston Symphony orchestra is reviewed in leading musical journals this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present next Friday and Saturday in Boston Lourié's "Sonate Liturgique" in the form of four choral with a female chorus from the Cecilia Society. The Schola Cantorum of New York gave this composer "Concerto Spirituale" last year this city. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct on the same program Mahler "Das Lied von der Erde," with Richard Crooks, tenor, and Margar Matzenauer, contralto, as soloists.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TRUMPETS AMERICAN MADE.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In the music section of THE TIMES Dec. 7 there appeared an article by Henry Prunières, who in this article proceeded to state that the trumpeters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra use instruments of both French and German manufacture. This is not correct. The entire trumpet section uses Bach "C" trumpets, which were made in our factory here in New York.

In fairness to American manufacturers and as a matter of national pride, we believe you will want to correct this statement in your paper.

VINCENT BACH,
President Vincent Bach Corporation.
New York, Dec. 13, 1930.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
C 2 U SA

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

DEC 24 1930

A Visitor's Estimate.

Henry Prunieres, a French music critic, writes interestingly for the New York Times of his impressions of our symphony orchestras which he made special efforts to hear during a recent visit.

As to which American orchestra is to be considered the best, he says:

"I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

"At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. There are simply nuances to differentiate these three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

"Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!

"Frederick Stock impresses me as belonging to a category other than these two directors. One feels that his taste and make-up are essentially classical. He has a profound respect for the works he interprets, and forces himself to translate all the author's intentions, effacing himself as much as possible behind the writer. For me, he and Stokowski stand at the opposite poles. Incontestably, he is a great servant of music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second pair of New York appearances this season at Carnegie Hall on January 8 and 10. In the Thursday program, Serge Koussevitzky will introduce here Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, which had its American performance in Boston December 19. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist. The other numbers will be Mozart's G minor symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" orchestrated by Revel. On the Saturday program Dr. Koussevitsky will play the symphony composed by Serge Prokofieff for the jubilee of this orchestra, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's Seventh symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

For the season's second set of Carnegie Hall concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has announced two novelties: for Thursday, Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, first heard in this country in Boston on December 19, and, for Saturday, Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony, Op. 47, composed for the fiftieth anniversary observance of this orchestra, and heard, for the first time anywhere, in Boston on November 14. The symphony was composed in 1929. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist in the Stravinsky work.

The other numbers for Thursday are Mozart's G minor symphony and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; for Saturday, two Bach preludes arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The program for Friday evening, January 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music has not yet been announced.

90

Prov. Journal Dec 17

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Second Concert of Season at Albee Theatre.—Richard Burgin Substitutes for Dr. Koussevitzky As Director

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season last night at the Albee Theatre. In the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, concert-master, conducted.

Whether or not so intended, this program represented in a striking way the progress and development of the art of music for the past 200 years, comprising as it did the Concerto Grosso of about 1720 with so many familiar and quite characteristic Handelian figures, the symphony in G-minor of Mozart, who in many ways followed and improved upon Haydn, and the large sculptured Tschaikovsky with a barbaric militarism and contrasting folk songs.

These compositions represent also the march of the history and culture of the periods and countries to which they belonged. The union of these musical and period associations is most interesting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the past few years under the directorship of Dr. Koussevitzky, has played more of the compositions of Bach and Handel than ever before in its history, with resulting proficiency and perfection of performance. Under his vigorous and learned direction it has become

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Handel....Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro

Mozart .....Symphony in G minor (Koechel No. 550)
I. Allegro molto
II. Andante
III. Menuetto: Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro assai

Tschaikowsky...Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto: moderato con anima (In movimento di valse)
II. Andantino in modo di canzona
III. Scherzo: pizzicato estinato
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco

straight-forward in intent, rounded in form and graceful in line to a point where his readings are authoritative and entirely consonant with the composer's intentions.

Stately largo and larghetto paired with crisp and rhythmic allegro together with largeness of string beauty made this grand old concerto a thing to be remembered and played with more interest than ever before.

Perfect Interpretation

Although the G-minor symphony of Mozart recalls the sonata period of our youth, yet it may be justly claimed that no one should ever outgrow that time of life or its music. The orchestra gave this beautiful work with the lightness and tuneful artistry which entirely suits its changing moods, and its interchange of brass, wood wind and string choirs illustrated what the virtuosity of a present day orchestra can do with such charming and classic works. The Andante was of particular grace and loveliness. Into this, one of Mozart's most beautiful utterances, may be read an infinite variety of poetic emotions. Nothing of Mozart surpasses it in simplicity and beauty of melodic invention.

The more ponderous Minuetto and "Trio" prepare for the lively finale "Allegro."

This may well be accepted as one of the most interesting and beautiful examples of Mozart's orchestral and melodic facility. Its contrapuntal involvements are perfect and hold the interest and the episode in B flat major affords a pleasing change from the somewhat more severe mood of G Minor. Under Mr. Burgin the orchestra played this movement with admirable elan and brio and at a pace that would overtax any but the ablest players.

In the Tschaikovsky fourth Symphony the scene is changed from the court drawing room to the Russian village, from the powdered wigs and swords of Muscovite cimiters, from silk stockings and buckled shoes to boots, saddles and dolmans. Barbaric fanfare supplants the minuet, crashing chords and sturdy waltz the runs and trills.

The grace of Tschaikovsky is impressive and more profound in its emotion and the more elaborate orchestration with additional parts and orchestra twice the size offers opportunities for musical expression of which Mozart hardly dreamed. The orchestra was quick to rise to the artistic heights of this great symphony and long knowledge of it gave an impression of ripe maturity which was evident throughout the performance. The brass choir was splendid in its richness, the strings sonorous in their mass or plaintive in simplicity, as opportunity offered, and the perfection of intonation of the percussion and its impeccable accent added immeasurably to the presentations.

Splendid Wood Wind

In many florid passages for wood wind in this symphony, clarity of articulation, precision of attack and release and beauty of tone quality were everywhere evident. The tossing of musical figures back and forth among the choirs is quite characteristic of Tschaikowsky and a thing which calls for the highest virtuosity on the part of the performers. At no time were there hesitation of tempo, technical errors or lack of nuance to mar the perfection of the performance.

The unity of ensemble of the strings in the pizzicato movements was most unusual in its pianissimo. This is the longest number of its kind in music and was superbly played. The string section of this orchestra is surpassed by none and the technical brilliance of the plucked strings contrasts interestingly with the luscious beauty of bowed passages. Many of the members play upon fine old Italian instruments which greatly assists in the esthetic results. The spirit of the Old Luthiers still lives among these fine musicians and beautifies their interpretations of the great masters of music.

With a friendly orchestra Mr. Burgin made a splendid impression upon a devoted public. He was recalled after each appearance and at the end of the concert both conductor and orchestra received the warmest and most cordial applause. This reception was distinctly merited. In the Concerto Grosse Mr. Burgin led the strings with great artistry in true and traditional Handelian fashion. Those who might be familiar with this work would notice with great satisfaction his long retards placed a dozen or more measures before cadences instead of with the last bar or two as is so often done. The soloists were given sufficient prominence to make their voices plainly heard but without obtrusion.

In the Mozart symphony rhythmic sensitiveness and carefully measured tone values and colors made a worthy presentation of this beautiful work. The Allegro assai was taken at a very rapid pace almost alla breve, yet all articulation was clear and precise, all phrasings clean and limpid.

In the Tschaikowsky no ordinary conducting but veritable interpretation. Many times it was possible to discern instant responses to the conductor's wishes and his reserve in parts that may be easily rushed or clouded was particularly to be praised. Mr. Burgin made a thing of beauty and delight of a work that may easily be noisy and coarse.

A most delightful and satisfying concert.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 13 1930

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its second visit of the season to Providence to give a concert in the Albee Theatre, next Tuesday evening, at 8:15.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present Handel's "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12;" Mozart's "Symphony in G Minor (K. No. 550)," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Tschaikovsky.

A free lecture on this programme will be given in the Providence Public Library tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock. Dr. W. Louis Chapman will describe the music to be played and illustrate the principal themes upon the piano. The lectures have been arranged by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 1 [illegible]

Broadcasters don't make the front page often. They don't attack enough. Nothing like a good attack to attract attention.

Wonder why the networks don't give more consideration to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston organization is still the best known symphonic band in the land. There ought to be room for it regularly on the radio.

Whenever the microphone chiefs are hard pressed for musical programmes they go to their pantry for what they call "songs of gay Paree."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
MORN. BEE NEWS

DEC 18 1930

MUSIC JOURNALS REVIEW SYMPHONY BY DR. HANSON

The symphony written by Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., for the Boston Symphony orchestra is reviewed in leading musical journals this week.

[illegible] this city. Mr. Koussevitzky wi[ll] duct on the same program M[ozart's] "Das Lied von der Erde," wit[h] ard Crooks, tenor, and Ma[rgaret] Matzenauer, contralto, as soloists.

[illegible] sevitzky will [illegible] symphony, which was [illegible]

(Continued on Page [illegible])

posed for the anniversary of this orchestra. The opening number will be two preludes of Bach arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli. The closing number will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

DEC 20 1930

New Stravinsky Works Played in Boston Concert

Ninth of Symphony Orchestra Series Also Presents Mozart and Bach Music

Psalms Give Inspiration

Critic Urges Second Hearing, Not Long Deferred

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Dec. 19.—The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, took place in Symphony Hall today. The program offered Mozart's symphony in G minor, Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," composed for the jubilee of the orchestra and played today for the first time, and his Capriccio for piano and orchestra, played for the first time in this country, and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat for organ, orchestrated by Arnold Schönberg. The orchestra was assisted by the Cecilia Society, which had been trained by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler. The pianist was J. M. Sanroma.

About the new Stravinsky works Philip Hale, music critic of "The Boston Herald," wrote as follows:

"Stravinsky went to the Psalms for inspiration, choosing the sonorous text of the vulgate verses of the 39th (the number in the King James version), verses that are prayer, an entreaty; from the 40th, in which the Psalmist rejoices that his cry was heard, that he was taken from the horrible pit and the miry clay; and the 150th, in which the people are urged, and all things that have breath, to praise the Lord with the sound of all manner of instruments. His choice of instruments for these Psalms is peculiar: no violin, no violas; but five flutes, many other wind instruments, a harp. He called for two pianos. Although the Psalmist wished organs and high sounding cymbals to give praise, Stravinsky would not be the man to be so literal in his orchestration.

Second Hearing Is Urged

"It is to be regretted that the repetition of this symphony did not take place as first announced, for much that was strange, almost foreign to the text might then have seemed pertinently eloquent. Schönberg's arrangement of Bach's organ prelude and fugue might better have been omitted. Without the repetition the concert was too long as it was.

"The orchestral interludes are the most baffling portions of the symphony at the first hearing. They seem to be purposeless; hardly designed to put one in the mood for the following text; not a musical commentary on what has preceded. Was it the composer's endeavor to be Hebraic in his music? Hebraic in spirit, after the manner of Ernest Bloch, but not too reminiscent of the synagogue? The ending of the first Psalm is indeed beautiful, originally beautiful; so is the treatment of Alleluia later. And Stravinsky escaped the temptation of making the Psalm of jubilation one prolonged shout; there is a most effective passage in it to be sung in a subdued manner, as by worshipers in awe of the majesty of the Lord. The symphony is of such importance that it demands a second hearing, one not too long deferred.

Sanromá Wins Praise

"The Capriccio is rightly named; the capriciousness is enchanting. Here is an answer, if one were needed, to the charge that Stravinsky is not a melodist when he wishes; that he can write only patterns and rhythmic experiments; that his music is only cerebral. In this Capriccio he may at times entertain the spirit of the music hall, but there is no vulgarity; his tunes are not overripe. They incite spiritual gaiety, not a tapping of heels on the floor. His gaiety flags a little for a moment in the second section, but even then the diabolically clever use of orchestral instruments while the piano maintains a pleasing monotonous figure is in itself a joy. Mr. Sanromá played the piano with a brilliance that was musical, never metallic; with the appropriate capriciousness of mood. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played as if inspired. And so yesterday the worldly Stravinsky triumphed as far as the audience was concerned over Stravinsky the devout."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

DEC 24 1930

A Visitor's Estimate.

Henry Prunieres, a French music critic, writes interestingly for the New York Times of his impressions of our symphony orchestras which he made special efforts to hear during a recent visit.

As to which American orchestra is to be considered the best, he says:

"I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

"At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. There are simply nuances to differentiate these three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

"Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!

"Frederick Stock impresses me as belonging to a category other than these two directors. One feels that his taste and make-up are essentially classical. He has a profound respect for the works he interprets, and forces himself to translate all the author's intentions, effacing himself as much as possible behind the writer. For me, he and Stokowski stand at the opposite poles. Incontestably, he is a great servant of music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second pair of New York appearances this season at Carnegie Hall on January 8 and 10. In the Thursday program, Serge Koussevitzky will introduce here Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, which had its first American performance in Boston on December 19. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist. The other numbers will be Mozart's G minor symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Revel. On the Saturday program Dr. Koussevitsky will give the symphony composed by Serge Prokofieff for the jubilee of this orchestra, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

"For the season's second set of Carnegie Hall concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has announced two novelties: for Thursday, Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, first heard in this country in Boston on December 19, and, for Saturday, Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony, Op. 47, composed for the fiftieth anniversary observance of this orchestra, and heard, for the first time anywhere, in Boston on November 14. The symphony was composed in 1929. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist in the Stravinsky work.

The other numbers for Thursday are Mozart's G minor symphony and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; for Saturday, two Bach preludes arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The program for Friday evening, January 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music has not yet been announced.

90

Providence Journal Dec 17

IN TERMS OF MUSIC,
Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Second Concert of Season at Albee Theatre.—Richard Burgin Substitutes for Dr. Koussevitzky As Director

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season last night at the Albee Theatre. In the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, concert-master, conducted.

Whether or not so intended, this program represented in a striking way the progress and development of the art of music for the past 200 years, comprising as it did the Concerto Grosso of about 1720 with so many familiar and quite characteristic Handelian figures, the symphony in G-minor of Mozart, who in many ways followed and improved upon Haydn, and the large sculptured Tschaikovsky with a barbaric militarism and contrasting folk songs.

These compositions represent also the march of the history and culture of the periods and countries to which they belonged. The union of these musical and period associations is most interesting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the past few years under the directorship of Dr. Koussevitzky, has played more of the compositions of Bach and Handel than ever before in its history, with resulting proficiency and perfection of performance. Under his vigorous and learned direction it has become

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Handel.... Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12
Largo Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro

Mozart..... Symphony in G minor (Koechel No. 550)
I. Allegro molto
II. Andante
III. Menuetto. Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro assai

Tschaikowsky.. Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima (In movimento di valse)
II. Andantino in modo di canzona
III Scherzo: pizzicato estimato
IV Finale: Allegro con fuoco

straight-forward in intent, rounded in form and graceful in line to a point where his readings are authoritative and entirely consonant with the composer's intentions.

Stately largo and larghetto paired with crisp and rhythmic allegro together with largeness of string beauty made this grand old concerto a thing to be remembered and played with more interest than ever before.

Perfect Interpretation

Although the G-minor symphony of Mozart recalls the sonata period of our youth, yet it may be justly claimed that no one should ever outgrow that time of life or its music. The orchestra gave this beautiful work with the lightness and tuneful artistry which entirely suits its changing moods, and its interchange of brass, wood wind and string choirs illustrated what the virtuosity of a present day orchestra can do with such charming and classic works. The Andante was of particular grace and loveliness. Into this, one of Mozart's most beautiful utterances, may be read an infinite variety of poetic emotions. Nothing of Mozart surpasses it in simplicity and beauty of melodic invention.

The more ponderous Minuetto and "Trio" prepare for the lively finale "Allegro."

This may well be accepted as one of the most interesting and beautiful examples of Mozart's orchestral and melodic facility. Its contrapuntal involvements are perfect and hold the interest and the episode in B flat major affords a pleasing change from the somewhat more severe mood of G Minor. Under Mr. Burgin the orchestra played this movement with admirable elan and brio and at a pace that would overtax any but the ablest players.

In the Tschaikovsky fourth Symphony the scene is changed from the court drawing room to the Russian village, from the powdered wigs and swords of Muscovite cimiters, from silk stockings and buckled shoes to boots, saddles and dolmans. Barbaric fanfare supplants the minuet, crashing chords and sturdy waltz the runs and trills.

The grace of Tschaikovsky is impressive and more profound in its emotion and the more elaborate orchestration with additional parts and orchestra twice the size offers opportunities for musical expression of which Mozart hardly dreamed. The orchestra was quick to rise to the artistic heights of this great symphony and long knowledge of it gave an impression of ripe maturity which was evident throughout the performance. The brass choir was splendid in its richness, the strings sonorous in their mass or plaintive in simplicity, as opportunity offered, and the perfection of intonation of the percussion and its impeccable accent, added immeasurably to the presentations.

Splendid Wood Wind

In many florid passages for wood wind in this symphony, clarity of articulation, precision of attack and release and beauty of tone quality were everywhere evident. The tossing of musical figures back and forth among the choirs is quite characteristic of Tschaikowsky and a thing which calls for the highest virtuosity on the part of the performers. At no time were there hesitation of tempo, technical errors or lack of nuance to mar the perfection of the performance.

The unity of ensemble of the strings in the pizzicato movements was most unusual in its pianissimo. This is the longest number of its kind in music and was superbly played. The string section of this orchestra is surpassed by none and the technical brilliance of the plucked strings contrasts interestingly with the luscious beauty of bowed passages. Many of the members play upon fine old Italian instruments which greatly assists in the esthetic results. The spirit of the Old Luthiers still lives among these fine musicians and beautifies their interpretations of the great masters of music.

With a friendly orchestra Mr. Burgin made a splendid impression upon a devoted public. He was recalled after each appearance and at the end of the concert both conductor and orchestra received the warmest and most cordial applause. This reception was distinctly merited. In the Concerto Grosse Mr. Burgin led the strings with great artistry in true and traditional Handelian fashion. Those who might be familiar with this work would notice with great satisfaction his long retards placed a dozen or more measures before cadences instead of with the last bar or two as is so often done. The soloists were given sufficient prominence to make their voices plainly heard but without obtrusion.

In the Mozart symphony rhythmic sensitiveness and carefully measured tone values and colors made a worthy presentation of this beautiful work. The Allegro assai was taken at a very rapid pace almost alla breve, yet all articulation was clear and precise, all phrasings clean and limpid.

In the Tschaikowsky no ordinary conducting but veritable interpretation. Many times it was possible to discern instant responses to the conductor's wishes and his reserve in parts that may be easily rushed or clouded was particularly to be praised. Mr. Burgin made a thing of beauty and delight of a work that may easily be noisy and coarse.

A most delightful and satisfying concert.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 18 1930

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its second visit of the season to Providence to give a concert in the Albee Theatre, next Tuesday evening, at 8:15.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present Handel's "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12;" Mozart's "Symphony in G Minor (K. No. 550)," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Tschaikovsky.

A free lecture on this programme will be given in the Providence Public Library tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock. Dr. W. Louis Chapman will describe the music to be played and illustrate the principal themes upon the piano. The lectures have been arranged by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

Broadcasters don't make the front page often. They don't attack enough. Nothing like a good attack to attract attention.

Wonder why the networks don't give more consideration to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Boston organization is still the best known symphonic band in the land. There ought to be room for it regularly on the radio.

Whenever the microphone chiefs are hard pressed for musical programmes they go to their pantry for what they call "songs of gay Paree."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OMAHA, NEB.
MORN. BEE NEWS

DEC 18 1930

MUSIC JOURNALS REVIEW SYMPHONY BY DR. HANSON

The symphony written by Dr. Howard Hanson, formerly of Wahoo, now director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., for the Boston Symphony orchestra is reviewed in leading musical journals this week.

this city. Mr. Koussevitzky wi duct on the same program M
"Das Lied von der Erde," with ard Crooks, tenor, and Ma
Matzenauer, contralto, as soloists.

New York,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

DEC 20 1930

New Stravinsky Works Played in Boston Concert

Ninth of Symphony Orchestra Series Also Presents Mozart and Bach Music

Psalms Give Inspiration

Critic Urges Second Hearing, Not Long Deferred

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Dec. 19.—The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, took place in Symphony Hall today. The program offered Mozart's symphony in G minor, Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," composed for the jubilee of the orchestra and played today for the first time, and his Capriccio for piano and orchestra, played for the first time in this country, and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat for organ, orchestrated by Arnold Schönberg. The orchestra was assisted by the Cecilia Society, which had been trained by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler. The pianist was J. M. Sanroma.

About the new Stravinsky works Philip Hale, music critic of "The Boston Herald," wrote as follows:

"Stravinsky went to the Psalms for inspiration, choosing the sonorous text of the vulgate verses of the 39th (the number in the King James version), verses that are prayer, an entreaty; from the 40th, in which the Psalmist rejoices that his cry was heard, that he was taken from the horrible pit and the miry clay; and the 150th, in which the people are urged, and all things that have breath, to praise the Lord with the sound of all manner of instruments. His choice of instruments for these Psalms is peculiar: no violin, no violas; but five flutes, many other wind instruments, a harp. He called for two pianos. Although the Psalmist wished organs and high sounding cymbals to give praise, Stravinsky would not be the man to be so literal in his orchestration.

Second Hearing Is Urged

"It is to be regretted that the repetition of this symphony did not take place as first announced, for much that was strange, almost foreign to the text might then have seemed pertinently eloquent. Schönberg's arrangement of Bach's organ prelude and fugue might better have been omitted. Without the repetition the concert was too long as it was.

"The orchestral interludes are the most baffling portions of the symphony at the first hearing. They seem to be purposeless; hardly designed to put one in the mood for the following text; not a musical commentary on what has preceded. Was it the composer's endeavor to be Hebraic in his music? Hebraic in spirit, after the manner of Ernest Bloch, but not too reminiscent of the synagogue? The ending of the first Psalm is indeed beautiful, originally beautiful; so is the treatment of Alleluia later. And Stravinsky escaped the temptation of making the Psalm of jubilation one prolonged shout; there is a most effective passage in it to be sung in a subdued manner, as by worshipers in awe of the majesty of the Lord. The symphony is of such importance that it demands a second hearing, one not too long deferred.

Sanroma Wins Praise

"The Capriccio is rightly named: the capriciousness is enchanting. Here is an answer, if one were needed, to the charge that Stravinsky is not a melodist when he wishes: that he can write only patterns and rhythmic experiments; that his music is only cerebral. In this Capriccio he may at times entertain the spirit of the music hall, but there is no vulgarity; his tunes are not overripe. They incite spiritual gaiety, not a tapping of heels on the floor. His gaiety flags a little for a moment in the second section, but even then the diabolically clever use of orchestral instruments while the piano maintains a pleasing monotonous figure is in itself a joy. Mr. Sanroma played the piano with a brilliance that was musical, never metallic; with the appropriate capriciousness of mood. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played as if inspired. And so yesterday the worldly Stravinsky triumphed as far as the audience was concerned over Stravinsky the devout."

sevitzky will symphony, which was

(Continued

posed for the anniversary of this orchestra. The opening number will be two preludes of Bach arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli. The closing number will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

DEC 24

A Visitor's Estimate.

Henry Prunieres, a French music critic, writes interestingly for the New York Times of his impressions of our symphony orchestras which he made special efforts to hear during a recent visit.

As to which American orchestra is to be considered the best, he says:

"I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

"At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. There are simply nuances to differentiate these three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

"Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!

"Frederick Stock impresses me as belonging to a category other than these two directors. One feels that his taste and make-up are essentially classical. He has a profound respect for the works he interprets, and forces himself to translate all the author's intentions, effacing himself as much as possible behind the writer. For me, he and Stokowski stand at the opposite poles. Incontestably, he is a great servant of music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second pair of New York appearances this season at Carnegie Hall on January 8 and 10. In the Thursday program, Serge Koussevitzky will introduce here Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, which had its first American performance in Boston on December 19. J. M. Sanroma was the soloist. The other numbers were Mozart's G minor symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" orchestrated by Revel. On the Saturday program Dr. Koussevitsky will give the symphony composed by Serge Prokofieff for the jubilee of this orchestra, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's Seventh symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

For the season's second set of Carnegie Hall concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has announced two novelties: for Thursday, Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, first heard in this country in Boston on December 19, and, for Saturday, Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony, Op. 47, composed for the fiftieth anniversary observance of this orchestra, and heard, for the first time anywhere, in Boston on November 14. The symphony was composed in 1929. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist in the Stravinsky work.

The other numbers for Thursday are Mozart's G minor symphony and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; for Saturday, two Bach preludes arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The program for Friday evening, January 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music has not yet been announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
DEC 24 1930

A Visitor's Estimate.

Henry Prunieres, a French music critic, writes interestingly for the New York Times of his impressions of our symphony orchestras which he made special efforts to hear during a recent visit.

As to which American orchestra is to be considered the best, he says:

"I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

"At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. There are simply nuances to differentiate these three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

"Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!

"Frederick Stock impresses me as belonging to a category other than these two directors. One feels that his taste and make-up are essentially classical. He has a profound respect for the works he interprets, and forces himself to translate all the author's intentions, effacing himself as much as possible behind the writer. For me, he and Stokowski stand at the opposite poles. Incontestably, he is a great servant of music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
DEC 25 1930

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second pair of New York appearances this season at Carnegie Hall on January 8 and 10. In the Thursday program, Serge Koussevitzky will introduce here Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, which had its first American performance in Boston on December 19. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist. The other numbers will be Mozart's G minor symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel. On the Saturday program Dr. Koussevitzky will give the symphony composed by Serge Prokofieff for the jubilee of this orchestra, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
DEC 28 1930

For the season's second set of Carnegie Hall concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has announced two novelties: for Thursday, Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, first heard in this country in Boston on December 19, and, for Saturday, Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony, Op. 47, composed for the fiftieth anniversary of this orchestra, and heard, for the first time anywhere, in Boston on November 14. The symphony was composed in 1929. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist in the Stravinsky work.

The other numbers for Thursday are Mozart's G minor symphony and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; for Saturday, two Bach preludes arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The program for Friday evening, January 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music has not yet been announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME
DEC 29

Stravinsky in Boston

Seventeen years ago the primitive, pagan rhythms of Le Sacre du Printemps established Russian Igor Stravinsky as the most original, most compelling of modern composers. Last week in Boston his Symphonie de Psaumes (Symphony of Psalms), in spirit far removed from his sensual celebration of fertility, was given as a part of the Boston Symphony's ambitious semi-centennial program. The new Stravinsky takes as text three excerpts from the Psalms (in the English version: Psalm XXXIX, Verses 12, 13; XL: 1, 2, 3; CL complete), uses a chorus to describe in Latin the transition from abject penitence to exultant praise. In the orchestra are no violins, violas or clarinets but five flutes, many other wind instruments, drums, two pianos and a harp. Bostonians, though for the most part baffled by Stravinsky's new designs, sensed their importance, wanted another hearing. More immediate was Boston's grasp and appreciation of Stravinsky's scintillant Caprice for piano and orchestra, given its U. S. première the same afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD
DEC 29 1930

When it makes its second visit to New York this season, Jan 8 and 10 in Carnegie Hall

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which recently gave a Beethoven Festival in Washington, D. C., is to be heard in a Beethoven programme at the second Saturday afternoon concert of the New York season, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Saturday. Serge Koussevitzky will then present the Overture to "Egmont," the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, and the Seventh Symphony in A major. At the concert of Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, Koussevitzky will introduce to New York the new Capriccio for piano and orchestra of Stravinsky, which recently had its first American performances in Boston. Jesus Maria Sanroma will take the solo part. The program will also include Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

The first of the January Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Metropolitan Museum of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN
JAN 3 1931

Music Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which recently gave a Beethoven festival in Washington, D. C., is to be heard in a Beethoven program at the second Saturday afternoon concert of the New York season, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Saturday, January 10, at 2:30. Serge Koussevitzky will then present the overture to "Egmont," the fourth piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, and the seventh symphony in A major.

At the concert of Thursday evening, January 8, Koussevitzky will introduce to New York the new capriccio for piano and orchestra of Stravinsky, which recently had its first American performances in Boston. Jesus Maria Sanroma will take the solo part. The program will also include Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Eve. World
JAN 3 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, will introduce to New York Stravinsky's new Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma in the solo part; Mozart's Symphony in G Minor, and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." On next Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall the orchestra will give a Beethoven program, Mr. Koussevitzky presenting the "Egmont" overture, the Fourth Piano Concerto with Myra Hess as soloist, and the Seventh Sym

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN
JAN 3-1931

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

THE close of a year is customarily viewed as a time for retrospect, reflection and possibly repentance. Let us, then, look backward. The chronicler of musical doings in this place has for many years watched music and the arts going to the dogs. Being a frequenter of Riverside Drive, where dogs do congregate, he notes that they are faring very well. Many of them are too fat and too many have adopted the effeminate habit of wearing sweaters even on mild days, but on the whole, they seem to be contented with their lot, to be in reasonable heath, and able to wag tails in all kinds of weather.

One should not forget, however, that what has been going to them is Verdi and Wagner, Beethoven, Schumann and Schubert, the domestic piano, the evening of singing at home and the annual performance of "The Messiah." They have not yet been called upon to digest the dynamic dance, the jazz opera, the chamber music of Varese and Hindemith, the vocal works of Schoenberg, the radio or the "Ondes Musicales." But we "shrewdly suspect," as certain Victorians phrased it, that since every dog will have his day, there will be canines along the Drive to swallow and digest even these things when they are eventually consigned to the faithful beasts.

As for this watcher of the stars, he can say without reservation that he finds this an intensely interesting time in which to live and the year 1930 one not to be treated with contemptuous silence. We do not recall any musical creation which emerged in that year with immediate conviction of immortality, but that is a matter of less importance than we may fancy. A great deal of entirely mortal music is worth hearing and is quite as good as the people who listen to it.

We regard it as particularly unfortunate that public attention has been focussed on the feats of conductors rather than on the production of new music. Nor has the ear of the public been turned aside by the resounding glories of the trumpetings of new Rome made known to us by Mr. Toscanini. There has been much fuss about readings of Brahms and Franck and Beethoven. One would suppose that Toscanini and Stokowski had discovered meanings which even the composers did not suspect. Come to think of it, perhaps they did.

But the public—at least that part of it we have met—has not betrayed any deep interest in the trends of musical thought, in the sum total of artistic deduction to be drawn from such a year as 1930. Perhaps it is as well that this should be the case. Each new work brought to our attention may be considered as a separate individuality. We shall probably not go far wrong if we pursue an untroubled course of observation and let the future detect our errors. The writer has observed that all the critics, in all parts of the world, are adrift on a sea of speculation. Let us stay ashore, or at least in the harbor. When very young the writer learned that the best storm trysail is a good anchor.

* * *

The Record of the Dying Year.

A CONSIDERABLE number of noxelties was produced in the year, but most of them were minor pieces of little substance. Of major works there were inevitably few. On January 9 the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time here Arnold Bax's second symphony, which may be accepted as one of the most important novelties of the twelve-month. This is good music, breathing sturdy manhood and the ebullient spirit of outdoors. It is well constructed, replete with interest for the listener and above all, healthy and wholesome art. That such a composition has come out of post-war Britain speaks volumes for the resolute old British soul.

The Schola Cantorum produced on March 26 Arthur Lurie's "Concerto Spirituale" for chorus, piano and double basses, with prologue for barytone solo and six brass instruments. The composition proved to be original in plan, including a long piano cadenza as one of its means of expression, intellectual and self-contained in conception, but of an exceptionally fine artistic texture. It was indisputably one of the outstanding disclosures of the year and should not be allowed to lapse into neglect.

The League of Composers gave performances of Schoenberg's "Die Gluecklicne Hand" and Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printempts" in the Metropolitan Opera House on April 22. The former was new. We do not accept such a work at the valuation placed upon it by the most advanced modernists. So far as the United States is concerned "Die Gluecklicne Hand" died on the Metropolitan stage on the evening of its production. The music does not come from within; it is a deliberate and not victorious attempt at a demonstration of Mr. Schoenberg's theories about the regeneration of art. We shall perhaps be invited by the propagandists to some future performance of it, but the world will proceed on its way quite ignorant of its existence. If we are as materialistic and commercialized as we are told, we shall not give atten-idealistic as some assert ritual and esthetic. on November 21 Roussel's G innocuous work. The same ony by Mcolas Nabokov, a not quite certain in method

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
JAN 4 1931

In the Boston Symphony's concert next Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to New York Igor Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo, which was first performed at a concert of the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris on December 6, 1929. The composer was the soloist, and Ernest Ansermet conducted. Dr. Koussevitzky gave the work its first American performance in Boston on December 19, with J. M. Sanroma, who takes part in day's concert, as the pianist.

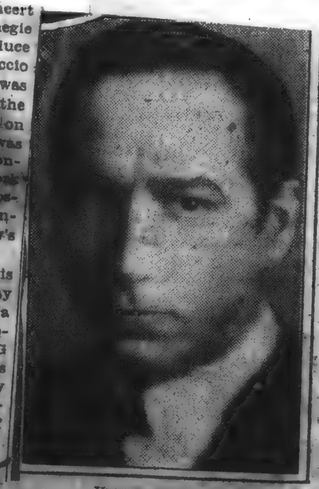
Dr. Koussevitzky has changed his Carnegie Hall program for Saturday afternoon, which originally included a new Prokofieff symphony, and will devote it to Beethoven, including the G major piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist. For the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dr. Koussevitzky has prepared a program of numbers by Handel, Mozart and Tchaikovsky.



Hollinger — Upper center, Nickolas Murray

Left, David Mannes, who conducts Saturday night's free concert at the Metropolitan Art Museum; right, J. M. Sanroma, piano soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio Saturday afternoon with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Upper center, Jascha [illegible], who will give a violin recital tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 4 1931

SERGE KOUSSEWITZKY

© BACHRACH

Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn and Manhattan this week.

Visiting Brooklyn for a second time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at the Academy of Music on Friday evening of this week. The announced program includes the following music:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso for Strings
Mozart.....Symphony in G minor
Tschaikowsky.....Fourth Symphony

Serge Koussewitsky will conduct. The concert takes place under the auspices of the Institute.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 4 1931

Jesús María Sanromá, Piano So
Orchestra at Carn

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 4 1931

Henry Hadley will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 17 and 18 in Boston when it presents his tone poem "Salomé" and his suite, "Streets of Peking." Haydn's symphony No. 1, in E flat, and McKinley's "Masquerade" will be on the same program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
JAN 4 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will introduce Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra to New York on Thursday evening, Jan. 8. This work, which was played in Paris last Summer, had its first American performance in Boston Dec. 19 and 20. Jesús María Sanromá will be the soloist. At the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10 Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Prokofieff's new symphony, composed especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its first New York performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

DEC 24 1930

A Visitor's Estimate.

Henry Prunieres, a French music critic, writes interestingly for the New York Times of his impressions of our symphony orchestras which he made special efforts to hear during a recent visit.

As to which American orchestra is to be considered the best, he says:

"I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

"At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. There are simply nuances to differentiate these three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

"Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third Symphony, Debussy's "La Mer" and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!

"Frederick Stock impresses me as belonging to a category other than these two directors. One feels that his taste and make-up are essentially classical. He has a profound respect for the works he interprets, and forces himself to translate all the author's intentions, effacing himself as much as possible behind the writer. For me, he and Stokowski stand at the opposite poles. Incontestably, he is a great servant of music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second pair of New York appearances this season at Carnegie Hall on January 8 and 10. In the Thursday program, Serge Koussevitzky will introduce here Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, which had its first American performance in Boston on December 19. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist. The other numbers will be Mozart's G minor symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Revel. On the Saturday program Dr. Koussevitsky will give the symphony composed by Serge Prokofieff for the jubilee of this orchestra, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

DEC 28 1930

For the season's second set of Carnegie Hall concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has announced two novelties: for Thursday, Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, first heard in this country in Boston on December 19, and, for Saturday, Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony, Op. 47, composed for the fiftieth anniversary observance of this orchestra, and heard, for the first time anywhere, in Boston on November 14. The symphony was composed in 1929. J. M. Sanroma will be the soloist in the Stravinsky work.

The other numbers for Thursday are Mozart's G minor symphony and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; for Saturday, two Bach preludes arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The program for Friday evening, January 9, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music has not yet been announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

Stravinsky in Boston

Seventeen years ago the primitive, pagan rhythms of Le Sacré du Printemps established Russian Igor Stravinsky as the most original, most compelling of modern composers. Last week in Boston his Symphonie de Psaumes (Symphony of Psalms), in spirit far removed from his sensual celebration of fertility, was given as a part of the Boston Symphony's ambitious semi-centennial program. The new Stravinsky takes as text three excerpts from the Psalms (in the English version: Psalm XXXIX, Verses 12, 13; XL: 1, 2, 3; CL complete), uses a chorus to describe in Latin the transition from abject penitence to exultant praise. In the orchestra are no violins, violas or clarinets but five flutes, many other wind instruments, drums, two pianos and a harp. Bostonians, though for the most part baffled by Stravinsky's new designs, sensed their importance, wanted another hearing. More immediate was Boston's grasp and appreciation of Stravinsky's scintillant Caprice for piano and orchestra, given its U. S. première the same afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

When it makes its second visit to New York this season, Jan. 8 and 10 in Carnegie Hall

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which recently gave a Beethoven Festival in Washington, D. C., is to be heard in a Beethoven programme at the second Saturday afternoon concert of the New York season, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Saturday. Serge Koussevitzky will then present the Overture to "Egmont," the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, and the Seventh Symphony in A major. At the concert of Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, Koussevitzky will introduce to New York the new Capriccio for piano and orchestra of Stravinsky, which recently had its first American performances in Boston. Jesus Maria Sanroma will take the solo part. The program will also include Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

The first of the January Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Metro[politan] Museum of A[rt]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

Music Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which recently gave a Beethoven festival in Washington, D. C., is to be heard in a Beethoven program at the second Saturday afternoon concert of the New York season, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Saturday, January 10, at 2:30. Serge Koussevitzky will then present the overture to "Egmont," the fourth piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist, and the seventh symphony in A major.

At the concert of Thursday evening, January 8, Koussevitzky will introduce to New York the new capriccio for piano and orchestra of Stravinsky, which recently had its first American performances in Boston. Jesus Maria Sanroma will take the solo part. The program will also include Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Eve. World

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, will introduce to New York Stravinsky's new Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma in the solo part; Mozart's Symphony in G Minor, and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." On next Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall the orchestra will give a Beethoven program, Mr. Koussevitzky presenting the "Egmont" overture, the Fourth Piano Concerto with Myra Hess as soloist, and the Seventh Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

THE close of a year is customarily viewed as a time for retrospect, reflection and possibly repentance. Let us, then, look backward. The chronicler of musical doings in this place has for many years watched music and the arts going to the dogs. Being a frequenter of Riverside Drive, where dogs do congregate, he notes that they are faring very well. Many of them are too fat and too many have adopted the effeminate habit of wearing sweaters even on mild days, but on the whole, they seem to be contented with their lot, to be in reasonable heath, and able to wag tails in all kinds of weather.

One should not forget, however, that what has been going to them is Verdi and Wagner, Beethoven, Schumann and Schubert, the domestic piano, the evening of singing at home and the annual performance of "The Messiah." They have not yet been called upon to digest the dynamic dance, the jazz opera, the chamber music of Varese and Hindemith, the vocal works of Schoenberg, the radio or the "Ondes Musicales." But we "shrewdly suspect," as certain Victorians phrased it, that since every dog will have his day, there will be canines along the Drive to swallow and digest even these things when they are eventually consigned to the faithful beasts.

As for this watcher of the stars, he can say without reservation that he finds this an intensely interesting time in which to live and the year 1930 one not to be treated with contemptuous silence. We do not recall any musical creation which emerged in that year with immediate conviction of immortality, but that is a matter of less importance than we may fancy. A great deal of entirely mortal music is worth hearing and is quite as good as the people who listen to it.

We regard it as particularly unfortunate that public attention has been focussed on the feats of conductors rather than on the production of new music. Nor has the ear of the public been turned aside by the resounding glories of the trumpetings of new Rome made known to us by Mr. Toscanini. There has been much fuss about readings of Brahms and Franck and Beethoven. One would suppose that Toscanini and Stokowski had discovered meanings which even the composers did not suspect. Come to think of it, perhaps they did.

But the public—at least that part of it we have met—has not betrayed any deep interest in the trends of musical thought, in the sum total of artistic deduction to be drawn from such a year as 1930. Perhaps it is as well that this should be the case. Each new work brought to our attention may be considered as a separate individuality. We shall probably not go far wrong if we pursue an untroubled course of observation and let the future detect our errors. The writer has observed that all the critics, in all parts of the world, are adrift on a sea of speculation. Let us stay ashore, or at least in the harbor. When very young the writer learned that the best storm trysail is a good anchor.

* * *

The Record of the Dying Year.

A CONSIDERABLE number of noxelties was produced in the year, but most of them were minor pieces of little substance. Of major works there were inevitably few. On January 9 the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time here Arnold Bax's second symphony, which may be accepted as one of the most important novelties of the twelve-month. This is good music, breathing sturdy manhood and the ebullient spirit of outdoors. It is well constructed, replete with interest for the listener and above all, healthy and wholesome art. That such a composition has come out of post-war Britain speaks volumes for the resolute old British soul.

The Schola Cantorum produced on March 26 Arthur Lurie's "Concerto Spirituale" for chorus, piano and double basses, with prologue for barytone solo and six brass instruments. The composition proved to be original in plan, including a long piano cadenza as one of its means of expression, intellectual and self-contained in conception, but of an exceptionally fine artistic texture. It was indisputably one of the outstanding disclosures of the year and should not be allowed to lapse into neglect.

The League of Composers gave performances of Schoenberg's "Die Glueckliche Hand" and Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printempts" in the Metropolitan Opera House on April 22. The former was new. We do not accept such a work at the valuation placed upon it by the most advanced modernists. So far as the United States is concerned "Die Glueckliche Hand" died on the Metropolitan stage on the evening of its production. The music does not come from within; it is a deliberate and not victorious attempt at a demonstration of Mr. Schoenberg's theories about the regeneration of art. We shall perhaps be invited by the propagandists to some future performance of it, but the world will proceed on its way quite ignorant of its existence. If we are as materialistic and commercialized as we are told, we shall not give attention [illegible] are idealistic as some assert [illegible] spiritual and æsthetic.

[illegible] d on November 21 Roussel's G [illegible] y innocuous work. The same [illegible] phony by Mcolas Nabokov, a [illegible] not quite certain in method

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

JAN 4 1931

In the Boston Symphony's concert next Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to New York Igor Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo, which was first performed at a concert of the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris on December 6, 1929. The composer was the soloist, and Ernest Ansermet conducted. Dr. Koussevitzky gave the work its first American performance in Boston on December 19, with J. M. Sanroma, who takes part in Thursday's concert, as the pianist.

Dr. Koussevitzky has changed his Carnegie Hall program for Saturday afternoon, which originally included a new Prokofieff symphony, and will devote it to Beethoven, including the G major piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist. For the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dr. Koussevitzky has prepared a program of numbers by Handel, Mozart and Tchaikovsky.

Hollinger — Upper center, Nickolas Murray

Left, David Mannes, who conducts Saturday night's free concert at the Metropolitan Art Museum; right, J. M. Sanroma, piano soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio Saturday afternoon with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Upper center, Jascha Heifetz, who will give a violin recital tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

SERGE KOUSSEWITZKY

©BACHRACH

Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn and Manhattan this week.

Visiting Brooklyn for a second time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at the Academy of Music on Friday evening of this week. The announced program includes the following music:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso for Strings
Mozart.....Symphony in G minor
Tschaikowsky.....Fourth Symphony

Serge Koussewitsky will conduct. The concert takes place under the auspices of the Institute.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Jesús María Sanromá, Piano So[loist] with the Orchestra at Carn[egie]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Henry Hadley will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 17 and 18 in Boston when it presents his tone poem "Salomé" and his suite, "Streets of Peking." Haydn's symphony No. 1, in E flat, and McKinley's "Masquerade" will be on the same program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will introduce Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra to New York on Thursday evening, Jan. 8. This work, which was played in Paris last Summer, had its first American performance in Boston Dec. 19 and 20. Jesús María Sanromá will be the soloist. At the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10 Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Prokofieff's new symphony, composed especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its first New York performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

Stravinsky in Boston

Seventeen years ago the primitive, pagan rhythms of Le Sacre du Printemps established Russian Igor Stravinsky as the most original, most compelling of modern composers. Last week in Boston his Symphonie de Psaumes (Symphony of Psalms), in spirit far removed from his sensual celebration of fertility, was given as a part of the Boston Symphony's ambitious semi-centennial program. The new Stravinsky takes as text three excerpts from the Psalms (in the English version: Psalm XXXIX, Verses 12, 13; XL: 1, 2, 3; CL complete), uses a chorus to describe in Latin the transition from abject penitence to exultant praise. In the orchestra are no violins, violas or clarinets but five flutes, many other wind instruments, drums, two pianos and a harp. Bostonians, though for the most part baffled by Stravinsky's new designs, sensed their importance, wanted another hearing. More immediate was Boston's grasp and appreciation of Stravinsky's scintillant Caprice for piano and orchestra, given its U. S. première the same afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

When it makes its second visit to New York this season, Jan. 8 and 10, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will introduce Stravinsky's "Capriccio," which had its first American performance in Boston, Dec. 19.

sorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition.

The first of the January Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Metropolitan Museum of Art will be given next Saturday evening under the direction of David Mannes. The program will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Beethoven, Debussy's "Petite Suite" and "Daybreak" and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

THE close of a year is customarily viewed as a time for retrospect, reflection and possibly repentance. Let us, then, look backward. The chronicler of musical doings in this place has for many years watched music and the arts going to the dogs. Being a frequenter of Riverside Drive, where dogs do congregate, he notes that they are faring very well. Many of them are too fat and too many have adopted the effeminate habit of wearing sweaters even on mild days, but on the whole, they seem to be contented with their lot, to be in reasonable heath, and able to wag tails in all kinds of weather.

One should not forget, however, that what has been going to them is Verdi and Wagner, Beethoven, Schumann and Schubert, the domestic piano, the evening of singing at home and the annual performance of "The Messiah." They have not yet been called upon to digest the dynamic dance, the jazz opera, the chamber music of Varese and Hindemith, the vocal works of Schoenberg, the radio or the "Ondes Musicales." But we "shrewdly suspect," as certain Victorians phrased it, that since every dog will have his day, there will be canines along the Drive to swallow and digest even these things when they are eventually consigned to the faithful beasts.

As for this watcher of the stars, he can say without reservation that he finds this an intensely interesting time in which to live and the year 1930 one not to be treated with contemptuous silence. We do not recall any musical creation which emerged in that year with immediate conviction of immortality, but that is a matter of less importance than we may fancy. A great deal of entirely mortal music is worth hearing and is quite as good as the people who listen to it.

We regard it as particularly unfortunate that public attention has been focussed on the feats of conductors rather than on the production of new music. Nor has the ear of the public been turned aside by the resounding glories of the trumpetings of new Rome made known to us by Mr. Toscanini. There has been much fuss about readings of Brahms and Franck and Beethoven. One would suppose that Toscanini and Stokowski had discovered meanings which even the composers did not suspect. Come to think of it, perhaps they did.

But the public—at least that part of it we have met—has not betrayed any deep interest in the trends of musical thought, in the sum total of artistic deduction to be drawn from such a year as 1930. Perhaps it is as well that this should be the case. Each new work brought to our attention may be considered as a separate individuality. We shall probably not go far wrong if we pursue an untroubled course of observation and let the future detect our errors. The writer has observed that all the critics, in all parts of the world, are adrift on a sea of speculation. Let us stay ashore, or at least in the harbor. When very young the writer learned that the best storm trysail is a good anchor.

* * *

The Record of the Dying Year.

A CONSIDERABLE number of noxelties was produced in the year, but most of them were minor pieces of little substance. Of major works there were inevitably few. On January 9 the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time here Arnold Bax's second symphony, which may be accepted as one of the most important novelties of the twelve-month. This is good music, breathing sturdy manhood and the ebullient spirit of outdoors. It is well constructed, replete with interest for the listener and above all, healthy and wholesome art. That such a composition has come out of post-war Britain speaks volumes for the resolute old British soul.

The Schola Cantorum produced on March 26 Arthur Lurie's "Concerto Spirituale" for chorus, piano and double basses, with prologue for barytone solo and six brass instruments. The composition proved to be original in plan, including a long piano cadenza as one of its means of expression, intellectual and self-contained in conception, but of an exceptionally fine artistic texture. It was indisputably one of the outstanding disclosures of the year and should not be allowed to lapse into neglect.

The League of Composers gave performances of Schoenberg's "Die Gluecklicke Hand" and Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printempts" in the Metropolitan Opera House on April 22. The former was new. We do not accept such a work at the valuation placed upon it by the most advanced modernists. So far as the United States is concerned "Die Gluecklicke Hand" died on the Metropolitan stage on the evening of its production. The music does not come from within; it is a deliberate and not victorious attempt at a demonstration of Mr. Schoenberg's theories about the regeneration of art. We shall perhaps be invited by the propagandists to some future performance of it, but the world will proceed on its way quite ignorant of its existence. If we are as materialistic and commercialized as we are told, we shall not give attention to such symbolical dramas. If we are idealistic as some assert we shall shrink from such crass ugliness, spiritual and æsthetic.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played on November 21 Roussel's G minor symphony, a dignified and perfectly innocuous work. The same orchestra played on November 23 a symphony by Mcolas Nabokov, a young Russian expatriate, a composition not quite certain in method or results, but showing promise.

* * *

the soloist, and Ernest Ansermet conducted. Dr. Koussevitzky gave the work its first American performance in Boston on December 19, with J. M. Sanroma, who takes part in Thursday's concert, as the pianist.

Dr. Koussevitzky has changed his Carnegie Hall program for Saturday afternoon, which originally included a new Prokofieff symphony, and will devote it to Beethoven, including the G major piano concerto, with Myra Hess as soloist. For the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dr. Koussevitzky has prepared a program of numbers by Handel, Mozart and Tchaikovsky.

Hollinger — Upper center, Nickolas Murray

Left, David Mannes, who conducts Saturday night's free concert at the Metropolitan Art Museum; right, J. M. Sanroma, piano soloist in Stravinsky's Capriccio Saturday afternoon with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Upper center, Jascha Heifetz, who will give a violin recital tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Eve. World

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, will introduce to New York Stravinsky's new Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma in the solo part; Mozart's Symphony in G Minor, and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." On next Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall the orchestra will give a Beethoven program, Mr. Koussevitzky presenting the "Egmont" overture, the Fourth Piano Concerto with Myra Hess as soloist, and the Seventh Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

SERGE KOUSSEWITZKY

© RACHRACH

Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn and Manhattan this week.

Visiting Brooklyn for a second time this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at the Academy of Music on Friday evening of this week. The announced program includes the following music:

Handel.....Concerto Grosso for Strings
Mozart.....Symphony in G minor
Tschaikowsky.....Fourth Symphony

Serge Koussewitsky will conduct. The concert takes place under the auspices of the Institute.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Photo by Gore.

Jesús María Sanromá, Piano Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Thursday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Henry Hadley will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 17 and 18 in Boston when it presents his tone poem "Salomé" and his suite, "Streets of Peking." Haydn's symphony No. 1, in E flat, and McKinley's "Masquerade" will be on the same program.

romá will be the soloist. At the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10 Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Prokofieff's new symphony, composed especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its first New York performance.

92

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 4 - 1931

NEW SYMPHONY BY STRAVINSKY

STRAVINSKY'S "Symphonie des Psaumes," composed for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth aniversary, was played some days ago by that orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. Philip Hale wrote of it in The Boston Herald:

"It has been said that Stravinsky of late is deeply religious; that he may devote himself to the glorification of God in music. This rumor possibly arose from the fact that he dedicated his 'Symphonie de Psaumes' to the orchestra but composed it, as he states on the title page, 'to the glory of God.' But is this new symphony of Stravinsky the devout, more musical, more poetic, more imaginative than the compositions written in his supposedly pagan state?

"Stravinsky went to the Psalms for inspiration, choosing the sonorous text of the Vulgate verses of the thirty-ninth (the number in the King James version)—verses that are a prayer, an entreaty; from the fortieth, in which the Psalmist rejoices that his cry was heard, that he was taken from the horrible pit and the miry clay; and the 150th, in which the people are urged, and all things that have breath, to praise the Lord with the sound of all manner of instruments. His choice of instruments for these Psalms is peculiar: no violins, no violas, but five flutes, many other wind instruments, a harp. He called for two pianos. Although the psalmist wished organs and high-sounding cymbals to give praise, Stravinsky would not be the man to be so literal in his orchestration."

The European première of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" was given at Brussels some days ago, marking the first occasion, it is said, when a new work by the Russian composer has been introduced to the public in Europe anywhere but in Paris. It is interesting to note that this work, written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth anniversary, was presented by Mr. Koussevitzky a week after the first performance in Brussels.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 7 1931

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, PIANIST, TO APPEAR HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Present Him as Soloist, Jan. 20.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, originally announced as soloist for the last Providence concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear with that organization when it gives its third concert this season in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 20. Mr. Sanroma's scheduled appearance was postponed when the illness of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, necessitated a rearrangement of the program last month.

Mr. Sanroma will be the soloist with the orchestra in Stravinsky's "Capriccio" in three movements, given the place of importance just before the interval in the program here. He has played this number with the Boston orchestra in its home city and also at a recent New York concert. He will be the first soloist that the Boston Symphony has brought to Providence in a number of seasons.

Wagner and Beethoven will be the other composers on the program announced last night by Dr. Koussevitsky, who will return to the conductor's stand. He will open the concert with Beethoven's first symphony, in C-major, opus 21, while a group of three compositions from Wagner's operatic writings will follow the intermission. They include "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure," the "Prelude" and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, PIANIST, TO APPEAR HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Present Him as Soloist, Jan. 20.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, originally announced as soloist for the last Providence concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear with that organization when it gives its third concert this season in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 20. Mr. Sanroma's scheduled appearance was postponed when the illness of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, necessitated a rearrangement of the program last month.

Mr. Sanroma will be the soloist with the orchestra in Stravinsky's "Capriccio" in three movements, given the place of importance just before the interval in the program here. He has played this number with the Boston orchestra in its home city and also at a recent New York concert. He will be the first soloist that the Boston Symphony has brought to Providence in a number of seasons.

Wagner and Beethoven will be the other composers on the program announced last night by Dr. Koussevitsky, who will return to the conductor's stand. He will open the concert with Beethoven's first symphony, in C-major, opus 21, while a group of three compositions from Wagner's operatic writings will follow the intermission. They include "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure," the "Prelude" and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

KOUSSEVITZKY MAY LOVE IT, BUT COLLEGE AUDIENCES DON'T

To the Editor of the Evening Post:

Sir—Your editorial on "College Glee Clubs" creates a strange impression.

When I was in the Harvard Glee Club, in 1921, we could sing on sight any "college tune" or even such simpler classical works as Handel's "Let Their Celestial Concerts All Unite." We devoted our time at rehearsals, therefore, to the works of Brahms, Morley, Palestrina, Bach and others which presented greater technical difficulties. "Up the Street," "Soldiers Field," "Harvardiana" and other such songs we rendered at the football rallies without any previous practice whatever.

We felt, and I suppose still feel, that this unique opportunity for singing classical music under the magic direction of "Doc" Davidson was one of the episodes in our college careers from which we derived the greatest pleasure and instruction.

I am unable to understand why you think we should have foregone this pleasure and instruction in order that you, Mr. Robert A. Gardner, the noted amateur golfer, and certain correspondents of the Yale Alumni Weekly could be regaled at the concerts in New York City with "college tunes" such as any group of men can render for themselves who possess an adequate set of lungs and the price of a popular songbook.

The glee club concerts may be a bore to you, but they were not to the undergraduates of Harvard and Radcliffe, who in my day stood in throngs in the Yard to listen to the glee club sing classical music from the steps of Widener Library during the mellow evenings of May. Nor was this type of singing a bore to Serge Koussevitzky when he directed the rendition of Brahms's "Requiem" by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society at Symphony Hall in Boston a few years later. On the contrary, Koussevitzky was unstinted in his enthusiasm and public praise.

K. O. MOTT-SMITH.

New York, Jan. 6, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

JAN 9 - 1931

STRAVINSKY CAPRICE PREMIERED HERE BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Stravinsky premieres do not come around as often as they used to, for that former picturesque leader of the arch-radicals in music composes considerably less since he has gone tonally straight, and back to Bach.

A "first time in New York," therefore, of any work by Igor Stravinsky is an event these days. That is why the audience at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last evening met the Russian composer's locally unfamiliar "Capriccio" (for piano and orchestra) with an understandable degree of expectancy.

Parisian critics, who wrote about the work after its first hearing in Paris in 1929, described it as being in Stravinsky's earlier manner. I should say that parts of it are and parts of it aren't.

The composition as a whole is conceived and carried out with neo-classic foundation in form and romping freedom in treatment and development. Choppy episodes, absence of romanticism and abounding vitality mark the writing. The piano is somewhat more prominent than the rest of the instruments, but is used as an integral part of the orchestra.

The themes are attractive, pithy, short. No harmonic ugliness grates on the ear. Polite mockery, cynical lyricism and dry humor seem to be the prevailing moods of the piece, a true "Capriccioso," in its restlessness, lightness and whimsicality.

Snatches of Stravinsky's own "Soldat" and "Petrouchka," as well as of Bach, Liszt, Tschaikowsky, Strauss, Hindemith and Godowsky, dashed in and out of the pages of this bright, breezy, bouncing "Capriccio," recognizable as coming from an artful, aristocratic and charmingly disillusioned composer.

Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano part with smoothness, intelligence and elan. Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra supplied finished and propulsive orchestral co-operation.

The program opened with Mozart's unalterably lovely G Minor Symphony, but its ingratiating message was marred, on the whole, by occasional arbitrariness in the interpretation, which here and there robbed the work of some of its usual simple and direct appeal.

Too much literalness in emphasizing the phrase, over-sophistication of nuance, and too sudden contrasts in volume of tone marked Koussevitzky's handling of a score which requires much more spontaneity and charm than he gave to it last evening.

Winding up the concert was "Pictures at an Exhibition," Ravel's orchestral setting of the well-known piano suite by Moussorgsky. Here Koussevitzky showed the right atmospheric alignment with the descriptive music and his reading provided a series of fascinating enjoyments.

No fault could be found at any time with the playing of the Boston Orchestra, which is a superb symphonic instrument and in fullest artistic co-operation with the intentions and directions of its accomplished conductor.

* * *

Coughs and colds made no inroads on the bulletined cast of "La Boheme" at the Metropolitan Opera last evening, where indispositions have brought so many sudden absences and substitutions of recent days.

Puccini's opera was sung by that mellifluous and convincing pair of lyricists, Lucrezia Bori and Giovanni Martinelli, as the young lovers. Antonio Scotti portrayed the painter, Marcello. The pert Musetta had a glib exponent in Nanette Guilford. The baton was in the hands of Vincenzo Bellezza. No wind or weather ever seems to keep conductors away from work. They are a hardy race.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAM

Music : By Oscar Thompson

New Stravinsky Capriccio for Orchestra, With Piano Solo Introduced by Koussevitzky

FANTASY abides in the muse of Igor Stravinsky, devious as have been the paths he has followed since his early "Fireworks," his "Firebird," his "Petruschka" and his "Sacre du Printemps." The Capriccio for Orchestra With Piano Solo which Serge Koussevitzky introduced to New York at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall is one of Stravinsky's latest works, having had its first performance in Paris only a little more than a year ago. It will scarcely take rank as one of his most important, but it possesses more to make it acceptable to audiences grown weary of experimentation for experimentation's sake than most of the products of his post-"Sacre" veerings.

Technique he has always, even when he pursues such dubious ends as those in his expressionless Symphonies for Wind Instruments, or the banalities of his pseudo-Tchaikovsky ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee." The Capriccio goes beyond technique in asserting the Stravinsky personality and does so largely by virtue of its fantasy. Technique and fantasy together redeem material that in other hands might have remained essentially commonplace, if not trivial and banal. As in "Apollon Musagettes," this is a tamed Stravinsky, but one who remains an individual where individuals are few.

With Jesus Maria Sanroma as the collaborating pianist, Mr. Koussevitzky gave a delightfully crisp and pointed performance of the new Stravinsky opus. The piano part was refreshingly well played. It is not to be looked upon in the light of the piano part of a concerto, but rather as a binder for orchestral arabesques, the while it is ornamental and full of whimsies of its own, with graceful scale passages and odd bits of bass tying together episodes in which the piano is an important participant but not the protagonist. Fantasy lifts it out of that purely percussive, even xylophonic, role it has played in other of Stravinsky's later compositions; it is closer to the sportiveness of the woodwinds in the spirit of its use.

THERE is much that is unusual in the timbres of the Stravinsky scoring. The spacing of the instruments, so to speak, contrasts their less frequently combined registers. The effect is of brightness without scintillance, save that in some choiring by the woodwinds there is a curiously dark luster. Toward the close something of the Viennese spirit pervades the music, only to give way to what suggests ragtime, if not jazz. Here Stravinsky's technique serves him well. He extricates himself from the cheap by the neatness and ingenuity of his writing. Along the way are some curiously hollow spaces. The whole suggests a stage pantomime. Certainly a visual program would not be difficult to supply; indeed, one of Stravinsky's French commentators seems already to have put Harlequin, Columbine and their cohorts into this music. From the first the ballet has been Stravinsky's metier.

Mr. Koussevitzky played also Mozart's G Minor Symphony and the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exposition," the first with an appropriately small ensemble, the second with the augmented forces called for in the very apt orchestration made by Maurice Ravel. The programmatic side of the Moussorgsky-Ravel work was particularly well delineated. These were pictures, not merely sonorities. The Mozart Symphony had for us some unnecessarily finicky details, but played no small part in the satisfaction of a concert that was an admirable example of effective program-making.

which received its first performance anywhere at a concert of the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris on December 6, 1929, with the composer himself as pianist and Ernest Ansermet conducting.

Is Played Without Pause.

Though the work is played without pause, it is in three movements—a "Presto," an "Allegro rapsodico" and an "Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto." I may as well say at once that I found it a fascinating composition and am all eagerness to hear it again.

In the first place, it is really capricious, as parts of "Petrouchka" are. Stravinsky himself has declared that the "point of departure" of this work is his passionate admiration for Tschaikowsky. The departure, then, has taken him far away from the agonizings of that sick soul, from the barbaric frenzies of its revolt.

Yet there is a searchingly human note in this capriccio that is quite different from the impassivity which only a few years ago seemed to be Stravinsky's marmoreal ideal. Is the piano after those haunting introductory chords a meditating harlequin who asks if nothing in life can be taken seriously, not friendship, not love?

Free from Surplusage.

On with the dance, and bring us wine, more wine, for wine is real, and when we have drunken deeply of it many things have ceased to matter. And Tschaikowsky knew this, too. But he set "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt" and took the path to the charnel house when the wine had begun mocking.

Stravinsky's capriccio is replete with echoes and allusions. What of it? They only enrich the texture of the score, a score which is most adroitly and delightfully free from all surplusage, "vigorous, agile, muscular, not heavy, but elegant as a gymnast," in the appreciative words of Pierre de Lapommeraye.

Applause Tumultuous.

The performance by Mr. Sanroma and the Boston band was utterly magnificent, and the huge audience received the offering with tumultuous applause.

Before the capriccio Mozart's G minor symphony came in for a reading of which less praise can be spoken.

But after the novelty the Athenian visitors served up Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel, in superb enough fashion to please anybody who cares to listen to pictures.

92

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

JAN 4 - 1931

NEW SYMPHONY BY STRAVINSKY

STRAVINSKY'S "Symphonie des Psaumes," composed for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth aniversary, was played some days ago by that orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. Philip Hale wrote of it in The Boston Herald:

"It has been said that Stravinsky of late is deeply religious; that he may devote himself to the glorification of God in music. This rumor possibly arose from the fact that he dedicated his 'Symphonie de Psaumes' to the orchestra but composed it, as he states on the title page, 'to the glory of God.' But is this new symphony of Stravinsky the devout, more musical, more poetic, more imaginative than the compositions written in his supposedly pagan state?

"Stravinsky went to the Psalms for inspiration, choosing the sonorous text of the Vulgate verses of the thirty-ninth (the number in the King James version)—verses that are a prayer, an entreaty; from the fortieth, in which the Psalmist rejoices that his cry was heard, that he was taken from the horrible pit and the miry clay; and the 150th, in which the people are urged, and all things that have breath, to praise the Lord with the sound of all manner of instruments. His choice of instruments for these Psalms is peculiar: no violins, no violas, but five flutes, many other wind instruments, a harp. He called for two pianos. Although the psalmist wished organs and high-sounding cymbals to give praise, Stravinsky would not be the man to be so literal in his orchestration."

The European première of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" was given at Brussels some days ago, marking the first occasion, it is said, when a new work by the Russian composer has been introduced to the public in Europe anywhere but in Paris. It is interesting to note that this work, written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth anniversary, was presented by Mr. Koussevitzky a week after the first performance in Brussels.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 7 1931

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, PIANIST, TO APPEAR HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Present Him as Soloist, Jan. 20.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, originally announced as soloist for the last Providence concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear with that organization when it gives its third concert this season in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 20. Mr. Sanroma's scheduled appearance was postponed when the illness of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, necessitated a rearrangement of the program last month.

Mr. Sanroma will be the soloist with the orchestra in Stravinsky's "Capriccio" in three movements, given the place of importance just before the interval in the program here. He has played this number with the Boston orchestra in its home city and also at a recent New York concert. He will be the first soloist that the Boston Symphony has brought to Providence in a number of seasons.

Wagner and Beethoven will be the other composers on the program announced last night by Dr. Koussevitsky, who will return to the conductor's stand. He will open the concert with Beethoven's first symphony, in C-major, opus 21, while a group of three compositions from Wagner's operatic writings will follow the intermission. They include "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure," the "Prelude" and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JA[illegible]

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, PIANIST, TO APPEAR HERE

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Present Him as Soloist, Jan. 20.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, originally announced as soloist for the last Providence concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear with that organization when it gives its third concert this season in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 20. Mr. Sanroma's scheduled appearance was postponed when the illness of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, necessitated a rearrangement of the program last month.

Mr. Sanroma will be the soloist with the orchestra in Stravinsky's "Capriccio" in three movements, given the place of importance just before the interval in the program here. He has played this number with the Boston orchestra in its home city and also at a recent New York concert. He will be the first soloist that the Boston Symphony has brought to Providence in a number of seasons.

Wagner and Beethoven will be the other composers on the program announced last night by Dr. Koussevitsky, who will return to the conductor's stand. He will open the concert with Beethoven's first symphony, in C-major, opus 21, while a group of three compositions from Wagner's operatic writings will follow the intermission. They include "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure," the "Prelude" and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

KOUSSEVITZKY MAY LOVE IT, BUT COLLEGE AUDIENCES DON'T

To the Editor of the Evening Post:

Sir—Your editorial on "College Glee Clubs" creates a strange impression.

When I was in the Harvard Glee Club, in 1921, we could sing on sight any "college tune" or even such simpler classical works as Handel's "Let Their Celestial Concerts All Unite." We devoted our time at rehearsals, therefore, to the works of Brahms, Morley, Palestrina, Bach and others which presented greater technical difficulties. "Up the Street," "Soldiers Field," "Harvardiana" and other such songs we rendered at the football rallies without any previous practice whatever.

We felt, and I suppose still feel, that this unique opportunity for singing classical music under the magic direction of "Doc" Davidson was one of the episodes in our college careers from which we derived the greatest pleasure and instruction.

I am unable to understand why you think we should have foregone this pleasure and instruction in order that you, Mr. Robert A. Gardner, the noted amateur golfer, and certain correspondents of the Yale Alumni Weekly could be regaled at the concerts in New York City with "college tunes" such as any group of men can render for themselves who possess an adequate set of lungs and the price of a popular songbook.

The glee club concerts may be a bore to you, but they were not to the undergraduates of Harvard and Radcliffe, who in my day stood in throngs in the Yard to listen to the glee club sing classical music from the steps of Widener Library during the mellow evenings of May. Nor was this type of singing a bore to Serge Koussevitzky when he directed the rendition of Brahms's "Requiem" by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society at Symphony Hall in Boston a few years later. On the contrary, Koussevitzky was unstinted in his enthusiasm and public praise.

K. O. MOTT-SMITH.

New York, Jan. 6, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

JAN 9 - 1931

STRAVINSKY CAPRICE PREMIERED HERE BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Stravinsky premieres do not come around as often as they used to, for that former picturesque leader of the arch-radicals in music composes considerably less since he has gone tonally straight, and back to Bach.

A "first time in New York," therefore, of any work by Igor Stravinsky is an event these days. That is why the audience at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last evening met the Russian composer's locally unfamiliar "Capriccio" (for piano and orchestra) with an understandable degree of expectancy.

Parisian critics, who wrote about the work after its first hearing in Paris in 1929, described it as being in Stravinsky's earlier manner. I should say that parts of it are and parts of it aren't.

The composition as a whole is conceived and carried out with neo-classic foundation in form and romping freedom in treatment and development. Choppy episodes, absence of romanticism and abounding vitality mark the writing. The piano is somewhat more prominent than the rest of the instruments, but is used as an integral part of the orchestra.

The themes are attractive, pithy, short. No harmonic ugliness grates on the ear. Polite mockery, cynical lyricism and dry humor seem to be the prevailing moods of the piece, a true "Capriccioso," in its restlessness, lightness and whimsicality.

Snatches of Stravinsky's own "Soldat" and "Petrouchka," as well as of Bach, Liszt, Tschaikowsky, Strauss, Hindemith and Godowsky, dashed in and out of the pages of this bright, breezy, bouncing "Capriccio," recognizable as coming from an artful, aristocratic and charmingly disillusioned composer.

Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano part with smoothness, intelligence and elan. Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra supplied finished and propulsive orchestral co-operation.

The program opened with Mozart's unalterably lovely G Minor Symphony, but its ingratiating message was marred, on the whole, by occasional arbitrariness in the interpretation, which here and there robbed the work of some of its usual simple and direct appeal.

Too much literalness in emphasizing the phrase, over-sophistication of nuance, and too sudden contrasts in volume of tone marked Koussevitzky's handling of a score which requires much more spontaneity and charm than he gave to it last evening.

Winding up the concert was "Pictures at an Exhibition," Ravel's orchestral setting of the well-known piano suite by Moussorgsky. Here Koussevitzky showed the right atmospheric alignment with the descriptive music and his reading provided a series of fascinating enjoyments.

No fault could be found at any time with the playing of the Boston Orchestra, which is a superb symphonic instrument and in fullest artistic co-operation with the intentions and directions of its accomplished conductor.

* * *

Coughs and colds made no inroads on the bulletined cast of "La Boheme" at the Metropolitan Opera last evening, where indispositions have brought so many sudden absences and substitutions of recent days.

Puccini's opera was sung by that mellifluous and convincing pair of lyricists, Lucrezia Bori and Giovanni Martinelli, as the young lovers. Antonio Scotti portrayed the painter, Marcello. The pert Musetta had a glib exponent in Nanette Guilford. The baton was in the hands of Vincenzo Bellezza. No wind or weather ever seems to keep conductors away from work. They are a hardy race.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

ng Out orts
ook Pegler of the greatest displeasure at the fight commissioners in busting Max yweight champion, down to the rank dignation has a rather high boiling acid. One time a distinguished war try after the crash of the war busi-

in- for A at ept om- the ut- ling ood remains an individual where individuals are few.

With Jesus Maria Sanroma as the collaborating pianist, Mr. Koussevitzky gave a delightfully crisp and pointed performance of the new Stravinsky opus. The piano part was refreshingly well played. It is not to be looked upon in the light of the piano part of a concerto, but rather as a binder for orchestral arabesques, the while it is ornamental and full of whimsies of its own, with graceful scale passages and odd bits of bass tying together episodes in which the piano is an important participant but not the protagonist. Fantasy lifts it out of that purely percussive, even xylophonic, role it has played in other of Stravinsky's later compositions; it is closer to the sportiveness of the woodwinds in the spirit of its use.

THERE is much that is unusual in the timbres of the Stravinsky scoring. The spacing of the instruments, so to speak, contrasts their less frequently combined registers. The effect is of brightness without scintillance, save that in some choiring by the woodwinds there is a curiously dark luster. Toward the close something of the Viennese spirit pervades the music, only to give way to what suggests ragtime, if not jazz. Here Stravinsky's technique serves him well. He extricates himself from the cheap by the neatness and ingenuity of his writing. Along the way are some curiously hollow spaces. The whole suggests a stage pantomime. Certainly a visual program would not be difficult to supply; indeed, one of Stravinsky's French commentators seems already to have put Harlequin, Columbine and their cohorts into this music. From the first the ballet has been Stravinsky's metier.

Mr. Koussevitzky played also Mozart's G Minor Symphony and the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exposition," the first with an appropriately small ensemble, the second with the augmented forces called for in the very apt orchestration made by Maurice Ravel. The programmatic side of the Moussorgsky-Ravel work was particularly well delineated. These were pictures, not merely sonorities. The Mozart Symphony had for us some unnecessarily finicky details, but played no small part in the satisfaction of a concert that was an admirable example of effective program-making.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAM

STRAVINSKY'S CAPRICCIO GIVEN

Boston Symphony Heard in Work First Played in Paris 13 Months Ago.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Stravinsky—how often these have kept company! In Carnegie Hall, last evening, Mr. Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston band, treated New York to its first hearing of a capriccio for piano and orchestra by Stravinsky. The assisting pianist, as has happened more than once before when the Bostonians have visited our town, was Jesus Maria Sanroma.

Mr. Koussevitzky already had regaled Boston with the capriccio, which received its first performance anywhere at a concert of the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris on December 6, 1929, with the composer himself as pianist and Ernest Ansermet conducting.

Is Played Without Pause.

Though the work is played without pause, it is in three movements—a "Presto," an "Allegro rapsodico" and an "Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto." I may as well say at once that I found it a fascinating composition and am all eagerness to hear it again.

In the first place, it is really capricious, as parts of "Petrouchka" are. Stravinsky himself has declared that the "point of departure" of this work is his passionate admiration for Tschaikowsky. The departure, then, has taken him far away from the agonizings of that sick soul, from the barbaric frenzies of its revolt.

Yet there is a searchingly human note in this capriccio that is quite different from the impassivity which only a few years ago seemed to be Stravinsky's marmoreal ideal. Is the piano after those haunting introductory chords a meditating harlequin who asks if nothing in life can be taken seriously, not friendship, not love?

Free from Surplusage.

On with the dance, and bring us wine, more wine, for wine is real, and when we have drunken deeply of it many things have ceased to matter. And Tschaikowsky knew this, too. But he set "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt" and took the path to the charnel house when the wine had begun mocking.

Stravinsky's capriccio is replete with echoes and allusions. What of it? They only enrich the texture of the score, a score which is most adroitly and delightfully free from all surplusage, "vigorous, agile, muscular, not heavy, but elegant as a gymnast," in the appreciative words of Pierre de Lapommeraye.

Applause Tumultuous.

The performance by Mr. Sanroma and the Boston band was utterly magnificent, and the huge audience received the offering with tumultuous applause.

Before the capriccio Mozart's G minor symphony came in for a reading of which less praise can be spoken.

But after the novelty the Athenian visitors served up Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel, in superb enough fashion to please anybody who cares to listen to pictures.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

JAN 9 1931

Boston Orchestra Gives Premiere By Stravinsky

By IRVING WEIL.

The performance of a new work by Igor Stravinsky, beyond much question the most important and also the most incalculable of living composers, always arouses a great deal of both curiosity and speculation. Accordingly, the crowd that filled Carnegie Hall last night, at the concert of the Boston Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, was mentally on tiptoe over the event of the evening the New York premiere of Stravinsky's capriccio for orchestra and piano.

The pieces, unlike every other of this modernistic Russian, was an instantaneous success. Hisses, groans and shouts of incensed disapproval have been the rule in the way of greeting for most of his advanced experiments. But this capriccio, which is filled with snatches of sentimental salon melody and finds its climax in Stravinsky toying with an ordinary waltz, was unstintedly applauded.

A PUZZLE.

The music, quite frankly, was a puzzle to this reviewer. It is almost unbelievable that the tradition-breaker who wrote the savage and nerve-shattering "Consecration of Spring," the strange and arresting "Marriage Rite" or the later octet for wind instruments or even the piano concerto, should have intended this new capriccio seriously. If he did, it is nothing more than a facile time-filler; and if he didn't, then it was quite misapprehended in last night's presentation.

It should not be out of place, in some attempt to find out what Stravinsky may here really have had in mind, to review quickly what is supposed to have been going on inside him recently. It is known that, after his most radical experiments, he suddenly became enamored of the music of the eighteenth century and turned backward and, in some part, away from his own modernism.

The thing began about ten years ago with his ballet-suite, "Pulcinella", after Pergolesi. The piano concerto showed his preoccupation with Bach, "Oedipus Rex" with Handel. When "Apollo, Leader of the Muses" appeared, one learned that the nineteenth century was then in Stravinsky's mind and that this was a kind of Stravinskian transliteration of Tchaikovsky. The capriccio, one is told, is a further tribute to the nineteenth century Russian.

ABANDONED EARLY STYLE.

Unquestionably Stravinsky, about ten years ago, deliberately abandoned his earlier style and purpose of writing; but in all the music of these ten years, except this latest capriccio, it was still Stravinsky who always came first, whilst his models remained incidental. But the capriccio (a free form, by the way, that had its greatest development in the eighteenth century) is not even good incidental Tchaikovsky. And the slight dash of Stravinskian polytonality in it sounds merely like polybanality. One must hope that the composer really had his tongue in his cheek and that Mr. Koussevitzky didn't notice it.

The Boston Orchestra's evening began with the Mozart G-minor symphony, technically beautifully played but otherwise treated in ultra-classical spirit and ended with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibtion" in Maurice Ravel's apt orchestration. Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano part in the Stravinsky piece with great deftness.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

JAN 9 1931

New Stravinsky Piece Presented By Koussevitsky

Boston Orchestra, Playing at Carnegie Hall, Introduces Capriccio, With Piano Solo

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met their Thursday evening Carnegie Hall subscribers, whose numbers are many, yesterday and gave them the first local opportunuity to hear Igor Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo. The novelty was sandwiched between two familiar works, Mozart's G minor symphony and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," a version introduced to this country by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1924, early in his Bostonian career.

The Capriccio was first performed by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris on December 6, 1929, with the composer as the pianist and Ernest Ansermet conducting. The Boston Symphony gave it for the first time in this country in its home concert of December 19, with Jesus Maria Sanroma, last night's assisting artist, at the piano, on a program with a later Stravinsky work of a very different type, the Symphony of Psalms. It would have been interesting to hear this also in last night's concert, but that would have entailed the importation of a chorus.

In its first New York hearing the Capriccio seemed to please. It represents the versatile Igor in one of his lighter moods, in a somewhat sportive vein. The title is apt; it is a work with, rather than for, piano solo; the piano and orchestral roles are interwoven, rather than doing respective duty as featured soloist and accompanist, in this well-written score. It takes about twenty minutes to play, and has no formal division of movements, although there are changes of pace and dominant color marking it off, to a certain extent, into sections.

It is an engaging, mildly tantalizing work. The composer turns to tunes of a Russian type recalling those of "Petrushka," but keeps these in the background; his harmonies are subtly savorous, his scoring delicately and effectively shaded, and the work gives a general impression of amiability and conservatism, with an underlying hint, here and there, of subacidity. Darker hues occasionally vary the prevailing fast-moving chattiness. With its deftness and humor, however, the work has one or two drawbacks, such as a certain prolixity in the closing section, suggesting clever, but rather prolonged, musical gossip about nothing in particular.

Mr. Sanroma gave a fluent, polished, praiseworthy reading of the piano part, perfectly co-ordinated with the playing of his orchestral colleagues, and conductor, pianist and orchestra shared warm plaudits for a virtuoso performance.

String Quartet Heard With Grainger

In Town Hall the New York String Quartet and Percy Grainger also gave a first local hearing of a work by a contemporary composer, Cyril Scott's quintet for piano and strings. In this work the British composer does not eschew emotion and writes in the neo-romantic vein which has become naturalized in Great Britain via France. Much of the work is effective, much of it is convincingly expressive; despite certain reminiscences, one or two harking back even to Tchaikovsky, it has a certain homogeneity and individuality of style. But it could have said its say better at less length; it sometimes gives an impression of repetitiousness, of undecided progress; there is not enough difference in mood and color among the various movements to afford sufficient variety.

The quartet and Mr. Grainger gave a well balanced and eloquent performance. Messrs. Cadek, Siskovsky, Schwab and Prinz began the evening with Beethoven's C minor quartet, Op. 18, No. 4, and a contemporary Spanish work, Joaquin Turina's "La Oracion del Torero." A good sized audience was enthusiastic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

JAN 9 1931

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitsky Offers Stravinsky Composition in Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come back to town, bearing Igor Stravinsky's latest invention for the confusion of the pedestrian mind. This masterpiece of futility was the central number on the program of the orchestra's second concert of its forty-fifth season in New York, given last evening in Carnegie Hall before a most considerate assembly of music lovers.

The work is called a capriccio for orchestra with piano solo and it was first performed in Paris on December 6, 1929. On that occasion Mr. Stravinsky was the pianist. Last evening Jesus Maria Sanroma was at the keyboard and we may dismiss him with the simple declaration that he did his best, which is very good.

Philip Hale, who makes inspired program notes for the Boston symphony concerts, quoted from French critics about Mr. Stravinsky's composition. They said charming things and like true Frenchmen said them with indescribable grace. But we confess with deep sorrow that we cannot echo their beautiful sentiments any more than we can imitate their exquisite style. Mr. Stravinsky's capriccio was for this music lover the wind blown ashes of a fire long dead.

The entire work is disjointed, spasmodic in utterance, without structural continuity and feeble in thematic subject matter and instrumental treatment. It is not especially objectionable on the ground of ugliness. Indeed some of it is melodious in rather ancient manner and certain pages of the piano part, which is an obligato rather than a solo as generally understood, have a mild interest. Many others belong to the venerable class of tuner's runs. The harmonies are extreme in spots, but continent in most of the pages. There are almost no instrumental tutti; the orchestra speaks chiefly in small groups. There is even a kind of concertino group of strings, which seemed to have no special reason for existence.

The third movement, which is marked allegro capriccioso, is the best of the three. For this we have to thank no less a personage than Richard Strauss. We did not think to live to hear Stravinsky repeating a lesson learned from that old gentleman, but if there had been no "Rosenkavalier" there would certainly have been no such allegro capriccioso as we heard last night. But Strauss did it better.

When Strauss brought forward his "Symphonia Domestica," Ernest Newman said it was the work of a clever man who had once been a genius. Those who remembered their "Petruchka" and "Sacre du Printemps" must have thought something of the same sort when they listened to the strivings and pantings of the score made known to last evening's audience. All these advanced composers have periods which they point out themselves and discuss with delightful candor. We do not know in what period Mr. Stravinsky sees himself just now; but we are sure of one thing; namely, that he has traveled far out of his era of "back to Bach."

The first number on the program was Mozart's G Minor Symphony, which Mr. Koussvitzky performed with a reduced orchestra and with exceeding delicacy. In fact, it is possible that Mozart himself would politely have requested the eminent conductor to put a little more pepper in the sauce. The concert was completed with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" orchestrated by Ravel. Mr. Koussevitzky has an enduring affection for this work. We trust his love for Mr. Stravinsky's capriccio will not withstand the winds of as many winters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Eve. World

JAN 9 1931

1929, under the direction of Ernest Ansermet, with Stravinsky as soloist, Mossourgsky's "Pictures of an Exhibition" figured on the list. This same set of pieces, in the orchestral garb provided for them by Ravel, found a place on yesterday's bill, which was rounded out by the Mozart Symphony in G Minor.

The "Capriccio" made its local entry under the most auspicious circumstances. With Jesus Maria Sanroma officiating at the piano, it reveled in a dazzlingly brilliant performance in which the virtuosity of the assisting artist and that of the orchestra were alike breathtaking. Mr. Sanroma, who had scored heavily when he first appeared in this city under the same baton in the Toch concerto, again proved an incomparable interpreter of modernistic music for his instrument at this reappearance. Conquering the extreme difficulties of the keyboard score with amazing ease, he made his share in the reading noteworthy for clarity crispness and tonal glamour.

Those who expected that the "Capriccio" would bear any resemblance in style to the "Sacre" or the earlier methods of the composer in the "Firebird" and "Petruchka," were destined to be surprised, as well as any in the audience prepared to hear another effort in the mock-classical vein of "Musagetes." Like the latter, it exemplified Stravinsky's recent preoccupation with neo-classicism. But as might have been anticipated from Stravinsky's constant change of manner from one work to another, the "Capriccio" again showed its author in an entirely new light. In the almost forgotten Piano Concerto, he had adhered closely to Bach and Handel in his choice of thematic material and coupled the solo part to a jazz accompaniment. Reverting to a remoter past in "Musagetes," he had given that composition, founded on seventeenth century models, much the character of an ancient concerto grosso.

But the "Capriccio," which once more turns backward for its subject matter, pilfers from innumerable soufces, while in its coloring it achieves a quality absolutely different from that of any of its predecessors in Stravinsky's output. Likewise it stands on a changed rhythmic basis, and its harmonic and melodic treatment is also dissimilar. Nineteenth century romantic influences show their effect not only on the themes of the first of the three movements, but in practically all of the elaborate filigree of the highly ornamental passage-work that forms one of the chief characteristics of the opus. Bach plays his role in the second division, entitled "Andante rapsodico," while the final "Allegro capriccioso" goes to Vienna and the cabarets, as melodic sources. And yet because of its individual treatment, the work successfully manages to achieve a satisfactory sense of unity, despite this hodgepodge of ingredients.

One factor that helps toward this end is the texture of the score, in which a soft blending of piano and flute tone predominates. Polytonality is sparingly used and the dissonances are very mild throughout. Most of them are the result of passing clashes in the counterpoint. And in the handling of counterpoint—a fundamental device of every page of this music—Stravinsky reveals a master hand. A most astonishing aspect of the music is its reversion to a strong tonic-dominant feeling in the harmonic structure. Moreover each movement is in one definite key and adheres tenaciously to it with few indulgences in remote modulations. Another peculiarity of each of the three sections is the almost undeviating employment of a strong undercurrent of duple rhythm, which keeps the ornate melodic configurations from becoming diffuse, or vague in meaning. Furthermore, Stravinsky gives the work an unaccustomed quality by abandoning his usual short fragments of tune for melodies of a pronouncedly more extensive type. Most of these are cheap in themselves, but lose their commonplace nature through the uncanny skill with which they are manipulated. The first movement was found to be especially attractive at a first hearing on account of the clarity of its tripartite design and the strikingly original effect of the introduction, with its bold chords and glissandi interrupted by quiet passages for the strings. This introductory matter appeared again at the close of the movement, and resolved itself into concluding measures that formed the most telling portion of the novelty, by means of chromatic harmonies moving above a double pedal voiced alternately by piano and cello. In comparison to the magnificence of the interpretation given this capriccio, the Mozart symphony was rather a dull and profitless affair as Mr. Koussevitsky conceived its exquisite content.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 1931

...IC ...f the Day

...RD CUSHING

...r Piano and Orchestra Is ...itsky and the Bostonians

...traus
...n Symphony Orchestra New York
... of many an important novelty. It
...ce the esteemed conductor and his
... which so immediately caught the ...nsky's "Capriccio," which held the ...nization's second program of the ...terday evening.

...concert given in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussewitsky, who have been responsible for our introduction to a number of Strawinsky's latter-day productions. The Capriccio followed Mozart's G-minor Symphony (of which Mr. Koussewitsky delivered a mannered and on the whole disaffecting reading) and was received by the audience with polite applause.

* * *

The Capriccio is music for a society that can be flattered by a reflection of its own fatuity. Art, mirroring the prevailing temper and tendencies of a time, here mirrors ours. It may very well be that we have not yet reached the point of willingly admitting the verisimilitude of the reflection, but there are plenty of signs to tell us, if we stop to read them, that the lease of our illusions upon our sense of reality is near the end of its duration. Let us acknowledge at least that the Capriccio is very typical of the music of composers whom history, a hundred years hence, will recollect as products of the culture of the post-war world. * * *

There is, of course, other music among that of our contemporaries to which we prefer to pin our faith and hope—but it is, we know, a hollow faith and a foredoomed hope. For the Capriccio, with its emptiness of emotion or experience, is truly and deplorably the music of today—and, what is far worse, the music of tomorrow as well—and this other music, in which we profess a specious faith and hope, is only the music of those who remember and regret and will not willingly relinquish a time that is past and a world that is tragically dead.

The Capriccio is an appalling work. We say this knowing it well, for it has been recorded for the

A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, assisting artist. At Carnegie Hall last evening.

THE PROGRAM

Mozart .....Symphony in G minor
Strawinsky..Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra
(First time in New York.)
Moussorgsky-Ravel..Pictures at an Exposition

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

JAN 9 193...

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist.

Symphony in G Minor (K. 550)....Mozart
Capriccio for piano and orchestra, Stravinsky
(First time in New York)
Pictures at an Exhibition, Moussorgsky-Ravel

Stravinsky Redivivus

Last night's visit of the Boston Symphony provided us with Mozart's G Minor Symphony, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and Stravinsky's "Capriccio for Orchestra and Piano Solo." The "Capriccio" was a first performance in New York, though it had been released at a concert in Paris as long ago as December, 1929. Things have come to a pretty pass when it takes a year for the music of the daddy of all modernists to travel from Paris to New York.

French critics who heard the "Capriccio" said openly that in it Stravinsky is his old self again, and that he had flung away Bach's old wig, which he had been wearing since the composition of his "Symphonies for Wind Instruments." The French critics must have been deceived by the first and last sections of the "Capriccio," in which, to be sure, not a hair of Bach may be seen; for in the middle section the old wig protruded unmistakably last night. Here Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the excellent soloist, wove reams of Bach-like arabesques on his piano, while Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra provided a more modern background.

The other two movements exposed an uninterrupted succession of the decisive rhythms which are Stravinsky's chief stock-in-trade. It would be easy enough to say of the "Capriccio" that it is a panorama of modern life, with its ceaseless variety of moods borne along on a current of hectic energy. Perhaps it is just that. This reviewer can only report that it was played for all it was worth by Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanroma, and that the audience seemed to like it immensely.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

Boston Orchestra Gives Premiere By Stravinsky

By IRVING WEIL.

The performance of a new work by Igor Stravinsky, beyond much question the most important and also the most incalculable of living composers, always arouses a great deal of both curiosity and speculation. Accordingly, the crowd that filled Carnegie Hall last night, at the concert of the Boston Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, was mentally on tiptoe over the event of the evening the New York premiere of Stravinsky's capriccio for orchestra and piano.

The pieces, unlike every other of his modernistic Russian, was an instantaneous success. Hisses, groans and shouts of incensed disapproval have been the rule in the way of greeting for most of his advanced experiments. But this capriccio, which is filled with snatches of sentimental salon melody and finds its climax in Stravinsky toying with an ordinary waltz, was unstintedly applauded.

A PUZZLE.

The music, quite frankly, was a puzzle to this reviewer. It is almost unbelievable that the tradition-breaker who wrote the savage and nerve-shattering "Consecration of Spring," the strange and arresting "Marriage Rite" or the later octet for wind instruments or even the piano concerto, should have intended this new capriccio seriously. If he did, it is nothing more than a facile time-filler; and if he didn't, then it was quite misapprehended in last night's presentation.

It should not be out of place, in some attempt to find out what Stravinsky may here really have had in mind, to review quickly what is supposed to have been going on inside him recently. It is known that, after his most radical experiments, he suddenly became enamored of the music of the eighteenth century and turned backward and, in some part, away from his own modernism.

The thing began about ten years ago with his ballet-suite, "Pulcinella", after Pergolesi. The piano concerto showed his preoccupation with Bach, "Oedipus Rex" with Handel. When "Apollo, Leader of the Muses" appeared, one learned that the nineteenth century was then in Stravinsky's mind and that this was a kind of Stravinskian transliteration of Tchaikovsky. The capriccio, one is told, is a further tribute to the nineteenth century Russian.

ABANDONED EARLY STYLE.

Unquestionably Stravinsky, about ten years ago, deliberately abandoned his earlier style and purpose of writing; but in all the music of these ten years, except this latest capriccio, it was still Stravinsky who always came first, whilst his models remained incidental. But the capriccio (a free form, by the way, that had its greatest development in the eighteenth century) is not even good incidental Tchaikovsky. And the slight dash of Stravinskian polytonality in it sounds merely like polybanality. One must hope that the composer really had his tongue in his cheek and that Mr. Koussevitzky didn't notice it.

The Boston Orchestra's evening began with the Mozart G-minor symphony, technically beautifully played but otherwise treated in ultra-classical spirit and ended with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibtion" in Maurice Ravel's apt orchestration. Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano part in the Stravinsky piece with great deftness.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

New Stravinsky Piece Presented By Koussevitsky

Boston Orchestra, Playing at Carnegie Hall, Introduces Capriccio, With Piano Solo

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met their Thursday evening Carnegie Hall subscribers, whose numbers are many, yesterday and gave them the first local opportunity to hear Igor Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo. The novelty was sandwiched between two familiar works, Mozart's G minor symphony and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," a version introduced to this country by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1924, early in his Bostonian career.

The Capriccio was first performed by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris on December 6, 1929, with the composer as the pianist and Ernest Ansermet conducting. The Boston Symphony gave it for the first time in this country in its home concert of December 19, with Jesus Maria Sanroma, last night's assisting artist, at the piano, on a program with a later Stravinsky work of a very different type, the Symphony of Psalms. It would have been interesting to hear this also in last night's concert, but that would have entailed the importation of a chorus.

In its first New York hearing the Capriccio seemed to please. It represents the versatile Igor in one of his lighter moods, in a somewhat sportive vein. The title is apt; it is a work with, rather than for, piano solo; the piano and orchestral roles are interwoven, rather than doing respective duty as featured soloist and accompanist, in this well-written score. It takes about twenty minutes to play, and has no formal division of movements, although there are changes of pace and dominant color marking it off, to a certain extent, into sections.

It is an engaging, mildly tantalizing work. The composer turns to tunes of a Russian type recalling those of "Petrushka," but keeps these in the background; his harmonies are subtly savorous, his scoring delicately and effectively shaded, and the work gives a general impression of amiability and conservatism, with an underlying hint, here and there, of subacidity. Darker hues occasionally vary the prevailing fast-moving chattiness. With its deftness and humor, however, the work has one or two drawbacks, such as a certain prolixity in the closing section, suggesting clever, but rather prolonged, musical gossip about nothing in particular.

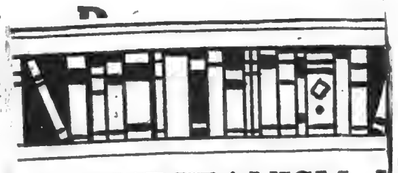
Mr. Sanroma gave a fluent, polished, praiseworthy reading of the piano part, perfectly co-ordinated with the playing of his orchestral colleagues, and conductor, pianist and orchestra shared warm plaudits for a virtuoso performance.

String Quartet Heard With Grainger

In Town Hall the New York String Quartet and Percy Grainger also gave a first local hearing of a work by a contemporary composer, Cyril Scott's quintet for piano and strings. In this work the British composer does not eschew emotion and writes in the neo-romantic vein which has become naturalized in Great Britain via France. Much of the work is effective, much of it is convincingly expressive; despite certain reminiscences, one or two harking back even to Tchaikovsky, it has a certain homogeneity and individuality of style. But it could have said its say better at less length; it sometimes gives an impression of repetitiousness, of undecided progress; there is not enough difference in mood and color among the various movements to afford sufficient variety.

The quartet and Mr. Grainger gave a well balanced and eloquent performance. Messrs. Cadek, Siskovsky, Schwab and Prinz began the evening with Beethoven's C minor quartet, Op. 18, No. 4, and a contemporary Spanish work, Joaquin Turina's "La Oracion del Torero." A good sized audience was enthusiastic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN



PURITANISM

THE DECLINE OF MERRY ENGLAN
rill. $3.

A lot of wasted research went into
She has a flair for ideas, Miss James readers of her "Modern Drama in Eu
It would therefore be well could the impress upon her pen succinctless. For the quantity of materia orchestra with piano solo and it was first performed in Paris on December 6, 1929. On that occasion Mr. Stravinsky was the pianist. Last evening Jesus Maria Sanroma was at the keyboard and we may dismiss him with the simple declaration that he did his best, which is very good.

Philip Hale, who makes inspired program notes for the Boston symphony concerts, quoted from French critics about Mr. Stravinsky's composition. They said charming things and like true Frenchmen said them with indescribable grace. But we confess with deep sorrow that we cannot echo their beautiful sentiments any more than we can imitate their exquisite style. Mr. Stravinsky's capriccio was for this music lover the wind blown ashes of a fire long dead.

The entire work is disjointed, spasmodic in utterance, without structural continuity and feeble in thematic subject matter and instrumental treatment. It is not especially objectionable on the ground of ugliness. Indeed, some of it is melodious in rather ancient manner and certain pages of the piano part, which is an obligato rather than a solo as generally understood, have a mild interest. Many others belong to the venerable class of tuner's runs. The harmonies are extreme in spots, but continent in most of the pages. There are almost no instrumental tutti; the orchestra speaks chiefly in small groups. There is even a kind of concertino group of strings, which seemed to have no special reason for existence.

The third movement, which is marked allegro capriccioso, is the best of the three. For this we have to thank no less a personage than Richard Strauss. We did not think to live to hear Stravinsky repeating a lesson learned from that old gentleman, but if there had been no "Rosenkavalier" there would certainly have been no such allegro capriccioso as we heard last night. But Strauss did it better.

When Strauss brought forward his "Symphonia Domestica," Ernest Newman said it was the work of a clever man who had once been a genius. Those who remembered their "Petruchka" and "Sacre du Printemps" must have thought something of the same sort when they listened to the strivings and pantings of the score made known to last evening's audience. All these advanced composers have periods which they point out themselves and discuss with delightful candor. We do not know in what period Mr. Stravinsky sees himself just now; but we are sure of one thing; namely, that he has traveled far out of his era of "back to Bach."

The first number on the program was Mozart's G Minor Symphony, which Mr. Koussvitzky performed with a reduced orchestra and with exceeding delicacy. In fact, it is possible that Mozart himself would politely have requested the eminent conductor to put a little more pepper in the sauce. The concert was completed with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" orchestrated by Ravel. Mr. Koussevitzky has an enduring affection for this work. We trust his love for Mr. Stravinsky's capriccio will not withstand the winds of as many winters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Eve. World

MU IC

By Noe Straus

TO Mr. Koussevitzky and the B is indebted for the first hearin is quite some time, however, since the esteemed conductor and his men have introduced a new work here which so immediately caught the fancy of an audience as Igor Stravinsky's "Capriccio," which held the place of honor on the visiting organization's second program of the season presented in Carnegie Hall yesterday evening.

When the "Capriccio," which is in the nature of a concerto for piano and orchestra, was given its world premiere at a concert of the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris on Dec. 6, 1929, under the direction of Ernest Ansermet, with Stravinsky as soloist, Mossourgsky's "Pictures of an Exhibition" figured on the list. This same set of pieces, in the orchestral garb provided for them by Ravel, found a place on yesterday's bill, which was rounded out by the Mozart Symphony in G Minor.

The "Capriccio" made its local entry under the most auspicious circumstances. With Jesus Maria Sanroma officiating at the piano, it reveled in a dazzlingly brilliant performance in which the virtuosity of the assisting artist and that of the orchestra were alike breathtaking. Mr. Sanroma, who had scored heavily when he first appeared in this city under the same baton in the Toch concerto, again proved an incomparable interpreter of modernistic music for his instrument at this reappearance. Conquering the extreme difficulties of the keyboard score with amazing ease, he made his share in the reading noteworthy for clarity, crispness and tonal glamour.

Those who expected that the "Capriccio" would bear any resemblance in style to the "Sacre" or the earlier methods of the composer in the "Firebird" and "Petruchka," were destined to be surprised, as well as any in the audience prepared to hear another effort in the mock-classical vein of "Musagetes." Like the latter, it exemplified Stravinsky's recent preoccupation with neo-classicism. But as might have been anticipated from Stravinsky's constant change of manner from one work to another, the "Capriccio" again showed its author in an entirely new light. In the almost forgotten Piano Concerto, he had adhered closely to Bach and Handel in his choice of thematic material and coupled the solo part to a jazz accompaniment. Reverting to a remoter past in "Musagetes," he had given that composition, founded on seventeenth century models, much the character of an ancient concerto grosso.

But the "Capriccio," which once more turns backward for its subject matter, pilfers from innumerable sources, while in its coloring it achieves a quality absolutely different from that of any of its predecessors in Stravinsky's output. Likewise it stands on a changed rhythmic basis, and its harmonic and melodic treatment is also dissimilar. Nineteenth century romantic influences show their effect not only on the themes of the first of the three movements, but in practically all of the elaborate filigree of the highly ornamental passage-work that forms one of the chief characteristics of the opus. Bach plays his role in the second division, entitled "Andante rapsodico," while the final "Allegro capriccioso" goes to Vienna and the cabarets, as melodic sources. And yet because of its individual treatment, the work successfully manages to achieve a satisfactory sense of unity, despite this hodgepodge of ingredients.

One factor that helps toward this end is the texture of the score, in which a soft blending of piano and flute tone predominates. Polytonality is sparingly used and the dissonances are very mild throughout. Most of them are the result of passing clashes in the counterpoint. And in the handling of counterpoint—a fundamental device of every page of this music—Stravinsky reveals a master hand. A most astonishing aspect of the music is its reversion to a strong tonic-dominant feeling in the harmonic structure. Moreover each movement is in one definite key and adheres tenaciously to it with few indulgences in remote modulations. Another peculiarity of each of the three sections is the almost undeviating employment of a strong undercurrent of duple rhythm, which keeps the ornate melodic configurations from becoming diffuse, or vague in meaning. Furthermore, Stravinsky gives the work an unaccustomed quality by abandoning his usual short fragments of tune for melodies of a pronouncedly more extensive type. Most of these are cheap in themselves, but lose their commonplace nature through the uncanny skill with which they are manipulated. The first movement was found to be especially attractive at a first hearing on account of the clarity of its tripartite design and the strikingly original effect of the introduction, with its bold chords and glissandi interrupted by quiet passages for the strings. This introductory matter appeared again at the close of the movement, and resolved itself into concluding measures that formed the most telling portion of the novelty, by means of chromatic harmonies moving above a double pedal voiced alternately by piano and cello. In comparison to the magnificence of the interpretation given this capriccio, the Mozart symphony was rather a dull and profitless affair as Mr. Koussevitsky conceived its exquisite content.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

73

f the Day

RD CUSHING

r Piano and Orchestra Is itsky and the Bostonians

A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, assisting artist. At Carnegie Hall last evening.

THE PROGRAM

Mozart ..... Symphony in G minor
Strawinsky..Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra
(First time in New York.)
Moussorgsky-Ravel..Pictures at an Exposition

place at a concert given in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussewitsky, who have been responsible for our introduction to a number of Strawinsky's latter-day productions. The Capriccio followed Mozart's G-minor Symphony (of which Mr. Koussewitsky delivered a mannered and on the whole disaffecting reading) and was received by the audience with polite applause.

* * *

The Capriccio is music for a society that can be flattered by a reflection of its own fatuity. Art, mirroring the prevailing temper and tendencies of a time, here mirrors ours. It may very well be that we have not yet reached the point of willingly admitting the verisimilitude of the reflection, but there are plenty of signs to tell us, if we stop to read them, that the lease of our illusions upon our sense of reality is near the end of its duration. Let us acknowledge at least that the Capriccio is very typical of the music of composers whom history, a hundred years hence, will recollect as products of the culture of the post-war world. * * *

There is, of course, other music among that of our contemporaries to which we prefer to pin our faith and hope—but it is, we know, a hollow faith and a foredoomed hope. For the Capriccio, with its emptiness of emotion or experience, is truly and deplorably the music of today—and, what is far worse, the music of tomorrow as well—and this other music, in which we profess a specious faith and hope, is only the music of those who remember and regret and will not willingly relinquish a time that is past and a world that is tragically dead.

The Capriccio is an appalling work. We say this knowing it well, for it has been recorded for the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Carnegie Hall, 8.30. Soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist.

Symphony in G Minor (K. 550)....Mozart
Capriccio for piano and orchestra, ... Stravinsky
(First time in New York)
Pictures at an Exhibition, ... Moussorgsky-Ravel

Stravinsky Redivivus

Last night's visit of the Boston Symphony provided us with Mozart's G Minor Symphony, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and Stravinsky's "Capriccio for Orchestra and Piano Solo." The "Capriccio" was a first performance in New York, though it had been released at a concert in Paris as long ago as December, 1929. Things have come to a pretty pass when it takes a year for the music of the daddy of all modernists to travel from Paris to New York.

French critics who heard the "Capriccio" said openly that in it Stravinsky is his old self again, and that he had flung away Bach's old wig, which he had been wearing since the composition of his "Symphonies for Wind Instruments." The French critics must have been deceived by the first and last sections of the "Capriccio," in which, to be sure, not a hair of Bach may be seen; for in the middle section the old wig protruded unmistakably last night. Here Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the excellent soloist, wove reams of Bach-like arabesques on his piano, while Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra provided a more modern background.

The other two movements exposed an uninterrupted succession of the decisive rhythms which are Stravinsky's chief stock-in-trade. It would be easy enough to say of the "Capriccio" that it is a panorama of modern life, with its ceaseless variety of moods borne along on a current of hectic energy. Perhaps it is just that. This reviewer can only report that it was played for all it was worth by Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanroma, and that the audience seemed to like it immensely.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

Boston Orchestra Gives Premiere By Stravinsky

By IRVING WEIL.

The performance of a new work by Igor Stravinsky, beyond much question the most important and also the most incalculable of living composers, always arouses a great deal of both curiosity and speculation. Accordingly, the crowd that filled Carnegie Hall last night, at the concert of the Boston Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, was mentally on tiptoe over the event of the evening the New York premiere of Stravinsky's capriccio for orchestra and piano.

The pieces, unlike every other of his modernistic Russian, was an instantaneous success. Hisses, groans and shouts of incensed disapproval have been the rule in the way of greeting for most of his advanced experiments. But this capriccio, which is filled with snatches of sentimental salon melody and finds its climax in Stravinsky toying with an ordinary waltz, was unstintedly applauded.

A PUZZLE.

The music, quite frankly, was a puzzle to this reviewer. It is almost unbelievable that the tradition-breaker who wrote the savage and nerve-shattering "Consecration of Spring," the strange and arresting "Marriage Rite" or the later octet for wind instruments or even the piano concerto, should have intended this new capriccio seriously. If he did, it is nothing more than a facile time-filler; and if he didn't, then it was quite misapprehended in last night's presentation.

It should not be out of place, in some attempt to find out what Stravinsky may here really have had in mind, to review quickly what is supposed to have been going on inside him recently. It is known that, after his most radical experiments, he suddenly became enamored of the music of the eighteenth century and turned backward and, in some part, away from his own modernism.

The thing began about ten years ago with his ballet-suite, "Pulcinella", after Pergolesi. The piano concerto showed his preoccupation with Bach, "Oedipus Rex" with Handel. When "Apollo, Leader of the Muses" appeared, one learned that the nineteenth century was then in Stravinsky's mind and that this was a kind of Stravinskian transliteration of Tchaikovsky. The capriccio, one is told, is a further tribute to the nineteenth century Russian.

ABANDONED EARLY STYLE.

Unquestionably Stravinsky, about ten years ago, deliberately abandoned his earlier style and purpose of writing; but in all the music of these ten years, except this latest capriccio, it was still Stravinsky who always came first, whilst his models remained incidental. But the capriccio (a free form, by the way, that had its greatest development in the eighteenth century) is not even good incidental Tchaikovsky. And the slight dash of Stravinskian polytonality in it sounds merely like polybanality. One must hope that the composer really had his tongue in his cheek and that Mr. Koussevitzky didn't notice it.

The Boston Orchestra's evening began with the Mozart G-minor symphony, technically beautifully played but otherwise treated in ultra-classical spirit and ended with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in Maurice Ravel's apt orchestration. Jesus Maria Sanroma played the piano part in the Stravinsky piece with great deftness.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

New Stravinsky Piece Presented By Koussevitsky

Boston Orchestra, Playing at Carnegie Hall, Introduces Capriccio, With Piano Solo

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met their Thursday evening Carnegie Hall subscribers, whose numbers are many, yesterday and gave them the first local opportunity to hear Igor Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo. The novelty was sandwiched between two familiar works, Mozart's G minor symphony and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," a version introduced to this country by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1924, early in his Bostonian career.

The Capriccio was first performed by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris on December 6, 1929, with the composer as the pianist and Ernest Ansermet conducting. The Boston Symphony gave it for the first time in this country in its home concert of December 19, with Jesus Maria Sanroma, last night's assisting artist, at the piano, on a program with a later Stravinsky work of a very different type, the Symphony of Psalms. It would have been interesting to hear this also in last night's concert, but that would have entailed the importation of a chorus.

In its first New York hearing the Capriccio seemed to please. It represents the versatile Igor in one of his lighter moods, in a somewhat sportive vein. The title is apt; it is a work with, rather than for, piano solo; the piano and orchestral roles are interwoven, rather than doing respective duty as featured soloist and accompanist, in this well-written score. It takes about twenty minutes to play, and has no formal division of movements, although there are changes of pace and dominant color marking it off, to a certain extent, into sections.

It is an engaging, mildly tantalizing work. The composer turns to tunes of a Russian type recalling those of "Petrushka," but keeps these in the background; his harmonies are subtly savorous, his scoring delicately and effectively shaded, and the work gives a general impression of amiability and conservatism, with an underlying hint, here and there, of subacidity. Darker hues occasionally vary the prevailing fast-moving chattiness. With its deftness and humor, however, the work has one or two drawbacks, such as a certain prolixity in the closing section, suggesting clever, but rather prolonged, musical gossip about nothing in particular.

Mr. Sanroma gave a fluent, polished, praiseworthy reading of the piano part, perfectly co-ordinated with the playing of his orchestral colleagues, and conductor, pianist and orchestra shared warm plaudits for a virtuoso performance.

String Quartet Heard With Grainger

In Town Hall the New York String Quartet and Percy Grainger also gave a first local hearing of a work by a contemporary composer, Cyril Scott's quintet for piano and strings. In this work the British composer does not eschew emotion and writes in the neo-romantic vein which has become naturalized in Great Britain via France. Much of the work is effective, much of it is convincingly expressive; despite certain reminiscences, one or two harking back even to Tchaikovsky, it has a certain homogeneity and individuality of style. But it could have said its say better at less length; it sometimes gives an impression of repetitiousness, of undecided progress; there is not enough difference in mood and color among the various movements to afford sufficient variety.

The quartet and Mr. Grainger gave a well balanced and eloquent performance. Messrs. Cadek, Siskovsky, Schwab and Prinz began the evening with Beethoven's C minor quartet, Op. 18, No. 4, and a contemporary Spanish work, Joaquin Turina's "La Oracion del Torero." A good sized audience was enthusiastic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

Bost[illegible]ncert

Koussevits[illegible]omposition in [illegible]all.

Serge Kouss[illegible]ony Orchestra have come back[illegible]sky's latest invention for the[illegible]. This masterpiece of futility program of the orchestra's seco[illegible] season in New York, given la[illegible] before a most considerate asse[illegible]

The work is calle[illegible] orchestra with piano solo and it was first performed in Paris on December 6, 1929. On that occasion Mr. Stravinsky was the pianist. Last evening Jesus Maria Sanroma was at the keyboard and we may dismiss him with the simple declaration that he did his best, which is very good.

Philip Hale, who makes inspired program notes for the Boston symphony concerts, quoted from French critics about Mr. Stravinsky's composition. They said charming things and like true Frenchmen said them with indescribable grace. But we confess with deep sorrow that we cannot echo their beautiful sentiments any more than we can imitate their exquisite style. Mr. Stravinsky's capriccio was for this music lover the wind blown ashes of a fire long dead.

The entire work is disjointed, spasmodic in utterance, without structural continuity and feeble in thematic subject matter and instrumental treatment. It is not especially objectionable on the ground of ugliness. Indeed, some of it is melodious in rather ancient manner and certain pages of the piano part, which is an obligato rather than a solo as generally understood, have a mild interest. Many others belong to the venerable class of tuner's runs. The harmonies are extreme in spots, but continent in most of the pages. There are almost no instrumental tutti; the orchestra speaks chiefly in small groups. There is even a kind of concertino group of strings, which seemed to have no special reason for existence.

The third movement, which is marked allegro capriccioso, is the best of the three. For this we have to thank no less a personage than Richard Strauss. We did not think to live to hear Stravinsky repeating a lesson learned from that old gentleman, but if there had been no "Rosenkavalier" there would certainly have been no such allegro capriccioso as we heard last night. But Strauss did it better.

When Strauss brought forward his "Symphonia Domestica," Ernest Newman said it was the work of a clever man who had once been a genius. Those who remembered their "Petruchka" and "Sacre du Printemps" must have thought something of the same sort when they listened to the strivings and pantings of the score made known to last evening's audience. All these advanced composers have periods which they point out themselves and discuss with delightful candor. We do not know in what period Mr. Stravinsky sees himself just now; but we are sure of one thing; namely, that he has traveled far out of his era of "back to Bach."

The first number on the program was Mozart's G Minor Symphony, which Mr. Koussvitzky performed with a reduced orchestra and with exceeding delicacy. In fact, it is possible that Mozart himself would politely have requested the eminent conductor to put a little more pepper in the sauce. The concert was completed with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" orchestrated by Ravel. Mr. Koussevitzky has an enduring affection for this work. We trust his love for Mr. Stravinsky's capriccio will not withstand the winds of as many winters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Eve. World

[illegible] 'Naughty' Boo[illegible]

[illegible] risque literature into the U[illegible] States.

The "obscene literature" squa[illegible] the Judicial Police started the [illegible] rolling by arresting Francois Alb[illegible] Gauffeur, seventy-two-year-[illegible] French agent of an American libra[illegible] and publishing house. Gauffeur w[illegible] charged with sending tons [illegible] "naughty" English books to t[illegible] United States.

More arrests are said to be in th[illegible] place of [illegible] season presented in [illegible]

When the "Capriccio," which is [illegible] the nature of a concerto for piano and orchestra, was given its world premiere at a concert of the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris on Dec. 6, 1929, under the direction of Ernest Ansermet, with Stravinsky as soloist, Mossourgsky's "Pictures of an Exhibition" figured on the list. This same set of pieces, in the orchestral garb provided for them by Ravel, found a place on yesterday's bill, which was rounded out by the Mozart Symphony in G Minor.

The "Capriccio" made its local entry under the most auspicious circumstances. With Jesus Maria Sanroma officiating at the piano, it reveled in a dazzlingly brilliant performance in which the virtuosity of the assisting artist and that of the orchestra were alike breathtaking. Mr. Sanroma, who had scored heavily when he first appeared in this city under the same baton in the Toch concerto, again proved an incomparable interpreter of modernistic music for his instrument at this reappearance. Conquering the extreme difficulties of the keyboard score with amazing ease, he made his share in the reading noteworthy for clarity crispness and tonal glamour.

Those who expected that the "Capriccio" would bear any resemblance in style to the "Sacre" or the earlier methods of the composer in the "Firebird" and "Petruchka," were destined to be surprised, as well as any in the audience prepared to hear another effort in the mock-classical vein of "Musagetes." Like the latter, it exemplified Stravinsky's recent preoccupation with neo-classicism. But as might have been anticipated from Stravinsky's constant change of manner from one work to another, the "Capriccio" again showed its author in an entirely new light. In the almost forgotten Piano Concerto, he had adhered closely to Bach and Handel in his choice of thematic material and coupled the solo part to a jazz accompaniment. Reverting to a remoter past in "Musagetes," he had given that composition, founded on seventeenth century models, much the character of an ancient concerto grosso.

But the "Capriccio," which once more turns backward for its subject matter, pilfers from innumerable sources, while in its coloring it achieves a quality absolutely different from that of any of its predecessors in Stravinsky's output. Likewise it stands on a changed rhythmic basis, and its harmonic and melodic treatment is also dissimilar. Nineteenth century romantic influences show their effect not only on the themes of the first of the three movements, but in practically all of the elaborate filigree of the highly ornamental passage-work that forms one of the chief characteristics of the opus. Bach plays his role in the second division, entitled "Andante rapsodico," while the final "Allegro capriccioso" goes to Vienna and the cabarets, as melodic sources. And yet because of its individual treatment, the work successfully manages to achieve a satisfactory sense of unity, despite this hodgepodge of ingredients.

One factor that helps toward this end is the texture of the score, in which a soft blending of piano and flute tone predominates. Polytonality is sparingly used and the dissonances are very mild throughout. Most of them are the result of passing clashes in the counterpoint. And in the handling of counterpoint—a fundamental device of every page of this music—Stravinsky reveals a master hand. A most astonishing aspect of the music is its reversion to a strong tonic-dominant feeling in the harmonic structure. Moreover each movement is in one definite key and adheres tenaciously to it with few indulgences in remote modulations. Another peculiarity of each of the three sections is the almost undeviating employment of a strong undercurrent of duple rhythm, which keeps the ornate melodic configurations from becoming diffuse, or vague in meaning. Furthermore, Stravinsky gives the work an unaccustomed quality by abandoning his usual short fragments of tune for melodies of a pronouncedly more extensive type. Most of these are cheap in themselves, but lose their commonplace nature through the uncanny skill with which they are manipulated. The first movement was found to be especially attractive at a first hearing on account of the clarity of its tripartite design and the strikingly original effect of the introduction, with its bold chords and glissandi interrupted by quiet passages for the strings. This introductory matter appeared again at the close of the movement, and resolved itself into concluding measures that formed the most telling portion of the novelty, by means of chromatic harmonies moving above a double pedal voiced alternately by piano and cello. In comparison to the magnificence of the interpretation given this capriccio, the Mozart symphony was rather a dull and profitless affair as Mr. Koussevitsky conceived its exquisite content.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

73

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Strawinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra Is Played by Mr. Koussewitsky and the Bostonians

A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, assisting artist. At Carnegie Hall last evening.

THE PROGRAM

Mozart .....Symphony in G minor
Strawinsky..Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra
(First time in New York.)
Moussorgsky-Ravel..Pictures at an Exposition

STRAWINSKY'S Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra was heard last night for the first time in New York. Appropriately enough, the performance took place at a concert given in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussewitsky, who have been responsible for our introduction to a number of Strawinsky's latter-day productions. The Capriccio followed Mozart's G-minor Symphony (of which Mr. Koussewitsky delivered a mannered and on the whole disaffecting reading) and was received by the audience with polite applause.

* * *

The Capriccio is music for a society that can be flattered by a reflection of its own fatuity. Art, mirroring the prevailing temper and tendencies of a time, here mirrors ours. It may very well be that we have not yet reached the point of willingly admitting the verisimilitude of the reflection, but there are plenty of signs to tell us, if we stop to read them, that the lease of our illusions upon our sense of reality is near the end of its duration. Let us acknowledge at least that the Capriccio is very typical of the music of composers whom history, a hundred years hence, will recollect as products of the culture of the post-war world.

* * *

There is, of course, other music among that of our contemporaries to which we prefer to pin our faith and hope—but it is, we know, a hollow faith and a foredoomed hope. For the Capriccio, with its emptiness of emotion or experience, is truly and deplorably the music of today—and, what is far worse, the music of tomorrow as well—and this other music, in which we profess a specious faith and hope, is only the music of those who remember and regret and will not willingly relinquish a time that is past and a world that is tragically dead.

The Capriccio is an appalling work. We say this knowing it well, for it has been recorded for the gramophone, and thus we have familiarized ourselves with it. The arrogant triviality of this music, its sterile cleverness and utter spiritual poverty strike terror in the listener. Do we take it too seriously? Then it is because it should be taken seriously. Too few things are taken seriously today—levity is both a symptom of and an anesthetic against our ills. But levity is scarcely fitting to a bedside manner when the patient is a dying art and—all too possibly—a dying civilization.

* * *

As a matter of record it must, we suppose, be noted that the Capriccio is in the form of a suite. There are three movements intended to be played without pause, and scored for piano, a group of solo string and wind instruments, and a tutti comprising the balance of the orchestra. The various movements have no easily discernible forms; of thematic material there is quantity if not quality, and this is treated, as is the instrumentation, in a manner suggested by the title of the piece. Amusement was reflected upon the faces of many who listened last evening to the performance given by Mr. Koussewitsky, Mr. Sanroma (the assisting pianist) and the orchestra; but the Capriccio, it seemed to us, was very solemn diversion indeed.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

Koussevitzky Leads Brilliantly.

A concert of exceptional brilliancy was given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall before a packed house which rejoiced in the achievement of orchestra and conductor. Mr. Koussevitzky was by turns the classic, the romanticist and the masterly and intuitive interpreter of contemporaneous music.

"Contemporaneous music" refers to the first performance in New York of Stravinsky's "Capriccio for piano and orchestra," the pianist of the occasion being Jesus Sanroma. The classic period was represented by Mozart's G minor symphony and the epoch of Russian romanticism by the extraordinary orchestral arrangement, by Ravel, of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Koussevitzky played Mozart's symphony with the most careful regard for its proportions, its style and the deep feeling which is contained within the measures of one of the perfect symphonic compositions in existence. He could not have accomplished what he did with an orchestra of grosser or less finely adjusted capacities. The announcement of the opening theme by the strings, which are at once so warm, flexible, and transparent in quality, set the scene for what followed, and throughout the symphony there was a blend of classicism and of sensuous beauty of tone which were a constant enrichment to the ear. Possibly the performance was a trifle overscrupulous in its care for the smallest detail and its concern for precisely the just pace, accent, manner of Mozart's time. But it was perfectly within the frame, and a sheer triumph of style. A small orchestra was used for this performance, and the proportions of the orchestra served to reveal more clearly the qualities of the players.

The Stravinsky "Capriccio" is in three movements, which are played without a pause. Mr. Sanroma, undertaking the piano part, modestly remained seated at his instrument in the orchestra and not in front of it, a position which, as the most important individual player, he might easily have claimed. But the position he took was essentially correct, since the piano is an integral part of the orchestral scheme rather than a solo instrument.

It goes without saying that this "Capriccio" is well made, that Stravinsky's past mastery of musical technic is obvious on every page. When that is said every claim of the composition to serious consideration is exhausted. If the piece bore an unknown name instead of the name of Stravinsky, it might have been published, but it certainly would have been dismissed as entirely negligible. The thematic material is not only vulgar, but—what a virile vulgarity does not always imply—it is unbelievably banal; unbelievably because it is impossible to explain how the composer of the early works of Stravinsky could have produced such poor stuff and how he was able, without blushing, to put his name to it. This music is incredibly trivial and labored, without a real idea, and in places imitative of the music of other composers. It is tired, disgusted music, music without hope or self-respect, which seeks with equal vainness and frivolity to avail itself of popular rhythms and topical musical phrases to conceal its own boredom and fatigue. It goes on and on, tediously, inconsequentially. A passage at the beginning of the third movement—a new rhythmical combination—raises hope, a passage which is a feeble attempt at a joke. Soon even this hope has gone. At the end some motion has been generated—enough momentum to furnish a few measures which sound as if the composer had cheered up with the thought that he would soon be through. But he was through earlier than that. He was through before he began to write this balderdash.

The performance was another matter. On the part of Mr. Sanroma, who played with a flawless virtuosity and musicianship, of the orchestra, of Mr. Koussevitzky, every possible thing was done for the composer. Pax vobiscum!

The immediate and reviving antithesis of this post-Stravinsky, fallen on such evil days, was the wondrous richness of Moussorgsky invention and imagination of which we were reminded by his "Pictures at an Exposition," and Moussorgsky revealed in all his essential variety of color and fancy by the Ravel instrumentation of his piano pieces.

That very little man, who knows perhaps more about the orchestra than any other composer living, that shrewd Gallic stylist and Parisian sophisticate, in some mysterious way meets the barbarian Moussorgsky on his own ground, and does for Moussorgsky what Moussorgsky could never do for himself when he used the orchestral instruments. The "Pictures at an Exposition," played on the piano, triumph in spite of the limited range of color and sonority possessed by that instrument. But these pieces were predestined for the orchestra, and if Mr. Koussevitzky, who commissioned Ravel to orchestrate them, had waited a lifetime and searched the world for the man to do the business, he would have found nowhere a wizard with more cunning, more necromacy, to clothe the fantasies of Moussorgsky with an orchestral garb of more bewildering splendor and instrumental imagery that that shrewd little Frenchman.

The music itself is the extreme limit of realism in tones. Moussorgsky tried to express in tones Hartmann's paintings. But he does not pass the boundaries of music and his is the most plenteous inspiration. We need not concern ourselves whether music appears as a result of the classicism of Mozart or the dramatic and realistic conceptions of a Moussorgsky, provided only that it is music. The "Pictures at an Exposition" are very striking and Russian music.

They are apotheosized by Ravel's miraculous instrumentation. Last night they were given a performance which it is difficult to imagine surpassed. With his virtuoso technic and the authority which comes from complete and unconditional understanding, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to improvise each piece from his own imagination, and to print his visions indelibly upon the ears and minds of his listeners. By this performance alone the present season of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be memorable. It was a revelation of the art of the composer, the orchestrator, the orchestra itself and the master who led it.

The applause was loud and long. New York knows what great orchestral performances are. It knows this not only from Mr. Koussevitzky, but also from other superb orchestras and surpassingly gifted conductors. For all that the Boston Symphony concert of last night will remain as one of the peaks of the present musical season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Myra Hess Interprets Beethoven.

The program of Beethoven given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Myra Hess as soloist, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, would have been memorable if only for the spell of Miss Hess's performance of the G major piano concerto. Beethoven wrote no other concerto like this one, which stands entirely alone among his compositions in this form. It is the concerto which does not make the listener think of the word "hammerklavier," at least when it is played with the sensibility, poise and poetic feeling which Miss Hess gave the music. The prophet and seer of the modern symphony enters here a land of dream in which he seldom rested. The dialogue between the piano in the strings in the slow movement is one of those miracles miracles of art which seem to occur just once, and are never repeated.

One would say that Miss Hess was destined by nature for the interpretation of this work. Her qualities as pianist give her the beauty of tone and the delicateness of nuance which the slow movement must have, and in the other movements the crystalline clarity and polish of her performance were equally appropriate to her subject. In these movements, fortunately, she did not overinterpret. Her style had a delicious sparkle. The audience recognized the significance of Miss Hess's performance, and she should have been gratified by its response.

The orchestral compositions were the overture to "Egmont" and the Seventh Symphony. The performance of the symphony was indicative of the virtues of the orchestra, of Mr. Koussevitsky's virtuoso command of the players and his close study of the score. Nevertheless, it has not the illuminating and creative inspiration of other performances he has given here, and there were places where the reading appeared a little self-conscious. By and large, however, the concert was one that impressed anew on the audience the power and glory of Beethoven, and its climax was the concerto, so beautifully and nobly conveyed by Miss Hess.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Myra Hess Interprets Beethoven.

The program of Beethoven given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Myra Hess as soloist, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, would have been memorable if only for the spell of Miss Hess's performance of the G major piano concerto. Beethoven wrote no other concerto like this one, which stands entirely alone among his compositions in this form. It is the concerto which does not make the listener think of the word "hammerklavier," at least when it is played with the sensibility, poise and poetic feeling which Miss Hess gave the music. The prophet and seer of the modern symphony enters here a land of dream in which he seldom rested. The dialogue between the piano in the strings in the slow movement is one of those miracles miracles of art which seem to occur just once, and are never repeated.

One would say that Miss Hess was destined by nature for the interpretation of this work. Her qualities as pianist give her the beauty of tone and the delicateness of nuance which the slow movement must have, and in the other movements the crystalline clarity and polish of her performance were equally appropriate to her subject. In these movements, fortunately, she did not overinterpret. Her style had a delicious sparkle. The audience recognized the significance of Miss Hess's performance, and she should have been gratified by its response.

The orchestral compositions were the overture to "Egmont" and the Seventh Symphony. The performance of the symphony was indicative of the virtues of the orchestra, of Mr. Koussevitsky's virtuoso command of the players and his close study of the score. Nevertheless, it has not the illuminating and creative inspiration of other performances he has given here, and there were places where the reading appeared a little self-conscious. By and large, however, the concert was one that impressed anew on the audience the power and glory of Beethoven, and its climax was the concerto, so beautifully and nobly conveyed by Miss Hess.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

THOSE folks who like nothing better than melody with their music, who are old-fashioned enough to care for the surge and sweep and beauty of the old masters who wrote music to appeal to the emotions, that carries them away on the wings of song, had a feast last night at the Academy of Music, where Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Brooklyn concert of the current season.

The Maestro left the moderns behind him and showed that Haendel and Mozart and even Tchaikovsky have an appeal to a generation that has been brought up largely on the atonality of those who uphold the newer idiom.

Dr. Koussevitsky's programme consisted of three numbers, the Haendel "Concerto Grosso" for strings, the Mozart Symphony in G minor and the mighty and turbulent Tchaikovsky Fourth.

The first two numbers were played with an abbreviated orchestra, the first only with the strings and the Mozart Symphony with two bassoons and two horns added. The "Concerto Grosso" is a sweet and moving delight. It is one of the most charming of pieces, and it is a marvel to hear the variety of melody that the director can coax out of the violins, violas, 'cellos and double basses.

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

When the Mozart Symphony was played, four of the ten musicians who perform upon the bull fiddles left the stage, and half the second violins followed them. The two wood-winds and the two horns added to the purity of the strings, and the effect was ineffable beauty.

In the great Tchaikovsky Symphony, however, the whole ensemble was present, and in the first and fourth movements, playing for all they were worth.. The second movement is the lovely Andantino, played "in modo di canzona," and the third is played pizzicato, giving a beautiful effect.

The Fourth is the symphony in which the composer takes an old Russian folk-melody—the same that is the basis of his Marche Slave—and uses it as the basis for his thundering Allegro con fuoco. It is a glorious number, and it was fittingly played.

Whether or not the Koussevitsky reading compares with that given earlier in the season by Mr. Erich Kleiber when he was conducting the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is a matter that will be debated by many people. But not by us. Both were

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

Mr. [illegible] Hall in the afternoon the Boston orchestra played a Beethoven program with Miss Myra Hess as soloist. Miss Hess won a distinct success with a beautiful interpretation of the G major piano concerto, and Mr. Koussevitzky offered the Boston [illegible] major symphony and the "Egmont" overture.

Music of the Day

The second of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra annually gives in Brooklyn, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, took place last evening at the Academy of Music. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted, and the program conservatively included a Handel concerto grosso, Mozart's G minor Symphony and the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

Revelatory though the performance was of the excellence of this orchestra and of the many admirable qualities possessed by Mr. Koussewitsky both as an executive and an interpretative musician, it was not one to inspire more comment than this sentence contains. Mr. Koussewitsky and his Bostonians have often entertained us with Handel concerti grossi, Mozart and Tschaikowsky symphonies—we know their ways with this music, and though it is pleasant enough to hear them play it, we are inclined to accent this pleasure without feeling obliged to return for it more than the briefest—though most sincere—expression of our gratitude.

M. C.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

JAN 11 1931

Two Orchestras Divide the Day At Carnegie Hall

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony; Philharmonic Completes Children's Series

Myra Hess With Visitors

British Pianist Plays Beethoven's G Major Concerto

By Francis D. Perkins

Carnegie Hall housed two orchestral concerts yesterday, when Ernest Schelling conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony in the season's last concert of the morning series for young people, and Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second New York Saturday afternoon concert of the musical year. Mr. Schelling gave a program of English and American works; Dr. Koussevitzky devoted his list to Beethoven, including the G major piano concerto with Myra Hess as the soloist.

The young people who, with others not so young, attend this Philharmonic-Symphony series, heard Sir Henry Wood's arrangement of a Trumpet Voluntary by Purcell, Frederick Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," a movement from Vaughan Williams's "London" Symphony, Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march, two Chinese sketches by Abram Chasins, and Griffes's "To a White Peacock." Mr. Schelling then turned the baton over to his assistant, Howard Barlow, and played the piano solo in the intermezzo and finale from his pleasing "Suite Fantastique." The audience bade its farewell with warm applause.

The feature of the Boston Symphony program, which might be considered an excerpt from the Beethoven Festival given by Dr. Koussevitzky and this orchestra last month in Washington, was the memorable performance of the G major concerto. Miss Hess, who had been one of the soloists in the Washington series, was at her best as an interpreter of this perennial music, with a complete mastery of its technical requirements in the brilliance, polish and clarity of her playing, its revelation of detail and nicety and variety of color. But it was the combination of these merits with the understanding of the work as a whole shown by the admirable British pianist, the sympathetic expressiveness and the realization of its poetic resources which made yesterday's interpretation one of the best given here in recent years.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra also deserved high praise for their share in the concerto, the just proportion and balance between the solo instrument and the ensemble. For the first movement, Miss Hess used Clara Schumann's cadenza, with its touches of mid-nineteenth century Germanic flavor, and employed Beethoven's own cadenza for the finale.

The symphony was well interpreted on the whole, but there were moments when less weight and more momentum would not have been amiss. There was notable eloquence, however, in the performance of the second movement. A capacity audience warmly applauded the soloist, conductor and orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

Koussevitzky Leads Beethoven Program

By GRENA BENNETT.

Beethoven and the Boston Orchestra were well patronized at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. A capacity audience greeted Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his New England band, not forgetting Myra Hess, English pianist, who was assisting artist of the day.

Only Beethoven's name occupied the composer's column. The numbers given were the "Egmont" Overture, G. major Concerto for piano and orchestra and the Seventh Symphony.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Overture was finely molded, carefully phrased, beautifully shaded; and, as to the climaxes, approached cautiously and expressed with power and vigor. It would be no easy matter to find a better body of strings which, though large in number and diversified in character, played with unanimity of attack so faultless as to sound like a great single instrument.

Miss Hess' performance in the Concerto was notable for its brilliancy, luscious tone and amazing clarity and precision in difficult and fleet chromatics.

* * *

Newfound Sport: Stravinsky Baited

Happy Day in New York as the Reviewers Tackle His Piano-Caprice

Transcript Jan 13

WHEN the Symphony Orchestra revisited New York last week, Dr. Koussevitzky included in the concert of Thursday Stravinsky's "Caprice for Orchestra with Piano-Solo," heard three times at Symphony Hall last month. It was new to Manhattan and the reviewers made speed to set their teeth in it. With most, the hapless Igor has gone completely out of fashion. From Pitts to these latter days they expect nothing worse than nothing. "We are all Socialists now," said Sir William Harcourt years ago in Parliament. The judgment seats of music in Manhattan might echo back: "We are all Reactionaries now." Consequently in the newspapers, though not, apparently, in the concert-hall, Stravinsky's friends were few and far between. Such as they were, they shall be read first. Said Mr. Perkins in the Herald Tribune:

"In first New York hearing the Caprice did to seem to please. It represents the versatile Igor in one of his lighter moods, in a somewhat sportive vein. . . . It is an engaging, mildly tantalizing work. As a composer turns to tunes of a Russian type recalling those of 'Petrushka' but keeps these in the background, his harmonies are subtly savorous, his scoring delicately and effectively shaded. The work gives a general impression of amiability and conservatism, with an underlying hint, here and there, of subacidity. Darker hues occasionally vary the fast-moving chattiness. With its deftness and humor, however, the work has one or two drawbacks, such as a certain prolixity in the closing section, suggesting clever, but rather prolonged, musical gossip about nothing in particular."

And Mr. Thompson in the Evening Post: "The Capriccio will hardly take rank as one of Stravinsky's most important works; but it possesses more to make it acceptable to audiences grown weary of experiment for experiment's sake than most of the products of his post-'Sacre' veerings. Technique it has always, even when he pursues dubious ends. The Capriccio goes beyond technique in asserting the Stravinsky personality and does so largely by virtue of its fantasy. Technique and fantasy together redeem material that in other hands might have remained essentially commonplace, if not trivial and banal. As in 'Apollo Musagetes,' this is a tamed Stravinsky, but one who remains an individual where individuals are few.

"Toward the close something of the Viennese spirit pervades the music, only to give way to what suggests ragtime, if not jazz. Here Stravinsky's technique serves him well. He extricates himself from the cheap by his neatness and ingenuity of his writing. Above all, why are some curiously hollow spaces. The whole suggests a stage pantomime. Certainly a visual program would not be difficult to supply; indeed, one of Stravinsky's French commentators seems already to have put Harlequin, Columbine and their cohorts into this music. From the first, the ballet has been Stravinsky's métier."

Poor Old Igor!

The detractors laid on and spared not. Incidental discoveries of Bach in the middle measures and Strauss in the finale did not long detain them. Wrote Mr. Henderson in The Sun: "The entire work is disjointed, spasmodic in utterance, without structural continuity and lacks a plan for subject matter and instrumental treatment. It is not especially objectionable on the ground of ugliness. Indeed some of it is melodious in rather ancient manner and certain pages of the piano part, have a mild interest. Many others belong to the venerable class of tuner's runs. The harmonies are extreme in spots, but continent in most of the pages. . . . The third movement, which is marked allegro capriccioso, is the best of the three. For this we have to thank no less a personage than Richard Strauss. We did not think to live to hear [illegible] lesson learned there would ro ca- But comic, "This bored, imita- tive of the music of other composers. It is tired, disgusted music, music without hope or self-respect, which seeks with equal vainness and frivolity to avail itself of popular rhythms and topical musical phrases to conceal its own boredom and fatigue. It goes on and on, tediously, inconsequentially. A passage at the beginning of the third movement—a new rhythmical combination—raises hope, a passage, which is a feeble attempt at a joke. Soon even this hope has gone. At the end some motion has been generated—enough momentum to furnish a few measures which sound as if the composer had cheered up with the thought that he would soon be through. But he was through earlier than that. He was through before he began to write this balderdash." All of which suggests that "balderdash" is sometimes written elsewhere—and unconsciously—than on the pages of the berated Igor.

Spared Sanroma

The performance was another story. In the ears of the Herald Tribune, Mr. Sanroma "gave a fluent, polished, praiseworthy reading of the piano-part." To the Evening Post, he was "refreshing"; while Dr. Koussevitzky gave a "delightfully crisp and pointed performance." To the Sun, "Mr. Sanroma did his best, which was very good"; while even the Times so far relented as to grant him "a flawless virtuosity and musicianship." Mr. Koussevitzky in turn—good, faithful man!—"did everything possible for the composer."

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

Koussevitzky Leads Brilliantly.

A concert of exceptional brilliancy was given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall before a packed house which rejoiced in the achievement of orchestra and conductor. Mr. Koussevitzky was by turns the classic, the romanticist and the masterly and intuitive interpreter of contemporaneous music.

"Contemporaneous music" refers to the first performance in New York of Stravinsky's "Capriccio for piano and orchestra," the pianist of the occasion being Jesus Sanroma. The classic period was represented by Mozart's G minor symphony and the epoch of Russian romanticism by the extraordinary orchestral arrangement, by Ravel, of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Koussevitzky played Mozart's symphony with the most careful regard for its proportions, its style and the deep feeling which is contained within the measures of one of the perfect symphonic compositions in existence. He could not have accomplished what he did with an orchestra of grosser or less finely adjusted capacities. The announcement of the opening theme by the strings, which are at once so warm, flexible, and transparent in quality, set the scene for what followed, and throughout the symphony there was a blend of classicism and of sensuous beauty of tone which were a constant enrichment to the ear. Possibly the performance was a trifle overscrupulous in its care for the smallest detail and its concern for precisely the just pace, accent, manner of Mozart's time. But it was perfectly within the frame, and a sheer triumph of style. A small orchestra was used for this performance, and the proportions of the orchestra served to reveal more clearly the qualities of the players.

The Stravinsky "Capriccio" is in three movements, which are played without a pause. Mr. Sanroma, undertaking the piano part, modestly remained seated at his instrument in the orchestra and not in front of it, a position which, as the most important individual player, he might easily have claimed. But the position he took was essentially correct, since the piano is an integral part of the orchestral scheme rather than a solo instrument.

It goes without saying that this "Capriccio" is well made, that Stravinsky's past mastery of musical technic is obvious on every page. When that is said every claim of the composition to serious consideration is exhausted. If the piece bore an unknown name instead of the name of Stravinsky, it might have been published, but it certainly would have been dismissed as entirely negligible. The thematic material is not only vulgar, but—what a virile vulgarity does not always imply—it is unbelievably banal; unbelievably because it is impossible to explain how the composer of the early works of Stravinsky could have produced such poor stuff and how he was able, without blushing, to put his name to it. This music is incredibly trivial and labored, without a real idea, and in places imitative of the music of other composers. It is tired, disgusted music, music without hope or self-respect, which seeks with equal vainness and frivolity to avail itself of popular rhythms and topical musical phrases to conceal its own boredom and fatigue. It goes on and on, tediously, inconsequentially. A passage at the beginning of the third movement—a new rhythmical combination—raises hope, a passage which is a feeble attempt at a joke. Soon even this hope has gone. At the end some motion has been generated—enough momentum to furnish a few measures which sound as if the composer had cheered up with the thought that he would soon be through. But he was through earlier than that. He was through before he began to write this balderdash.

The performance was another matter. On the part of Mr. Sanroma, who played with a flawless virtuosity and musicianship, of the orchestra, of Mr. Koussevitzky, every possible thing was done for the composer. Pax vobiscum!

The immediate and reviving antithesis of this post-Stravinsky, fallen on such evil days, was the wondrous richness of Moussorgsky invention and imagination of which we were reminded by his "Pictures at an Exposition," and Moussorgsky revealed in all his essential variety of color and fancy by the Ravel instrumentation of his piano pieces.

That very little man, who knows perhaps more about the orchestra than any other composer living, that shrewd Gallic stylist and Parisian sophisticate, in some mysterious way meets the barbarian Moussorgsky on his own ground, and does for Moussorgsky what Moussorgsky could never do for himself when he used the orchestral instruments. The "Pictures at an Exposition," played on the piano, triumph in spite of the limited range of color and sonority possessed by that instrument. But these pieces were predestined for the orchestra, and if Mr. Koussevitzky, who commissioned Ravel to orchestrate them, had waited a lifetime and searched the world for the man to do the business, he would have found nowhere a wizard with more cunning, more necromacy, to clothe the fantasies of Moussorgsky with an orchestral garb of more bewildering splendor and instrumental imagery that that shrewd little Frenchman.

The music itself is the extreme limit of realism in tones. Moussorgsky tried to express in tones Hartmann's paintings. But he does not pass the boundaries of music and his is the most plenteous inspiration. We need not concern ourselves whether music appears as a result of the classicism of Mozart or the dramatic and realistic conceptions of a Moussorgsky, provided only that it is music. The "Pictures at an Exposition" are very striking and Russian music.

They are apotheosized by Ravel's miraculous instrumentation. Last night they were given a performance which it is difficult to imagine surpassed. With his virtuoso technic and the authority which comes from complete and unconditional understanding, Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to improvise each piece from his own imagination, and to print his visions indelibly upon the ears and minds of his listeners. By this performance alone the present season of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be memorable. It was a revelation of the art of the composer, the orchestrator, the orchestra itself and the master who led it.

The applause was loud and long. New York knows what great orchestral performances are. It knows this not only from Mr. Koussevitzky, but also from other superb orchestras and surpassingly gifted conductors. For all that the Boston Symphony concert of last night will remain as one of the peaks of the present musical season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Music of the Day

The second of the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra annually gives in Brooklyn, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, took place last evening at the Academy of Music. Mr. Koussewitsky conducted, and the program conservatively included a Handel concerto grosso, Mozart's G minor Symphony and the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

Revelatory though the performance was of the excellence of this orchestra and of the many admirable qualities possessed by Mr. Koussewitsky both as an executive and an interpretative musician, it was not one to inspire more comment than this sentence contains. Mr. Koussewitsky and his Bostonians have often entertained us with Handel concerti grossi, Mozart and Tschaikowsky symphonies—we know their ways with this music, and though it is pleasant enough to hear them play it, we are inclined to accent this pleasure without feeling obliged to return for it more than the briefest—though most sincere—expression of our gratitude.

M. C.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Myra Hess Interprets Beethoven.

The program of Beethoven given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Myra Hess as soloist, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, would have been memorable if only for the spell of Miss Hess's performance of the G major piano concerto. Beethoven wrote no other concerto like this one, which stands entirely alone among his compositions in this form. It is the concerto which does not make the listener think of the word "hammerklavier," at least when it is played with the sensibility, poise and poetic feeling which Miss Hess gave the music. The prophet and seer of the modern symphony enters here a land of dream in which he seldom rested. The dialogue between the piano in the strings in the slow movement is one of those miracles miracles of art which seem to occur just once, and are never repeated.

One would say that Miss Hess was destined by nature for the interpretation of this work. Her qualities as pianist give her the beauty of tone and the delicateness of nuance which the slow movement must have, and in the other movements the crystalline clarity and polish of her performance were equally appropriate to her subject. In these movements, fortunately, she did not overinterpret. Her style had a delicious sparkle. The audience recognized the significance of Miss Hess's performance, and she should have been gratified by its response.

The orchestral compositions were the overture to "Egmont" and the Seventh Symphony. The performance of the symphony was indicative of the virtues of the orchestra, of Mr Koussevitsky's virtuoso command of the players and his close study of the score. Nevertheless, it has not the illuminating and creative inspiration of other performances he has given here, and there were places where the reading appeared a little self-conscious. By and large, however, the concert was one that impressed anew on the audience the power and glory of Beethoven, and its climax was the concerto, so beautifully and nobly conveyed by Miss Hess.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

THOSE folks who like nothing better than melody with their music, who are old-fashioned enough to care for the surge and sweep and beauty of the old masters who wrote music to appeal to the emotions, that carries them away on the wings of song, had a feast last night at the Academy of Music, where Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second Brooklyn concert of the current season.

The Maestro left the moderns behind him and showed that Haendel and Mozart and even Tchaikovsky have an appeal to a generation that has been brought up largely on the atonality of those who uphold the newer idiom.

Dr. Koussevitsky's programme consisted of three numbers, the Haendel "Concerto Grosso" for strings, the Mozart Symphony in G minor and the mighty and turbulent Tchaikovsky Fourth.

The first two numbers were played with an abbreviated orchestra, the first only with the strings and the Mozart Symphony with two bassoons and two horns added. The "Concerto Grosso" is a sweet and moving delight. It is one of the most charming of pieces, and it is a marvel to hear the variety of melody that the director can coax out of the violins, violas, 'cellos and double basses.

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

When the Mozart Symphony was played, four of the ten musicians who perform upon the bull fiddles left the stage, and half the second violins followed them. The two wood-winds and the two horns added to the purity of the strings, and the effect was ineffable beauty.

In the great Tchaikovsky Symphony, however, the whole ensemble was present, and in the first and fourth movements, playing for all they were worth.. The second movement is the lovely Andantino, played "in modo di canzona," and the third is played pizzicato, giving a beautiful effect.

The Fourth is the symphony in which the composer takes an old Russian folk-melody—the same that is the basis of his Marche Slave—and uses it as the basis for his thundering Allegro con fuoco. It is a glorious number, and it was fittingly played.

Whether or not the Koussevitsky reading compares with that given earlier in the season by Mr. Erich Kleiber when he was conducting the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is a matter that will be debated by many people. But not by us. Both were masterful. Both were wholly satisfying.

A large and enthusiastic audience greeted the great organization and its gifted conductor.

oven play[illegible] as soloist. Miss Hess [illegible] success with a beautiful interpretation of the G major piano concerto, and Mr. Koussevitzky offered the Boston [illegible] major symphony and the "Egmont" overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

JAN 11 1931

Two Orchestras Divide the Day At Carnegie Hall

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony; Philharmonic Completes Children's Series

Myra Hess With Visitors

British Pianist Plays Beethoven's G Major Concerto

By Francis D. Perkins

Carnegie Hall housed two orchestral concerts yesterday, when Ernest Schelling conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony in the season's last concert of the morning series for young people, and Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second New York Saturday afternoon concert of the musical year. Mr. Schelling gave a program of English and American works; Dr. Koussevitzky devoted his list to Beethoven, including the G major piano concerto with Myra Hess as the soloist.

The young people who, with others not so young, attend this Philharmonic-Symphony series, heard Sir Henry Wood's arrangement of a Trumpet Voluntary by Purcell, Frederick Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," a movement from Vaughan Williams's "London" Symphony, Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march, two Chinese sketches by Abram Chasins, and Griffes's "To a White Peacock." Mr. Schelling then turned the baton over to his assistant, Howard Barlow, and played the piano solo in the intermezzo and finale from his pleasing "Suite Fantastique." The audience bade its farewell with warm applause.

The feature of the Boston Symphony program, which might be considered an excerpt from the Beethoven Festival given by Dr. Koussevitzky and this orchestra last month in Washington, was the memorable performance of the G major concerto. Miss Hess, who had been one of the soloists in the Washington series, was at her best as an interpreter of this perennial music, with a complete mastery of its technical requirements in the brilliance, polish and clarity of her playing, its revelation of detail and nicety and variety of color. But it was the combination of these merits with the understanding of the work as a whole shown by the admirable British pianist, the sympathetic expressiveness and the realization of its poetic resources which made yesterday's interpretation one of the best given here in recent years.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra also deserved high praise for their share in the concerto, the just proportion and balance between the solo instrument and the ensemble. For the first movement, Miss Hess used Clara Schumann's cadenza, with its touches of mid-nineteenth century Germanic flavor, and employed Beethoven's own cadenza for the finale.

The symphony was well interpreted on the whole, but there were moments when less weight and more momentum would not have been amiss. There was notable eloquence, however, in the performance of the second movement. A capacity audience warmly applauded the soloist, conductor and orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

IMBEL
& BROADWAY PE-6-

By GRENA BENNETT.

Beethoven and the Boston Orchestra were well patronized at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. A capacity audience greeted Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his New England band, not forgetting Myra Hess, English pianist, who was assisting artist of the day.

Only Beethoven's name occupied the composer's column. The numbers given were the "Egmont" Overture, G. major Concerto for piano and orchestra and the Seventh Symphony.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Overture was finely molded, carefully phrased, beautifully shaded; and, as to the climaxes, approached cautiously and expressed with power and vigor. It would be no easy matter to find a better body of strings which, though large in number and diversified in character, played with unanimity of attack so faultless as to sound like a great single instrument.

Miss Hess' performance in the Concerto was notable for its brilliancy, luscious tone and amazing clarity and precision in difficult and fleet chromatics.

* * *

Newfound Sport: Stravinsky Baited

Happy Day in New York as the Reviewers Tackle His Piano-Caprice

Transcript Jan 13

WHEN the Symphony Orchestra revisited New York last week, Dr. Koussevitzky included in the concert of Thursday Stravinsky's "Caprice for Orchestra with Piano-Solo," heard three times at Symphony Hall last month. It was new to Manhattan and the reviewers made speed to set their teeth in it. With most, the hapless Igor has gone completely out of fashion. From him in these latter days they expect nothing or worse than nothing. "We are all Socialists now," said Sir William Harcourt years ago in Parliament. The judgment seats of music in Manhattan might echo back: "We are all Reactionaries now." Consequently in the newspapers, though not, apparently, in the concert-hall, Stravinsky's friends were few and far between. Such as they were, they shall be read first. Said Mr. Perkins in the Herald Tribune:

"In first New York hearing the Capriccio seemed to please. It represents the versatile Igor in one of his lighter moods, in a somewhat sportive vein. . . . It is an engaging, mildly tantalizing work. The composer turns to tunes of a Russian type recalling those of 'Petrushka' but keeps these in the background. The harmonies are subtly savorous, his scoring delicately and effectively shaded. The work gives a general impression of amiability and conservatism, with an underlying hint, here and there, of subacidity. Darker hues occasionally vary the fast-moving chattiness. With its deftness and humor, however, the work has one or two drawbacks, such as a certain prolixity in the closing section, suggesting clever, but rather prolonged, musical gossip about nothing in particular."

And Mr. Thompson in the Evening Post: "The Capriccio will hardly take rank as one of Stravinsky's most important works; but it possesses more to make it acceptable to audiences grown weary of experiment for experiment's sake than most of the products of his post-'Sacre' veerings. Technique counts always, even when he pursues dubious ends. The Capriccio goes beyond technique in asserting the Stravinsky personality and does so largely by virtue of its fantasy. Technique and fantasy together redeem material that in other hands might have remained essentially commonplace, if not trivial and banal. As in 'Apollo Musagetes,' this is a tamed Stravinsky, but one who remains an individual where individuals are few.

"Toward the close something of the Viennese spirit pervades the music, only to give way to what suggests ragtime, if not jazz. Here Stravinsky's technique serves him well. He extricates himself from the cheap by the neatness and ingenuity of his writing. Above the way are some curiously hollow spaces. The whole suggests a stage pantomime. Certainly a visual program would not be difficult to supply; indeed, one of Stravinsky's French commentators seems already to have put Harlequin, Columbine and their cohorts into this music. From the first, the ballet has been Stravinsky's métier."

Poor Old Igor!

The detractors laid on and spared not. Incidental discoveries of Bach in the middle measures and Strauss in the finale did not long detain them. Wrote Mr. Henderson in The Sun: "The entire work is disjointed, spasmodic in utterance, wanting in structural continuity and consistency of thematic subject matter and developmental treatment. It is not especially objectionable on the ground of ugliness. Indeed some of it is melodious in rather ancient manner and certain parts of the piano part, have a mild interest. Many others belong to the venerable class of tuner's runs. The harmonies are extreme in spots, but continent in most of the pages. . . . The third movement, which is marked allegro capriccioso, is the best of the three. For this we have to thank no less a personage than Richard Strauss. We did not think to live to hear Stravinsky repeating a lesson learned from that old gentleman, but if there had been no Rosenkavalier,' there would certainly have been no such allegro capriccioso as we heard last night. But Strauss did it better."

Slightly, though unintentionally comic, is the fury of another reviewer: "This music is incredibly trivial and labored, without a real idea, and in places imitative of the music of other composers. It is tired, disgusted music, music without hope or self-respect, which seeks with equal vainness and frivolity to avail itself of popular rhythms and topical musical phrases to conceal its own boredom and fatigue. It goes on and on, tediously, inconsequentially. A passage at the beginning of the third movement—a new rhythmical combination—raises hope, a passage, which is a feeble attempt at a joke. Soon even this hope has gone. At the end some motion has been generated—enough momentum to furnish a few measures which sound as if the composer had cheered up with the thought that he would soon be through. But he was through earlier than that. He was through before he began to write this balderdash." All of which suggests that "balderdash" is sometimes written elsewhere—and unconsciously—than on the pages of the berated Igor.

Spared Sanroma

The performance was another story. In the ears of the Herald Tribune, Mr. Sanromá "gave a fluent, polished, praiseworthy reading of the piano-part." To the Evening Post, he was "refreshing"; while Dr. Koussevitzky gave a "delightfully crisp and pointed performance." To the Sun, "Mr. Sanromá did his best, which was very good"; while even the Times so far relented as to grant him "a flawless virtuosity and musicianship." Mr. Koussevitzky in turn—good, faithful man!—"did everything possible for the composer."

Music Notes and Comment

Globe Jan 4

There are no Symphony concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday of this week, as the orchestra will be in New York. Dr Koussevitzky will as usual take his annual mid-season vacation this month. The next two pairs of Boston concerts will accordingly be conducted by guests. Dr Henry Hadley, now conductor of the Manhattan Symphony Orchestra in New York, will conduct the Boston Symphony concerts in Cambridge Jan 15 and in Boston Jan 16 and Jan 17. A Haydn symphony in E flat, a tone poem entitled "Masquerades" by Carl McKinley, now a member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory, and two of Dr Hadley's compositions fill the announced program. Dr Hadley, born in Somerville and educated in Boston, has appeared here as guest conductor of the People's Symphony Orchestra a number of times. He conducted a pair of Boston Symphony concerts as guest in 1925.

It is good news that E. Fernandez Arbos will conduct as guest the Boston Symphony concerts of Jan 23 and Jan 24. Mr Arbos is enthusiastically remembered from a previous appearance here as guest, as a conductor who is at once a first rate musician and a brilliant imaginative interpreter. Mr Arbos was concert master of the Boston Symphony under Gericke for a single season almost 30 years ago. He is now conductor of the Madrid Orchestra, and is this season making a number of appearances as guest leader in St Louis and other American cities.

Dr Koussevitzky's appearance at the Tuesday concert in a Wagner program will be his last in Boston for several weeks to come.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Jan. 19

More Echoes from New York

BEETHOVEN filled the second concert of the Symphony Orchestra in New York last week, with a repetition, as it seemed, of one of the programs from the recent festival in Washington. The overture to Goethe's "Egmont" led the list; the Seventh Symphony ended it; between stood the fourth piano-concerto with Miss Hess playing the solo-part. Upon the piece and upon her the reviewers spent their loving pains. A paragraph from the Herald Tribune is typical of them all:

"Miss Hess was at her best as an interpreter of this perennial music, with a complete mastery of technical requirements in the brilliance, polish and clarity of her playing, its revelation of detail, its nicety and variety of color. But it was the combination of these merits with the understanding of the work as a whole, the sympathetic expressiveness and the realization of poetic resources which made yesterday's interpretation one of the best given here in recent years. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra also deserved high praise for their share in the concerto, the just proportion and balance between the solo instrument and the ensemble. For the first movement, Miss Hess used Clara Schumann's cadenza, with its touches of mid-nineteenth century Germanic flavor, and employed Beethoven's own cadenza for the finale. A capacity audience warmly applauded the soloist, conductor and orchestra."

There seems some reason why Bostonians should say one to another: "Is not Miss Hess, after Washington and New York, to play this same concerto in Symphony Hall?" Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzy and the management of the orchestra will overhear them.

peak of $1[illegible] in 1920 and 1921.

Transcript Music Jan. 14

Tuesday Symphony

Dr. Koussevitzky offered a Wagner program for the second of the Tuesday afternoon series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday in Symphony Hall. The pieces were Overture to "Rienzi," Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin," Ride of the Valkyrs from "Walküre," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan" and Prelude to "Meistersinger."

The concert closed what seemed to one listener improvement in the Koussevitzkian interpretations of some of this music. The Overture to "Rienzi" again suffered, it is true, from overdrama: the opening measures were taken at too slow a pace; evidently in order to obtain an overwhelming contrast later. But the Bacchanale was performed with brilliance, and the closing measures were touched with unaffected loveliness. Again, in the "Tristan" Prelude the conductor refrained from the exaggeratedly slow tempo he used to affect in the opening cello phrase, and he achieved in the climactic measures of the Liebestod a throbbing eloquence which we do not remember hearing under his baton before.

Baring 1623 West 2663

The concert as a whole was another of those superiative exhibitions of virtuosity which are the rule in this Tuesday series.

L. A. S.

continued from page 88

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 1931

Bostonians Visit Here

Serge Koussevitsky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night for the second in the series of five concerts graciously granted Brooklynites. Mr. Koussevitsky occasionally permits his local subscribers to hear a novelty but last night was not the appointed time and the conductor instead chose only works with which a veritable novice is familiar.

To say that the Boston band is well trained is trite. To state that the conductor is familiar with accepted repertoire is but to reiterate a fact. And only the fire and spirit of Mr. Koussevitsky himself keeps a program such as was offered last night, from becoming monotonous in these days of novelties and revivals.

So was it last night. Mr. Koussevitsky's symphony was the fourth of Tschaikovsky, a work that he has played and played repeatedly. He has his own conceptions regarding this opus of a compatriot and does not vary an idea once he has accepted it.

Prefacing the major number was the 12th concerto grosso of Handel wherein that capable string choir of the Boston group was permitted to demonstrate its efficiency. Between Handel and Tschaikovsky came Mozart with the G Minor (K 550) providing a note of contrast.

The third visit will be made on Feb. 5, the only Thursday evening concert in the Brooklyn series.

H. E. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

WE'LL GRANT YOU A BRAHMS

To the Editor of the Evening Post:

Sir—Thank you for publishing my reply to your editorial on "College Glee Clubs." In referring to Koussevitzky I meant simply that the concerts you criticize are not unworthy examples of the art of choral singing. Even assuming, as you do, that the arousing of memories of undergraduate days in an audience composed of graduates should be the prime function of a concert given by a college glee club, I refuse to believe that we must, for that purpose, restrict the musical idiom of the college of today to such tunes as constituted the idiom of the college of yesterday. I think we can and should enlarge the musical idiom of the college of today to include classical works susceptible of performance by the college glee club. To me, indeed, and I think to many others, Brahms's "I Hear a Harp," which the glee club performed in my day, is as effective a reminder of college days as is "Harvardiana."

K. O. MOTT-SMITH.

New York, Jan. 8, 1931.

[Editor's Note: Of course, we'd permit a modern idiom for modern college music and, of course, we'd permit you a piece of Brahms. All we ask is that the concert be decidedly, dominantly, paramountly collegiate in tone.]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

JAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY HERE ON JAN. 20

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit of the season to Providence to give a concert in the Albee theatre on Tuesday evening, Jan. 20, at 8:15. Stravinsky's new capriccio for piano and orchestra, which was originally intended to be played at the previous concert here, will be performed. Jesus Maria Sanroma, Spanish-American pianist, will take the solop art. The capriccio was introduced to America by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston last month and was played in New York by him last Thursday. Sanroma likewise taking the solo part.

The program will open with Beethoven's first symphony in C-major and close with three excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner. These will include the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkrie;" prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," and theoverture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Henry Hadley will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in that city on January 17 and 18 in two concerts when performances of his tone poem "Salome" and his suite, "Streets of Pekin" will be specially featured.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

JAN 1931

Psalms Base Of Symphony

Boston Orchestra Plays Religious Work by Stravinsky

Stravinsky's "Symphonie des Psaumes," composed for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th anniversary, was played some days ago by that orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. Phillip Hale wrote of it in the Boston Herald:

"It has been said that Stravinsky of late is deeply religious; that he may devote himself to the glorification of God in music. This rumor possibly arose from the fact that he dedicated his 'Symphonie de Psaumes' to the orchestra, but composed it, as he states on the title page, 'to the glory of God.' But is this new symphony of Stravinsky the devout, more musical, more poetic, more imaginative than the compositions written in his supposedly pagan state?

"Stravinsky went to the Psalms for inspiration, choosing the sonorous text of the Vulgate verses of the thirty-ninth (the number in the King James version)—verses that are a prayer, an entreaty; from the fortieth, in which the Psalmist rejoices that his cry was heard, that he was taken from the horrible pit and the miry clay; and the 150th, in which the people are urged, and all things that have breath, to praise the Lord with the sound of all manner of instruments. His choice of instruments for these Psalms is peculiar; no violins, no violas, but five flutes, many other wind instruments, a harp. He called for two pianos. Although the psalmist wished organs and high-sounding cymbals to give praise, Stravinsky would not be the man to be so literal in his orchestration."

The European premiere of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" was given at Brussels some days ago, marking the first occasion, it is said, when a new work by the Russian composer has been introduced to the public in Europe anywhere but in Paris. It is interesting to note that this work, written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth anniversary, was presented by Mr Koussevitzky a week after the first performance in Brussels.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SYMPHONY'S THIRD WEEK FROM TUESDAY

Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, originally intended to be played at the Boston Symphony's previous concert here, will be on the program of the orchestra's third Providence concert a week from this Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Spanish-American pianist, will be the soloist for the number, as on other occasions when it has been played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky introduced it to this country in a Boston concert last month, and it was played by him in New York last Thursday. A solo player is a novelty on Boston Symphony programs here though Mr. Sanroma is hardly a novelty to local concert audiences. He will at least have passed that stage before the season is over. In adidtion to his appearance with the Boston band, he has played here with the Boston Sinfonietta in the opening concert of the Pembroke series and is due back again in May as soloist with the University Glee Club.

Dr. Koussevitzky is opening his concert with Beethoven's First Symphony and closing it with three excerpts from Wagner's music dramas. The order has been announced as follows: Symphony No. 1, in C-major, opus 21, Beethoven, Adagio molto, Allegro con brio; Andante cantbile con moto; Menuetto: Allegro molto s vivace. Trio; Finale: Adagio, Allegro molto e vivace. Cappriccio for Piano and Orchestra, Stravinsky, Presto, Andante rapsodico, Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto (played without pause). "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure," Wagner; "Prelude and Love-Death," from "Tristan und Isolde," Wagner; Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner.

SEE PAGE 106 FOR MORE JAN. COMMENTS

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 14 1931

95

PHILHARMONIC AND TOSCANINI HERE APRIL 9

Noted New York Orchestra With Famous Maestro Coming to Memorial.

ANNIVERSARY EVENT

Boston Symphony Unable to Fill Date; Tickets Are Redeemable.

Hartford's most important musical event since the opera will be officially announced to-night when the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall informs its patrons that the final program of the Bushnell concert series of 1930-1931 will be given by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Maestro Arturo Toscanini, rather than by the Boston Symphony orchestra, as had previously been stated.

According to the announcement, which will appear to-night in the program for the concert by Paul Robeson, the change of orchestras became necessary when Frank A. Sedgwick, local manager of the Boston symphony found it impossible to carry out an arrangement whereby that orchestra was to be included in the Bushnell series Concert April 9.

The New York Philharmonic concert will be given at the memorial on Thursday evening, April 9, one night later than that on which the Boston symphony had been scheduled to appear.

The formal announcement, which is printed in the Robeson program underneath a photograph of Toscanini, reads as follows:

"The Horace Bushnell Memorial hall wishes to announce that the final concert of the Bushnell concert series of 1930-1931 will be given not by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Wednesday, April 8, as originally announced, but by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Maestro Arturo Toscanini, on the evening of Thursday, April 9.

"Frank A. Sedgwick, local manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has found it impossible to carry out an arrangement whereby the Boston symphony, which has played annually for the last several years in Hartford under his management, should give the closing program of the present Bushnell season.

"Patrons holding tickets to the Boston symphony concert may either have them redeemed at the box office, or may use them as admission to the New York Philharmonic concert on Tuesday, April 9. Those who wish to redeem their tickets should do so before March 1."

Concert Hailed as Great Event.

The forthcoming concert by Toscanini is considered by music-lovers of Hartford to be the greatest event of its kind since the memorial presented the Metropolitan Opera company in a production of Puccini's opera, "Tosca," last November Hailed by many critics as the finest orchestra leader in the world, the little maestro is famous not only in America, but also throughout Europe. Last season, his tour of the continent was a series of triumphs. That the memorial was able to secure a contract for his appearance in Hartford is considered an outstanding piece of good fortune, inasmuch as he rarely consents to go to another city during the New York season.

(CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1.)

According to Charles F. T. Seaverns, chairman of the board of trustees of the memorial, notice of the change of orchestras will be sent to the entire Bushnell mailing list, and in every other way possible, holders of tickets to the Boston symphony concert will be informed of the rearrangement so that everyone who so desires may have his ticket redeemed.

"I am very much disappointed," Mr. Seaverns said, "that Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra will not appear in concert at the memorial this season, but it is a great pleasure for me to be able to announce that so distinguished a conductor as Maestro Toscanini will be here in his stead."

First Anniversary to Be Observed.

It was learned that when the management of the memorial discovered that Mr. Sedgwick would be unable to carry out the arrangement concerning the Boston Symphony orchestra, was decided at once to attempt ure Toscanini and the New ill-harmonic. Fortunately, arr ts for the appearance of this fa sical group were completed in o make the announcement in the gram for to-night's concert, which happens to take place on the occasion of the memorial's first anniversary.

All but a few hundred seats for the Boston Symphony concert already have been sold on a series basis, William H. Mortensen, managing director of the memorial, said to-day, and he does not think that the remainder will be sufficient to meet the demand from persons who wish to hear Toscanini. It is because of this heavy expected demand that the memorial has asked holders of Boston Symphony seats who wish to redeem their tickets to do so before March 1, he explained. The memorial, he said, will be glad to redeem every Boston Symphony concert ticket presented at the box office before that date. It is expected, however, that the majority of the ticket-holders will prefer to keep their tickets as admission to the Toscanini program.

Maestro Toscanini has not yet made public the program which he will present in Hartford, but Mr. Seaverns has been promised that it will measure up in every way to the standard of the concerts which the Philharmonic orchestra gives in New York.

Chotzinoff Sketches Toscanini.

In a recently-published vignette, Samuel Chotzinoff, music critic of the New York World, has sketched Toscanini as follows:

"The little maestro walks to his place with the unconcern of one who has been hired to do a job of work. He carries his stick under his arm like a tool, hops with youthful agility onto his platform, takes his bow soberly, turns to his men and waits for silence. When he is ready to begin, he gives the 'cello stand in front of him a resounding whack. His gestures are unmethodical and unpremeditated, seeming to be dictated by the musical demands of the moment. His right arm describes right angles and circles; his left does a variety of things, from indicating entrances to eliciting tone, the latter of which is achieved by the naive pressure of the thumb against the region of the heart.

"At the conclusion of a movement, the conductor puts his stick under his arm, takes out a large handkerchief and mops his face and the top of his head energetically. If the night is warm and the music exacting, he extends the drying process to the back of his neck, which he rubs thoroughly and efficiently in full view of 3,000 people. At the end of the concert, he takes as many recalls as he thinks his performance merited; then, though the acclaim is still at its peak, he surreptitiously pinches the concert master's arms, a prearranged signal which disperses the band, and the concert is over."

Paris Critic Adds Praise.

High tribute to the maestro and his orchestra was paid recently in a letter from the noted French music critic, Henry Prunieres, to the New York Times. M. Prunieres wrote from Paris in part as follows:

"I had heard the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra under Arturo Toscanini in Paris last season, and I had communicated my enthusiasm at that time to the readers of The Times. Secretly I had mistrusted my impressions just a bit. I had known Toscanini a long time. He is a magician. Just as the most mediocre opera will seem to you a masterpiece, if it is his wish, in the same degree it is in his power to transfigure the interpreters . . . . This, then, is the triumph of Toscanini, that he knows how to make the most even of the deficiencies of the interpreters. Under his baton, the New York orchestra had seemed splendid to me, but perhaps this might have been a mirage.

"Now that I have heard the same orchestra without Toscanini, I no longer doubt that in itself, it is beautiful. To make any sort of comparison between an organization of this standard and the orchestras of Paris, or, indeed, with the best in Europe, is out of the question."

Music-Lovers Pleased.

Music-lovers of Hartford were unanimous to-day in expressing pleasure at the news that the great conductor, Arturo Toscanini, will lead the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra in a concert at the Bushnell on April 9. Following are excerpts from a few of the statements received by The Times to-day:

"The best news that has been published this season. It will be a marvelous experience to have the Philharmonic with Toscanini conduct."—Merritt A. Alfred, president of the Choral Club of Hartford.

"It will be a fine treat for Hartford to have the opportunity of hearing Toscanini. The decision of the world is that he is the greatest of the conductors."—Ralph L. Baldwin, conductor of the Choral Club of Hartford.

"Toscanini is undoubtedly the foremost living conductor, and the combination of Toscanini with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra will be the greatest orchestra attraction ever offered to the Hartford public."—John Spencer Camp, prominent Hartford musician.

"A marvelous symponic body conducted by the greatest genius of the baton!"—Moshe Paranov, conductor of the Cecelia club.

"Hartford is to be congratulated that she has secured one of the most wonderful orchestras in the world."—Howard F. Laubin, conductor of the Oratorio society.

"Hartford is fortunate in having the Horace Bushnell memorial a management alive to such opportunities as this."—Major Anson T. McCook, president of the Hartford Oratorio society.

Players --- Music and Musicians

From Bolshevik to Believer

Arthur Lourié

Whose Devoutly Religious and Highly Christianized Music Will Be Heard at the Symphony Concerts Today and Tomorrow

(Sketch by Courtesy of the New York Times)

AUDIENCE IS BAFFLED BY NEW MUSIC

By MOSES SMITH

After considerable advance notices and some mixing up of signals, the "Sonate Liturgique" of Arthur Lourie, Russian composer now living in Paris, is presented as the novel feature of this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is preceded by Beethoven's first symphony and followed by Strauss' tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

Lourie's sonata, which was presented for the first time in this country, is in the form of four chorals. Two of these are purely instrumental, the other two call in the aid of a dozen alto voices. The ecclesiastical mood is established with the opening notes, and is maintained throughout.

Perhaps the most astonishing thing about this work is that the composer has had the temerity to use a harmonic scheme that is substantially free from dissonance. Even in churchly music, such a procedure is a surprise in this day and year. Yet there is, none the less, a haunting strangeness in this music. Largely it is due to the choice and number of instruments, which include merely for double-basses and a single solo instrument from each of the various wind and brass types, and a piano. The music alloted the last-named instrument comes closest to the harsh dissonance.

The performance under Dr. Koussevitzky seemed adequate to the presentation of the composer's ideas.

The performance of the Strauss tone-poem was brilliant and marked by imaginative insight on the part of the leader. Here and there (as in the Symphony, also) there was a minor slip by a solo instrument. But the essential Strauss was captured beautifully. Richard Burgin played the important violin solo with ravishing tone.

The Herald has received the following communication:
To the Editor of The Herald:

FOOD FOR THOUGHT: A SIMILE

I am Mrs. Raggles of Chicago.
I have seen the Apollo Belvedere.
And I have seen Raggles.
Give me Raggles.

I am Mr. Waggles of Boston.
I have heard Lourie's Sonate Liturgique.
And I have heard Beethoven's First Symphony.
But give me Beethoven's Symphony. S. M. G.

We infer from this that Mrs. G did not enjoy M. Lourie's work played at the last Symphony concert, but surely she must have been impressed by the richness of the alto voices and by the music given to them by the composer, who tortured the instruments as if to favor the singers.—Ed.

Music

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its eleventh program of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Jan. 2. Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major, Lourié's "Sonate Liturgique" and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" made up the list.

Arthur Lourié, as Mr. Sabaneev has related in these columns, was at one time Commissar of the People's Music in Soviet Russia. Formerly, we are told, his music was revolutionary too. Then he fell in step with Stravinsky, followed him back to Bach, and now we are assured has developed a style of his own.

He was introduced to Boston by this curious composition "in the form of four chorales," which was heard for the first time in America at the concert under review. The score calls for a little group of wind instruments, a piano, four contrabasses and a dozen alto voices. The style has been based on the ancient plain-song. The names of the four divisions are said to be taken from the Roman Catholic liturgy: "Sequentia," "Cantus Passionis," "Prosa" and "Horæ Passionis." The chorus sings in the second and the fourth divisions. The music does not stir admiration at a single hearing. It is very severe-sounding, and we imagine its effectiveness is supposed to lie in its severity. But the chief impression retained by one listener is that this score contains more plain-song than originality.

There was a delightful performance of Beethoven's very modern First Symphony, and (except for insecurity of intonation in the solo violin) a virtuosic proclamation of Strauss's magniloquent and periphrastic tone poem. L. A. S.

Afternoon Of Richard The Second

Dr. Koussevitzky Creates Anew A Straussian Masterpiece, The Cerebral Lourie

Jan 3

THE second half of the Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon, fell to Strauss's tone-poem, "A Hero-Life." Piece and performance nearly effaced the memory of all that had gone before. "Ein Heldenleben," as the German title runs, was the first of Strauss's longer works played by Dr. Koussevitzky to Bostonian audiences. With it, he was then on the way to be master-conductor. Now he has gained and assured that mastery. His orchestra, in those earlier years, was still an imperfect instrument. Now it is entirely and instantly responsive to his will, able, besides, to bring to pass whatever he—or the composer—asks. Remember from this performance of Strauss's tone-poem the unfailing certainty and richness of the eight horns, the beauty with which the first of them, Mr. Böttcher, clothed his tone; the wealth of voice in the strings, controlled by the utmost sensibility; the measured power of the brass; the individual quality of the woodwinds, the endless plasticity and resilience of the whole orchestra. It played as 110 men——for it was present in full numbers. It played also as one man—Dr. Koussevitzky, for Strauss.

The outcome was a performance of "A Hero-Life" in which veracity, saliency and felicity deepened into beauty or ascended into power. As exposition, it made "Ein Heldenleben" as clear as an autumn day. For once, those intricate passages in which Strauss twines together motivs from his earlier works, seemed a sounding as well as a paper music. For once, the measures of battle were ordered, not jumbled, dissonance; while the derision from the hero's adversaries proceeded, as it should, out of a cheeping background. These signs denote a performance in the newer, rather than the elder, manner with Strauss. When "Ein Heldenleben" first made the round of American concert-halls, it was custom to bear on hard and speak very loud. The adversaries squealed; the battle was a brazen tumult; the so-called "love-scene" was more heroic than intimate and solitary; as at the outset the hero was proclaimed upon the world, so, at the close, he departed from it most sonorously. The vaster the canvas, the bolder the outline, the broader the strokes, the nearer were conductor, orchestra and audience to the heroic Strauss. No wonder, the Straussians—Huneker in the van—were sometimes hard put to defend him.

The old manner has gone the way of most over-zeal. Within recent memory only Mr. Mengelberg exemplified it hereabouts. The new manner now prevails. Consistently, yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky followed it. Though the orchestra failed him ever so little at that first superb leap into the music, he less proclaimed than charactered the hero; upbuilding him in full-rounded life upon the tonal stage. Finely suspensive was the pause before the hero springs into the mêlée of living and doing. . . . The pages for the adversaries had true quality as music heard from a distance out of the shadows, as night-birds chatter and shrill far down the horizon. . . . The "love-scene" mounted out of the caprice of the beginning—lightly moody upon Mr. Burgin's violin—to the rapturous close, with the sweep of the Straussian melody tempered to its depth, as of those who may not speak for loving. . . . The battle-episode less stirred the ear by riot than by the sounding, toward the close, of the hero's motiv, victorious, down the wind, over the stricken field. . . . The rest, as Dr. Koussevitzky shapes it, is a single unfolding, ascending, cumulating music. We traverse the hero's memories and barely heed the incredible feats of counterpoint—once for all the Straussian technique is to be taken for granted—in the melancholy of remembrance; hear the hero restless and champing; then resigned and contemplative; to a solemn music putting the world away. He is less transfigured than vanished—into descending silence.

So imagined, designed and played, "Ein Heldenleben" remains high-placed in the music of Strauss, in the music of the turn of the century. Thirty years on, its shadow does not lessen. Save for the pages of the adversaries and the battle, there is no need to regard it in historical perspective. Rather, the listener looks forward; wonders how the next generation will in turn receive it. No doubt the snarling of the adversaries belongs to the days when bitter realism was a strange new thing in symphonic music. Reasonably enough, these sneering pages seem now a perverse petulance on the part of Strauss. But when was a genius such without that counter-quality? Nowadays, again, the din of the battle is a commonplace of realism in the concert-hall. The salvation is the course that Dr. Koussevitzky chose—the reduction of the tumult to a background, against which the motivs of hero and enemy may flare, above which the love-motiv may hover. Then all three signify, and the level of the whole is not lowered.

Put by these two divisions and there remains fourfold what our sons and successors may call with us "the greater Strauss." The Strauss who is manifold master of characterization in tones; of the musical implication and definition of psychological states; who has thereby extended the domain of music. The Strauss who is no less master of the blending of musical progress with the simultaneous course of thought, emotion, characterization. As such—music of the theater aside—he sits upon a lonely pinnacle in the concert-hall. Yet again, the Strauss who can turn the listening heart to water with those long, upsweeping, deep-sounding, diatonic melodies. The superior may call them commonplace; but they still seize the ears and the imagination of most that hear; while another half of the mind lays hold upon the full-shapen form, the rich texture, the range of color, the inexhaustible, ever-ready resource.

Last, the Strauss who can exalt us with power, touch us with beauty, join together pathos and solemnity, in more than one close. We have heard him, from Dr. Koussevitsky, at the end of "Death and Transfiguration" and now of "A Hero-Life." We have yet to hear him, from the conductor, in the matchless close of all—the death of Don Quixote. . . . Our notion of Strauss is cluttered by too close contact with his years of decline from the "Alpine Symphony" in the concert-hall to "The Egyptian Helen" in the opera house. To our sons' sons these routines, these semi-failures and failures, will be only débris about the feet of greatness. They will see Richard Strauss clear and high. Who remembers Beethoven now by "Wellington's Victory" or the "Birthday Overture?"

The novel number of the afternoon was Lourié's "Liturgical Sonata," played and sung for the first time in the United States. For it, the stage was first cleared; then in the center were convoked a small chamber-orchestra of woodwinds (less flutes), of brass (less the tuba), of double-basses and piano; around it a chamber-choir of twelve alto voices from Arthur Fiedler's Cecilia. This orchestra played the "Sequence" and the "Prose," out of the ancient Roman office, as described a few days back in these columns; joined with the voices in the "Song" and the "Hours" of the Passion, again out of Roman service-books. Of the quality of the performance it is impossible to write, since it asked a recondite knowledge and a state of listening mind which nowadays not one in a hundred, in any concert-room, may yield. With the rarest exceptions, what do the most learned and cultivated listeners at Symphony Hall know of the Ambrosan plain-song which was, by report, Mr. Lourié's source-book and model? With as few exceptions, how many of us may regain the mystical, ecstatic moods of the pietists of the early church, when they listened to these stark and monotonous measures and knew the Son of God upon his Cross? Since Dr. Koussevitzky had prepared the music of a friend; since virtuosi of the Symphony Orchestra played and a well-schooled choir sang, be it assumed that the performance did the Sonata justice.

To the nearly insuperable obstacle of musical matter and procedure alien to listeners in this thirty-first year of the twentieth century, even though our own polytonality now and then streaks it; to the nearly total lack in most of us of responsive mind and mood, add yet another barrier. There is no doubt that Mr. Lourié is deeply devout, worshipping God in spirit and in truth; that he believes himself possessed of a spiritual illumination which he would communicate in music to his follow-men. Yet to most that listened yesterday, that faith and enlightenment seemed wholly mental; that transmission wholly from the mind. The most pagan of us may listen to Bach and know the mystical longings of the believing and uplifted Christian. Bach touches our emotions as he sways our minds. Sursum corda, and we also must obey.

Down the centuries, with Franck at his highest, we may again share, from tones, mystical vision and rapture. In our own time, the English Holst is no stranger to the idiom and the exaltation of ancient plain-song. Here and now on remembered pages, Mr. Loeffler has touched us with the stripped beauty, the evocative power, of this music of the Roman fathers. But his heart had first been touched. Whereas, Mr. Lourié's processes in this "Liturgical Sonata" seem wholly mental. In his mind he assimilated the ancient music; by mental will would write in the twentieth century kindred matter in kindred manner. In his mind are all his faith and all his exaltation. For him a state of the spirit becomes an operation of the reason. To no more than our minds can he communicate it; whereas he should penetrate our hearts; while between most of our minds and his opens an impassable breach. No more dryly cerebral music (as the word goes) than Mr. Lourié's has been heard in recent memory across Symphony Hall. Little has been more coldly received. He might be readable in a treatise upon St. Thomas Aquinas, but he is beyond comprehension as tone-poet in plain-song. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky is, indeed, the most open-minded of conductors.

The young Beethoven began the concert—the Beethoven of the First Symphony, played by a diminished orchestra, with the conductor all susceptible ear and sensitive hand. So this "new grand symphony for full orchestra" may have sounded to the Viennese hearing it in the spring of 1800. But we of 1930 listen, knowing well the succeeding eight and Beethoven's other masterpieces of the concert-hall. Whatever his concentration upon this beginning, they are also at the back of the conductor's head. He plays the first movement and we hear, or fancy we hear, a bolder outline, a wider spacing, a broader melody, less of eighteenth-century Viennese symphonies than of the Beethoven who was to free and enlarge symphonic substance and symphonic form. The slow movement ensues, and all agree that it is eighteenth century—Beethoven following the best models. The Minuet-Scherzo follows. Eighteenth-century and the best models, we say again to ourselves. But three rows beyond is our perceptive friend, Ixe, who can find in it the germ of all the new-made Scherzi to come. The slow introduction to the Finale sounds. Yes, indeed, none but the future Beethoven could so herald his maturer self. . . . Thus our ears and minds go, and a little symphony, still pleasing in its young self, is nearly lost in a haze of speculation.

H. T. P.

By These—The Symphony Concerts

JAN. 3 1931

First List of Guarantors Against the Deficit for the Current Season

IN the program-book for the week, the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra announce that $55,499.33 has been subscribed, thus far, to the Guarantee Fund for the expenses of the present season. The amount is little more than half the sum, $100,000, that they asked last autumn for the maintenance of the concerts through the costly "Jubilee Year." With more than usual reason, they now repeat the annual admonition: "The orchestra can be carried only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in sustaining the orchestra."

Never in recent years—the Trustees might have added—has there been more need of them. To press upon possible subscribers the pleasure, the quality, the repute, of the Symphony Concerts should, at this late day, be needless. . . . Here, from the program-book, is the list of subscribers through Dec. 26:

Abbott, Gordon
Adams, Miss Clara A.
Adams, Mrs. E. C.
Adams, Mrs. Karl
Allen, Mrs. Thomas
Ames, Mrs. Hobart
Ames, Dr. and Mrs. John L.
Ames, Mrs. John S.
Ames, J. W.
Ames, Mrs. William H.
Anderson, Mrs. C. S.
Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. E. A.
Anthony, Miss A. R.
Anthony, Miss Margaret

Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E.
Bacon, Mrs. William
Bancroft, Mrs. Hugh
Barlow, R. S.
Barnard, William L.
Barnard, Mrs. William L.
Barnet, Mr. and Mrs. S. J.
Barr, Miss Laura M.
Barrett, Mrs. William E., Sr.
Bartlett, Mrs. Matthew Bartol, Miss Ann
Bartol, Miss Dorothy
Bazeley, Mrs. W. A. L.
Beal, Mrs. Boylston A.
Bearse, Mrs. Horace L.
Beckwith, Mrs. Daniel, Providence
Beebe, Miss Sylenda
Bell, Mrs. Jaffrey de Hautville
Bemis, Mr. and Mrs. A. Farwell
Bemis, Frank B.
Best, Mrs. Edward H.
Bigelow, Miss Eleanor
Bird, Mrs. Frances A. M.
Blake, Mrs. Arthur W.
Bliss, Henry W.
Bowden, Mrs. Herbert L.
Boyden, Charles
Bradlee, Miss S. C.
Bradlee, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas S.
Bradley, Mr. and Mrs. J. Gardner
Brewer, Miss Fannie R.
Brewer, Robert D.
Briggs, Miss Helen S.
Brigham, Mrs. D. S.
Brook, Harry C.
Brown, Miss Edith B.
Buckingham, Miss M. H.
Bullard, Miss Ellen T.
Bullard, Mrs. W. N.
Burgess, Mrs. George Sargent
Burnham, Miss Helen C.
Burnham, Miss Henry D.
Burnham, Miss M. C.
Burr, Mrs. Heman M.
Burr, I. Tucker
Butler, Miss Isabel

Cabot, Mrs. Arthur T.
Cabot, Frederick P.
Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B.
Cabot, Stephen P.
Carter, Mrs. Albert P.
Carter, Mrs. J. W.
Case, Miss Louise W.
Chapin, Horace D.
Chard, Mrs. Walter G.
Chase, Mrs. Henry M.
Cheever, Mrs. David
Clark, Mrs. Myron H.
Coale, Mrs. George O. G.
Cochran, Mrs. Edwin Paul, New Haven
Codman, Mrs. Russell S.
Coffin, Winthrop
Colt, Mr. and Mrs. James D.
Converse, Miss Luna B., Woodstock, Vt.
Coolidge, Mrs. Algernon
Coolidge, Miss Elsie W.
Coolidge, Julian L.
Coonley, Mr. and Mrs. Howard
Cotton, Miss Rachel E.
Crehore, Miss Lucy C.
Crocker, Alvah
Cummings, Charles K.
Curtis, Miss Frances G.
Curtis, Mrs. G. S.
Curtis, Miss Harriot S.
Curtis, Louis
Curtis, Miss Mary
Curtiss, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic H.
Cushing, Mrs. W. E.
Cutler, Mrs. C. H.
Cutler, Miss Elisabeth A.
Cutter, Mr. and Mrs. R. Ammi

In Memory of C. S. D.
Dabney, Mr. and Mrs. George B.
Daly, Mrs. Reginald A.
Dana, Mr. and Mrs. Richard H.
Daniels, Miss Mabel W.
Davenport, Mr. and Mrs. George H.
Dean, Paul Dudley
Derr, Thomas S.
Dexter, Miss Rose L.
Donald, Mrs. Malcolm
Duff, Mr. and Mrs. John Dunne, F. L. Co.

Eager, Miss Mabel T.
Earle, Misses, L. S. and M. I.
Eaton, Miss L. H.
Edwards, Miss Grace M.
Edwards, Mrs. L. F.
Ehrlich, Mrs. Henry
Elsemann, Julius
Ellery, Mr. and Mrs. William
Ely, Miss Elizabeth B.
Endicott, S. C.
Evans, Mrs. David J.

Farlow, Dr. and Mrs. John W.
Fay, Mrs. D. B.
Fenollosa, William S.
Field, Edward B.
Fitch, Miss Carrie T.
Foote, George L.
Forbes, Allyn B.
Forbes, Edward W.
Forbes, Mrs. Ralph E.
Forbes, Mrs. Waldo E.
Forness, Mrs. Arthur A.
Fox, Walter S., Jr.
French, Miss Katharine
Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Donald McKay
Frost, Horace W.
Frothingham, Mrs. Louis A.

Gage, Mrs. Homer
Garritt, Mrs. Walter G.
Gaston, Mrs. W. A.
Giles, Miss Louise
Gilmore, Mrs. G. L.
Ginn, Mrs. Edwin
Golden, Edward I.
Goodwin, Mrs. Frederic S.
Goulston, Leopold Morse
Gray, Morris
Gray, Mrs. Russell
Greene, Edwin Farnham
Green, Mrs. Kathleen T.
Greenough, Mrs. Henry V.
Greenslet, Ferris
Griffith, Miss Josephine
Grover, Mrs. Frances L.
Grozier, Mrs. E. A.

Hall, Mrs. H. S.
Hallowell, Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose
Hamilton, Mrs. Charlotte D.
Hamilton, Miss Ruth W.
Hamlin, Miss Jenny L.
Harmon, Miss Lilian
Harris, Miss Frances K.
Hartwell, Miss Mary A.
Harwood, Mrs. John H.
Hatfield, Dr. and Mrs. Hugh K.
Haughton, Miss Alison
Hawley, Mr. and Mrs. George Hayden, Mrs. Harold B.
Hayden, Sherman S.
Hellman, William C.
Herman, Mrs. Joseph M.
Higginson, Mrs. F. L.
Higginson, F. L.
Higginson, Mrs. Henry L.
Hill, Arthur D.
Hill, Mrs. John F.
Holmes, Miss Alice Marion
Holmes, Mr. and Mrs. Edward J.
Holmes, Miss
Hopkins, Mrs. A. L.
Houghton, Clement S.
Houghton, Mrs. Clement S.
Houghton, Miss Elizabeth G.
Houser, Mrs. H. M.
Howe, Henry S.
Howe, Mrs. Henry S.
Howe, Mrs. J. Murray
Howe, M. A. DeWolfe
Hunt, Mrs. Albert W.
Hutchins, Mrs. Edward W.

Jack, Dr. Frederick L.
Jackson, Dr. Henry
Jackson, Mrs. James, Sr.
Jacobs, Miss May
Jamieson, Mrs. J. B., Jr.
Jaques, Miss H. L.
Johnson, Arthur S.
Johnson, Miss Edith Morse
Johnson, Mrs. Otis S.
Jones, Miss Margaret H.

Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W.
Kaffenburg, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Keeler, Mrs. L. M.
Kent, Mrs. Edward L.
Kibrick, I. S.
King, Mrs. Henry P.
King, The Misses

Lamb, Miss Aimee
Lane, Chester T.
Lang, Mrs. B. J.
Lang, Miss Margaret Ruthven
Lapham, Mrs. Henry G.
Lasell, Miss Elizabeth
Laughlin, Henry A.
Lauriat, Mrs. C. E.
Lawrence, Mrs. John
Lee, Mr. and Mrs. George C.
Lee, Joseph
Leland, Mrs. Lester
Leman, J. Howard
Lewis, Mrs. George
Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. Leo Rich
Littell, Miss Lucy
Little, Mrs. David M.
Lord, Mrs. W. H.
Loring, Miss Marjorie C., (In Memory of Charlotte Lowell)
Lothrop, Miss Mary B.
Lothrop, Mrs. W. S. H.
Lowell, Miss Lucy
Luce, Stephen B.
Lyman, Arthur
Lyman, Herbert
Lyon, Mrs. George Armstrong

Machin, Joseph
Manning, Mr. and Mrs. Earl G.
Mason, Miss Fanny P.
Miller, Miss Mildred A.
Milliken, Arthur N.
Moir, Mrs. John
Moore, Mrs. Edward C.
Moors, Mr. and Mr. Arthur W.
Morison, Samuel Eliot.
Morse, Miss J. G.
Morss, Mrs. Charles A.
Moseley, Mrs. F. S.
Motley, Mrs. E. Preble.
Mumford, Mrs. George S.
Murdock, Mrs. Harold
McCreary, Mrs. Lewis S.
McGinley Mrs. Holden
McKee, Mrs. William L.
McKibbin, Miss Emily W.
McMichael, Mrs. L. G.

Nichols, Mrs. Henry G.
Nickerson, Mrs. W. G.
Nourse, Miss Annie Endicott

Osgood, Miss Emily L.

Paine, Rev. George L.
Paine, R. T. 2d
Parker, Haven
Patton, James E.
Peabody, Mrs. W. Rodman
Perera G. L.
Pfaelzer, Mrs. Franklin T.
Pierce, Mrs. Edgar
Pierce, Mrs. M. V.
Pitman, Mrs. Harold
Post, Mrs. John R.
Potter, Mrs. John Briggs
Potter, Mrs. Murray A.
Pratt, Mrs. Walter M.
Prendergast, Miss Julia C.
Putnam, Mrs. James J.
Putnam, Miss Louisa H.
Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. William E.

Rand, Professor and Mrs. E. K.
Rand, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Seaton
Ranney, Miss Helen M.
Rantoul, The Misses
Rantoul, Mrs. Neal
Remick, Mrs. Frank W.
Renfrew, Mrs. L. B., St. Petersburg, Fla.
Rice, Miss Ellen P.
Richards, Mrs. J. L.
Richardson, Mrs. John Richardson, Nicholas
Richardson, W. K.
Richmond, W. D.
Robb, Mrs. Russell
Robinson, Miss Katherine
Rogers, Miss Bertha F.
Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M.
Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Howard L.
Ropkins, Mrs. Kate C.
Rosenthal, Mrs. Louis
Rothwell, Bernard J.
Rubenstein, Philip
Russell, Mr. and Mrs. H. B.

Sachs, Professor Paul J.
Sampson, Mrs. Robert deW.
Sampson, Mrs. W. R.
Sanger, Mrs. Charles R.
Saville, Mrs. William
Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B.
Schneider, Miss Elizabeth
Scott, Mrs. Arnold
Scranton, Mrs. Gilmore G.
Sears, Miss Annie L.
Sears, Miss Mary C.
Sears, Mrs. Montgomery
Sears, Richard D.
Sears, Mrs. Richard
Selfridge, Mrs. George S.
Shepard, Mrs. Willis S.
Sigourney, Miss Edith
Silsbee, Mrs. George S.
Slattery, Mrs. Charles Lewis
Slocum, Mrs. Winfield S., Sr.
Smith, Miss Elizabeth H.
Smith, Mr. and Mrs. F. Morton
Smith, Louis C
Sonnabend, A. M.
Sortwell, Mrs. A. F.
Spalding, Mrs. Philip L.
Spalding, Mr. and Mrs. Walter R.
Spaulding, Miss Emma F.
Sprague, Mrs. Charles Spring, Romney
Stackpole, Miss Alice
Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs. Pierpont L.
Staniford, Mrs. Daniel
Stanton, Miss Katharine
Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander
Stevens, Moses T.
Stone, Miss Katherine H.
Streeter, Mrs. E. C.
Sturgis, The Misses
Swain, Mrs. Howard T.

Taintor, Mrs. Charles W.
Tapley, Miss Alice P.
Tappan, Mrs. Frederick H.
Thorndike, Albert
Thoron, Mrs. Ward
Thorp, Miss Alice A.
Tower, Miss Florence E.
Tozzer, Mrs. Alfred M.
Trafford, Mrs. B. W.

Vaughan, Miss Bertha H.
Vaughan, Mrs. W. W.
Vorenberg, Mrs. Felix

Walker, Mrs. George
Wallace, Charles F.
Ward, Miss M. deC.
Ward, Professor R. deC.
Ware, Henry
Waring, Mrs. Guy
Warren, Bentley W.
Warren, Mrs. George E.
Watson, Mrs. Thomas R.
Webster, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin S.
Weeks, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S.
Weidhorn, Leo
Welch, Mr. and Mrs. E. Sohier
Weston, Charles H.
Wetherbee, Miss Martha
Wheelwright, Miss Mary C.
White, Miss Gertrude R.
Whitney, Mrs. Margaret F. G.
Wilder, Mrs. Edward F.
Williams, Moses
Willson, Donald B.
Winsor, Mrs. Frederick
Winsor, Mrs. Kennard
Wolcott, Mrs. Roger Wood, Miss Charlotte
Woolley, Mrs. Edith Christiana
Wrenn, Philip W.
Wright, Mrs. Walter P.

Holiday Ends, The Concerts Proceed Again

Lourie and His Plain Song, New Grist of Programs, Guest-Conductors

Dec. 31 Trib.

FOR the first concerts of the new year Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra, together with a semi-chorus of altos from The Cecelia, will play, and sing, as novelty Arthur Lourié's "Sonate liturgique en forme de quatre chorales." To which title the score adds "Anno Domini 1928." The career of Arthur Lourié, of whose work Boston has as yet heard nothing, is a varied one. He is of Jewish stock, though the family have been Roman Catholics for some generations. He was born in Petersburg as it then was) in 1892). (Riemann's Dictionary, according to the best information obtainable hereabouts, is incorrect in giving the date as 1884.) He was educated in the schools, musical and otherwise, of his native city. After the Revolution he was active in Government service. From 1918 to 1920 he held a position which we should probably call head of the Music Division of the Department of Fine Arts,—if we had a Fine Arts Department in the Cabinet of our country. A large part of his duty was to facilitate the interchange of artists between Russia and the rest of Europe. In 1923 he left Russia and settled in Paris, where he has since remained. While in Russia he was known as an extremely radical composer.

Arrived in Paris, Lourié spent some years in meditation and study, thinking through his methods, polishing his technical equipment, enlarging his point of view, building for himself finally a personal esthetic. During this period he avoided publicity as far as possible. While other composers were looking for performances of their works, Lourié tried to keep his own from being performed. According to Mr. Olin Downes, in an authoritative article in the New York Times, "from those years he emerged with a technic and style universally clarified, and a viewpoint which had altered from that of skeptical inquiry to pure faith and mysticism." In an article on Lourié's Concerto Spirituale heard in New York from the Schola Cantorum, March 26, 1930, Mr. Downes continues: "It is evident from these pages, as from various literary expressions of the composer, that Lourié is working with complete absorption and singleness of aim toward one object—music as a modern expression of religion, and that this intense concentration is the result of growth and experience. He goes far back to plain chant as the basis of his score."

The identical words could be used with equal correctness about the "Sonate liturgique." Devotion to his religion is the motivating power in Lourié's life, in his music as well as elsewhere. Thus he goes back to the treasure house of the music of the church for the basis of his new style. Not content with the later music of his plain-song period, he frequently delves into the chants, melodies and hymns of the earliest centuries of the Christian era. His plain-song sources, in other words, are frequently Ambrosian (after Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, A. D. 333 to 397) rather than Gregorian (after Gregory the Great, A. D. 540 to 604). To continue still further from Mr. Downes: "In employing the Ambrosian chant Lourié logically, inevitably, eschews nineteenth-century chromaticism and returns to what is an essential diatonism, although he does not hesitate in some passages . . . to employ polytonality."

Lourié is also an author of no little importance. He contributes variously to Parisian journals and periodicals. For the American "Modern Music he has written two articles, "Neogothic and Neoclassic" and "An Inquiry into Melody." In them he shows himself a profound thinker, a musical philosopher whose pronouncements have the ring of authority. In the first of these two articles Schönberg and his school of expressionists are of course the "neo-Goths," while Stravinsky et al., are the "neo-classicists." He longs for and discusses a possible synthesis of the two but ends by questioning the possibility of such a desirable union. The "Inquiry into Melody" places melody as the chief master of music, entirely outranking rhythm. He opines that "perhaps the moment is at hand when that which the builders have set aside will again become their cornerstone."

The New Work

The four "chorales" of the "Liturgical Sonata" are I Sequentia; II Chant de la Passion; III Prosa; IV Horloges de la Passion. The orchestra consists of oboes and English horn, clarinets and bass-clarinets, bassoons, trumpets, trombones, piano, double-basses, and in the second and fourth numbers a small chorus of altos. The Sequence and Prose are hymns taken from the office of the Mass. In the article, "Sequence," in Grove's Dictionary we read: "A hymn of peculiar structure, which owes its name to its position in the Mass. It appears there as the continuation or sequence of the Gradual (the response sung between Epistle and Gospel) and the Alleluia. Originally it was a long jubilus or melody attached to the final a' of the Alleluia. In the ninth century in France words were adapted to the notes, and these were called a 'Prose,' because they followed the lines of the music, and not any scheme of meter. When these compositions had thus won a place for themselves, fresh

The Strange Case of Arthur Vincent Lourié

His Record and Music from A Revolutionary Past To a Religious Present

Trans. Jan. 3

AN Italian mathematician, one Codazzi, thought that music can be composed with the aid of calculus: he is classed by Lombroso as an insane genius, along with those musicians who thought they were divinely inspired. Among the champions of the new musico-mathematical theology, only one—Stravinsky—has genius, and none is insane.

The case of Arthur Vincent Lourié (the insertion of the middle name is significant, for it emphasizes the Roman Catholic religion of the bearer—Russian Jews have but one given name) is interesting from the sociological rather than musical point of view, for, he it said at once, he does not possess a degree of creative power which would entitle him to the dignity of an individual composer. He is an extraordinarily gifted man, eclectic in his tastes, and just as vague in his musical expressions as in his general ideas. But, lacking in creative power, he has developed an acute sense for persuasive argument. He possesses the necessary literary technique to present his cause with seeming coherence. But the amazing hollowness of his fundamental concepts stands out all the more clearly. He battles in an empty air—and for a dialectician of his order it may be all he cares for.

Some time ago, Modern Music published Lourié's disquisition upon Melody as a theological virtue. It is a depressing document of mental sterility, a mesh of unsupported statements interwoven with Biblical quotations and theological references. "It is probable," he argues, "that in our time we do not compose good melodies because we have become evil-minded. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Our melodic gift is in direct ratio to our capacity for good, not in the sentimental but in the religious sense. . . . Melody in itself is a primary good, a sort of purification through repentance. . . . Melody is a virtue, organically connected with the three theological virtues, and therefore, its highest achievement lies incontestably in religious music, i. e., prayer." . . . This, printed in a publication devoted to Modern Music, may be a sign of the times. It must be said in full fairness, however, that a great deal of the sanctimonious stuff of the Russian original was cut out by the editor.

Who is this man deplores our evil minds? Whence his moralistic attitude? A preacher is often a repentant sinner, but we need not pry into this preacher's conscience; for his mind moves on such dialectical heights that they are not in contact with the worldliness of our own space and time.

Arthur Lourié was well known to the habitués of a Bohemian club, graphically called "Stray Dog," in St. Petersburg during the days of the war. It was a refuge for all unrecognized geniuses, and was always packed with people. Some of its frequenters, such as Vladimir Mayakovsky, the poet-suicide, and Arthur Lourié himself were to receive their official recognition at the hands of the Soviet Government.

Arthur Lourié was then a champion of the last word in music. As is his nature, he was an eclectic, open to conflicting influences,—Skriabin, Schönberg, early Stravinsky. Debussy paid a visit to the Russian capital (and to the "Stray Dog") at the beginning of the war; and a year or two later Lourié composed a Suite for Children ("Grand Piano in the Nursery") which is directly derived from Debussy's favorite devices (the rain-patter etc.). There were other compositions in a small form: "Rosary," a series of songs to Madame Akhmatova's poems; a String Quartet (written with sufficient clumsiness to attract attention); Three Sonatinas for Piano; a work with a long title in French: "Pleurs de la Vierge Marie. Fragment d'une chanson pieuse du XIII siècle. Pour Chant, Violon, Alto et Violoncelle, composé par Arthur Vincent Lourié, Petrograde MCMXV," and "Forms in the Air," subnamed "sound-script" and dedicated to Pablo Picasso. It is an exercise in fanciful typography, rather than in musical composition,—a series of arabesques languidly dropping from one staff-line to another, until the range of the piano is spanned. What there is of music suggests a caricature of Skriabin.

All these masterpieces would have never seen light had it not been for the October Revolution that threw the futurists into temporary power. And the dawn of the year 1918 saw Arthur Vincent Lourié, in a velvet jacket and a bow tie, establish his headquarters as Musical Commissar of the Department of Education. The Bolsheviks were then shunned by all "decent" people, and the intelligentsia boycotted the Government by means of a general strike. Lourié's "treason" was condemned, but it proved a blessing to his fellow-musicians. If, by duty of office, he had to sign unpleasant warrants for confiscation of pianos owned by the bourgeoisie, with the same pen he could restore the property to their owners as "tools of production." He was a great help to many, not excluding himself. As musical commissar, he had the State Publishing House print his futuristic pastiches, and at one time, when the paper shortage was great, he was the only publishing composer in all the Russias. He left for France as a representative of the State, but Paris caused in him a change of heart, and he settled there for good. The Soviet papers never mention his name in any connection. To them, he is just as good as a dead man, shot down according to the law.

It is very difficult to estimate the artistic deserts of Lourié's musical works. Being an indefatigable dialectician, he can temporarily create an impression of reality. He lacks talent, but he possesses a constructive mind capable of producing excellent imitations. Furthermore, being Stravinsky's intimate, he bears a certain weight with the musical world. In some respects he may exert an influence on the master himself; certainly he can supply argument in defence of Stravinsky's courses. And at times he gets ahead of Stravinsky in works such as the "Concerto Spirituale," produced by the Schola Cantorum of New York on March 26, 1930.

In fact it is his only work (discounting the early Cantata to Alexander Block's words, and a "Japanese Suite" for Orchestra) that deserves serious consideration. It is scored for a double-chorus, piano, brass and six double-basses. The Prologue for Solo Baritone accompanied by three trumpets, two trombones and tuba, is impressive, and

Jan. 5 Trib.

Play

The Week-End Through the Concert-Hall

Strauss, Lourie, Koussevitzky, Afternoon with Iturbi, Modern Pianist

LOURIE'S singular "Sonata," repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, gained more applause than on Friday; yet at second hearing seemed little more comprehensible or sympathetic. Through the first movement, or "Sequence," for the assembled instruments, the ear kept pace and understanding with the composer. No sooner, however, did the voices enter for the "Song of the Passion" than it began to grope; soon lost the way; caught at this or that passing impression; finally gave up the whole piece as something inarticulate, unintelligible, alien. When this mood has subsided the hearer begins to put together these vagrant impressions; remembers the steady, firm-paced advance of the Sequence; a propulsive progress in the two movements for voices and instruments; the recurring beat, especially toward the end, of the piano.

Lourié then, has some command of rhythm; a command obviously imitated from Stravinsky, his friend. But Stravinsky and plain song hardly mix, even in a "Liturgical Sonata"; while no one but Lourié can possibly be responsible for those strange, detached notes, as though struck blindly, that the piano now and then interjects. Add them to the whole music and there comes a plausible deduction. Lourié composes with a mind but without an ear. Theorizing, he writes notes on music-paper. Having written them, he has but slight notion of how they will sound. Hence as speechless and sterile a music as Symphony Hall has heard in many a day.

Again the event of the concert was the performance of Strauss's tone-poem, "A Hero-Life"—tour de force by conductor and orchestra in which they excelled even their Friday prowess. Never before, it is safe to say, has "Ein Heldenleben" sounded so clear, manifold and puissant upon Bostonian ears. Two chance reactions lingered. It has become rather the fashion to depreciate our musical time, to call it relatively barren, to lament its lack of genius. Yet the forty years between 1890 and 1931 have yielded Strauss, Debussy, Sibelius and Stravinsky in the works of prime. The harvest does not seem scanty. Nor in the history of music are there many periods of equal span to excel it. . . . Second, some of us like to make our mental pictures of human power. Not many are comparable with the image of conductor and orchestra, full-panoplied, at some climax in a tone-poem of Strauss—say at the end of the proclamation of the hero in "Ein Heldenleben"; at the turn of the music of coquetry into the unfolding, upswelling love-song; at the sounding of the hero's motiv over the battle fought and won. So onward to the end.

Concert-Chronicle

Anniversaries

A CORRESPONDENT has opened a Dictionary of Musicians—by chance at the article, Mozart. In the second line she read: "Born at Salzburg, Jan. 27, 1756"—one hundred and seventy-five years ago. "An anniversary approaches," she writes in a discoverer's joy. The nearest Symphony Concerts are those of Jan. 23-24 and Jan. 30-31. Accordingly she implores Mr. Arbos at the one pair, or Dr. Koussevitzky at the other, "to remember Mozart."

Another correspondent reads a Parisian newspaper "regularly." From it he learns that Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" was a hundred years old last month. "Another centenary," he writes with an exclamation-point! "As a mark of respect," he would have the piece replayed at the Symphony Concerts before the season ends—the more because it has not been heard since the second year of Dr. Koussevitzky's reign. . . . So much for the "sense of the past," as it would work upon current concerts in the town.

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky as revised for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday:

Symphony, No. 1, in C major.....Beethoven
Liturgical Sonata .....Lourie
(New: First Times)
Tone-Poem, "A Hero-Life" .....Strauss

Incidents and Prospects

Dr. Koussevitzky's mid-winter holiday of a fortnight takes him from the Symphony Concerts in Cambridge on Jan. 15; in Boston on Jan. 16 and 17, Jan. 23 and 24. This season guest-conductors are hard to come by. For the first time in several years, no distinguished composer is visiting the United States; while the only newcomer of note among conductors is the Parisian, Vladimir Golschmann, under contract in St. Louis when it would be pleasure to hear him in Boston. Consequently the limited choice has lighted upon Mr. Hadley, as noted above, for the concerts of Jan. 15, 16, 17; upon Mr. Arbos, heard with pleasure two years ago, for those of Jan. 23, 24.

Mr. Slonimsky's Chamber Orchestra of Boston seems busier in New York than in its own city. Not only will it play there in a concert of its own on Saturday evening, Jan. 10, but also in two concerts, one in February, the other in April, arranged by the New School of Social Research.

On Thursday, Dec. 18, with Mr. Monteux conducting, the Paris Symphony Orchestra played Prokoffiev's Fourth Symphony for the first time in that city—the same Symphony, written for the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra, that Dr. Koussevitzky produced last November. The Russian filled the whole concert, with an overture, the "Scythian Suite," the second piano-concerto. The composer was pianist.

Holiday Ends, The Concerts Proceed Again

Lourie and His Plain Song, New Grist of Programs, Guest-Conductors

Dec. 31 Journal

FOR the first concerts of the new year Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra, together with a semi-chorus of altos from The Cecelia, will play, and sing, as novelty Arthur Lourié's "Sonate liturgique en forme de quatre chorales." To which title the score adds "Anno Domini 1928." The career of Arthur Lourié, of whose work Boston has as yet heard nothing, is a varied one. He is of Jewish stock, though the family have been Roman Catholics for some generations. He was born in Petersburg as it then was) in 1892). (Riemann's Dictionary, according to the best information obtainable hereabouts, is incorrect in giving the date as 1884.) He was educated in the schools, musical and otherwise, of his native city. After the Revolution he was active in Government service. From 1918 to 1920 he held a position which we should probably call head of the Music Division of the Department of Fine Arts,—if we had a Fine Arts Department in the Cabinet of our country. A large part of his duty was to facilitate the interchange of artists between Russia and the rest of Europe. In 1923 he left Russia and settled in Paris, where he has since remained. While in Russia he was known as an extremely radical composer.

Arrived in Paris, Lourié spent some years in meditation and study, thinking through his methods, polishing his technical equipment, enlarging his point of view, building for himself finally a personal esthetic. During this period he avoided publicity as far as possible. While other composers were looking for performances of their works, Lourié tried to keep his own from being performed. According to Mr. Olin Downes, in an authoritative article in the New York Times, "from those years he emerged with a technic and style universally clarified, and a viewpoint which had altered from that of skeptical inquiry to pure faith and mysticism." In an article on Lourié's Concerto Spirituale heard in New York from the Schola Cantorum, March 26, 1930, Mr. Downes continues: "It is evident from these pages, as from various literary expressions of the composer, that Lourié is working with complete absorption and singleness of aim toward one object—music as a modern expression of religion, and that this intense concentration is the result of growth and experience. He goes far back to plain chant as the basis of his score."

The identical words could be used with equal correctness about the "Sonate liturgique." Devotion to his religion is the motivating power in Lourié's life, in his music as well as elsewhere. Thus he goes back to the treasure house of the music of the church for the basis of his new style. Not content with the later music of his plain-song period, he frequently delves into the chants, melodies and hymns of the earliest centuries of the Christian era. His plain-song sources, in other words, are frequently Ambrosian (after Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, A. D. 333 to 397) rather than Gregorian (after Gregory the Great, A. D. 540 to 604). To continue still further from Mr. Downes: "In employing the Ambrosian chant Lourié logically, inevitably, eschews nineteenth-century chromaticism and returns to what is an essential diatonism, although he does not hesitate in some passages . . . to employ polytonality."

Lourié is also an author of no little importance. He contributes variously to Parisian journals and periodicals. For the American "Modern Music he has written two articles, "Neogothic and Neoclassic" and "An Inquiry into Melody." In them he shows himself a profound thinker, a musical philosopher whose pronouncements have the ring of authority. In the first of these two articles Schönberg and his school of expressionists are of course the "neo-Goths," while Stravinsky et al., are the "neo-classicists." He longs for and discusses a possible synthesis of the two but ends by questioning the possibility of such a desirable union. The "Inquiry into Melody" places melody as the chief master of music, entirely outranking rhythm. He opines that "perhaps the moment is at hand when that which the builders have set aside will again become their cornerstone."

The New Work

The four "chorales" of the "Liturgical Sonata" are I Sequentia; II Chant de la Passion; III Prosa; IV Horloges de la Passion. The orchestra consists of oboes and English horn, clarinets and bass-clarinets, bassoons, trumpets, trombones, piano, double-basses, and in the second and fourth numbers a small chorus of altos. The Sequence and Prose are hymns taken from the office of the Mass. In the article, "Sequence," in Grove's Dictionary we read: "A hymn of peculiar structure, which owes its name to its position in the Mass. It appears there as the continuation or sequence of the Gradual (the response sung between Epistle and Gospel) and the Alleluia. Originally it was a long jubilus or melody attached to the final 'a' of the Alleluia. In the ninth century in France words were adapted to the notes, and these were called 'Prose,' because they followed the lines of the music, and not any scheme of meter. When these compositions had thus won a place for themselves, fresh ones came to be written in regular meter, and the old name 'Prose' being unsuitable, gave way to the new name Sequence. From the twelfth century to the fifteenth such compositions were most popular.' Two examples are the Stabat Mater and the Dies Iræ, both technically sequences.

Lourié's four "chorales" are all short. The longest will scarcely require five minutes; while the shortest is less than two minutes. In the Sequence a much-repeated note, quietly played by a trumpet, is heard against simple, diatonic chords. This melody, if such it can be called, suffers several inflections; then proceeds again upon the one note. For contrast, there is a fortissimo section, in which the solo-part advances with an even-rhythmed melody that can be compared only to the simplest and starkest plain-song formula. The accompanying chords are still diatonic but slightly more complex. After which the first portion, that of the monotone with occasional inflections, is repeated a minor third lower than at first.

The text of the "Song of the Passion" is that of the "Tenebræ," a part of the offices for Good Friday:

"And there was darkness when the Jews crucified Jesus.

And about the ninth hour Jesus cried out with a loud voice,

My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?

And he bowed his head and gave up the ghost.

"And Jesus cried with a loud voice,

Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit.

And he bowed his head and gave up the ghost."

The melody sung by the altos is the plain-song assigned to this text in the service-books of the Roman Church. The orchestral part rises to a solemn, mystical intensity in the last portion. The melody is in the seventh, or Mixolydian, mode.

In the "Prose" a melodic texture serves as background for a curious, choral-like, descending figure in half-notes, harmonized by inversions of dissonant, unrelated seventh-chords. The phrases are eleven measures in length. Within the phrases orchestra and piano reply to each other antiphonally. The movement is well constructed, with orderly return to the first material after a contrasting section. A cadenza for piano leads into this return. Mystical flavor of the religious past is strong upon this movement. The composer shows power to summon and convey new and untried moods (so we of the present would be inclined to say) in his music.

The Latin of "Hours of the Passion," again sung by the altos, may be roughly translated thus:

"At the first hour Jesus was led to Pilate.
At the third hour the multitude cried out 'Crucify.'
At the sixth hour Jesus was nailed to the cross.
At the ninth hour Jesus died.
At the hour of vespers Jesus was taken from the cross.
At the hour which ends the day Jesus was laid in the grave."

The voices proceed in two parts, in hollow sounding or dissonant intervals, deeply suggestive of the mysticism of the early days of the church. There is orchestral introduction and epilogue in descending slowly moving chords, against slow arpeggio figures. These descending scale figures assume almost the importance of a common motif for the last three movements. In the "Song of the Passion" it is descending eighth notes in the orchestral bass. In the "Prose" it is the half-note choral in high register. In the "Hours of the Passion" it is in the descending whole-note chords of introduction and epilogue.

It is difficult to recall any other composer who has used plain-song so consistently for its own sake. From Debussy onward, many composers have made use of it. But that use has ever been as an exotic, to provide new color for some scheme or plan about some other subject in the mind of the composer. Lourié uses plain-song to express what it was originally intended to express, the mysteries, devotions and exaltations of the church itself. The oldest of musical themes is again, through him, coming into use. And the Catholics of Paris are said to be acclaiming him as the leader in this newest plain-song renaissance.

A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky as revised for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday:

Symphony, No. 1, in C major.....Beethoven
Liturgical Sonata .....Lourie
(New: First Times)
Tone-Poem, "A Hero-Life" .....Strauss

Incidents and Prospects

Dr. Koussevitzky's mid-winter holiday of a fortnight takes him from the Symphony Concerts in Cambridge on Jan. 15; in Boston on Jan. 16 and 17, Jan. 23 and 24. This season guest-conductors are hard to come by. For the first time in several years, no distinguished composer is visiting the United States; while the only newcomer of note among conductors is the Parisian, Vladimir Golschmann, under contract in St. Louis when it would be pleasure to hear him in Boston. Consequently the limited choice has lighted upon Mr. Hadley, as noted above, for the concerts of Jan. 15, 16, 17; upon Mr. Arbos, heard with pleasure two years ago, for those of Jan. 23, 24.

Mr. Slonimsky's Chamber Orchestra of Boston seems busier in New York than in its own city. Not only will it play there in a concert of its own on Saturday evening, Jan. 10, but also in two concerts, one in February, the other in April, arranged by the New School of Social Research.

On Thursday, Dec. 18, with Mr. Monteux conducting, the Paris Symphony Orchestra played Prokoffiev's Fourth Symphony for the first time in that city—the same Symphony, written for the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra, that Dr. Koussevitzky produced last November. The Russian filled the whole concert, with an overture, the "Scythian Suite," the second piano-concerto. The composer was pianist.

...inna, Inc.

House of Boston

...his Record and Music from

A Revolutionary Past

To a Religious

Present

Jans. Jan. 3

AN Italian mathematician, one Codazzi, thought that music can be composed with the aid of calculus: he is classed by Lombroso as an insane genius, along with those musicians who thought they were divinely inspired. Among the champions of the new musico-mathematical theology, only one—Stravinsky—has genius, and none is insane.

The case of Arthur Vincent Lourié (the insertion of the middle name is significant, for it emphasizes the Roman Catholic religion of the bearer—Russian Jews have but one given name) is interesting from the sociological rather than musical point of view, for, be it said at once, he does not possess a degree of creative power which would entitle him to the dignity of an individual composer. He is an extraordinarily gifted man, eclectic in his tastes, and just as vague in his musical expressions as in his general ideas. But, lacking in creative power, he has developed an acute sense for persuasive argument. He possesses the necessary literary technique to present his cause with seeming coherence. But the amazing hollowness of his fundamental concepts stands out all the more clearly. He battles in an empty air—and for a dialectician of his order it may be all he cares for.

Some time ago, Modern Music published Lourié's disquisition upon Melody as a theological virtue. It is a depressing document of mental sterility, a mesh of unsupported statements interwoven with Biblical quotations and theological references. "It is probable," he argues, "that in our time we do not compose good melodies because we have become evil-minded. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Our melodic gift is in direct ratio to our capacity for good, not in the sentimental but in the religious sense. . . . Melody in itself is a primary good, a sort of purification through repentance. . . . Melody is a virtue, organically connected with the three theological virtues, and therefore, its highest achievement lies incontestably in religious music, i. e., prayer." . . . This, printed in a publication devoted to Modern Music, may be a sign of the times. It must be said in full fairness, however, that a great deal of the sanctimonious stuff of the Russian original was cut out by the editor.

Who is this man deplores our evil minds? Whence his moralistic attitude? A preacher is often a repentant sinner, but we need not pry into this preacher's conscience; for his mind moves on such dialectical heights that they are not in contact with the worldliness of our own space and time.

Arthur Lourié was well known to the habitués of a Bohemian club, graphically called "Stray Dog," in St. Petersburg during the days of the war. It was a refuge for all unrecognized geniuses, and was always packed with people. Some of its frequenters, such as Vladimir Mayakovsky, the poet-suicide, and Arthur Lourié himself were to receive their official recognition at the hands of the Soviet Government.

Arthur Lourié was then a champion of the last word in music. As is his nature, he was an eclectic, open to conflicting influences,—Skriabin, Schönberg, early Stravinsky. Debussy paid a visit to the Russian capital (and to the "Stray Dog") at the beginning of the war; and a year or two later Lourié composed a Suite for Children ("Grand Piano in the Nursery") which is directly derived from Debussy's favorite devices (the rain-patter etc.). There were other compositions in a small form: "Rosary," a series of songs to Madame Akhmatova's poems; a String Quartet (written with sufficient clumsiness to attract attention); Three Sonatinas for Piano; a work with a long title in French: "Pleurs de la Vierge Marie. Fragment d'une chanson pieuse du XIII siècle. Pour Chant, Violon, Alto et Violoncelle, composé par Arthur Vincent Lourié, Petrograde MCMXV," and "Forms in the Air," subnamed "sound-script" and dedicated to Pablo Picasso. It is an exercise in fanciful typography, rather than in musical composition,—a series of arabesques languidly dropping from one staff-line to another, until the range of the piano is spanned. What there is of music suggests a caricature of Skriabin.

All these masterpieces would have never seen light had it not been for the October Revolution that threw the futurists into temporary power. And the dawn of the year 1918 saw Arthur Vincent Lourié, in a velvet jacket and a bow tie, establish his headquarters as Musical Commissar of the Department of Education. The Bolsheviks were then shunned by all "decent" people, and the intelligentsia boycotted the Government by means of a general strike. Lourié's "treason" was condemned, but it proved a blessing to his fellow-musicians. If, by duty of office, he had to sign unpleasant warrants for confiscation of pianos owned by the bourgeoisie, with the same pen he could restore the property to their owners as "tools of production." He was a great help to many, not excluding himself. As musical commissar, he had the State Publishing House print his futuristic pastiches, and at one time, when the paper shortage was great, he was the only publishing composer in all the Russias. He left for France as a representative of the State, but Paris caused in him a change of heart, and he settled there for good. The Soviet papers never mention his name in any connection. To them, he is just as good as a dead man, shot down according to the law.

It is very difficult to estimate the artistic deserts of Lourié's musical works. Being an indefatigable dialectician, he can temporarily create an impression of reality. He lacks talent, but he possesses a constructive mind capable of producing excellent imitations. Furthermore, being Stravinsky's intimate, he bears a certain weight with the musical world. In some respects he may exert an influence on the master himself; certainly he can supply argument in defence of Stravinsky's courses. And at times he gets ahead of Stravinsky in works such as the "Concerto Spirituale," produced by the Schola Cantorum of New York on March 26, 1930.

In fact it is his only work (discounting the early Cantata to Alexander Block's words, and a "Japanese Suite" for Orchestra) that deserves serious consideration. It is scored for a double-chorus, piano, brass and six double-basses. The Prologue for Solo Baritone accompanied by three trumpets, two trombones and tuba, is impressive, and the piano-cadenza is "just as good as Stravinsky." The idiom is necessarily diatonic (as opposed to the chromatic and ultra-chromatic infatuations of his youth); the writing is done according to the rules of mediaeval counterpoint, with all its futile clumsiness. The key of C major and its modal ramifications prevail. Of melodic invention there is, however, not a question. The general impression from one hearing is that of an austere, deliberately colorless work, to be performed at solemn occasions. A religious fanatic such, as the strange Nicolas Obouhov, hurling sounds and shouts out of the abundance of his heart, may be justified in the eyes of the world, for his is a natural aberration. Arthur Lourié knows no such ecstasies. His heart is empty.

NICOLAS SLONIMSKY

maiden name was Elizabeth Dorby, a error which has been copied by othe compilers.

783. 3. WARDWELL. B. L., Oct. 1
1930. William Wardwell of Boston, Pisca aqua, and Rhode Island, had by wi
Alice at Boston, among other childre Usal, baptized 7, 2m, 1639. (Usal War well was a carpenter of Ipswich, Mass where he married, May 3, 1664, Mar
Kinsman, daughter of Robert Kinsm a plausible deduction. [illegible] s with a mind but without an ear. Theorizing, he writes notes on music-paper. Having written them, he has but slight notion of how they will sound. Hence as speechless and sterile a music as Symphony Hall has heard in many a day.

Again the event of the concert was the performance of Strauss's tone-poem, "A Hero-Life"—tour de force by conductor and orchestra in which they excelled even their Friday prowess. Never before, it is safe to say, has "Ein Heldenleben" sounded so clear, manifold and puissant upon Bostonian ears. Two chance reactions lingered. It has become rather the fashion to depreciate our musical time, to call it relatively barren, to lament its lack of genius. Yet the forty years between 1890 and 1931 have yielded Strauss, Debussy, Sibelius and Stravinsky in the works of prime. The harvest does not seem scanty. Nor in the history of music are there many periods of equal span to excel it. . . . Second, some of us like to make our mental pictures of human power. Not many are comparable with the image of conductor and orchestra, full-panoplied, at some climax in a tone-poem of Strauss—say at the end of the proclamation of the hero in "Ein Heldenleben"; at the turn of the music of coquetry into the unfolding, upswelling love-song; at the sounding of the hero's motiv over the battle fought and won. So onward to the end.

Concert-Chronicle

Anniversaries

A CORRESPONDENT has opened a Dictionary of Musicians—by chance at the article, Mozart. In the second line she read: "Born at Salzburg, Jan. 27, 1756"—one hundred and seventy-five years ago. "An anniversary approaches," she writes in a discoverer's joy. The nearest Symphony Concerts are those of Jan. 23-24 and Jan. 30-31. Accordingly she implores Mr. Arbos at the one pair, or Dr. Koussevitzky at the other, "to remember Mozart."

Another correspondent reads a Parisian newspaper "regularly." From it he learns that Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" was a hundred years old last month. "Another centenary," he writes with an exclamation-point! "As a mark of respect," he would have the piece replayed at the Symphony Concerts before the season ends—the more because it has not been heard since the second year of Dr. Koussevitzky's reign. . . . So much for the "sense of the past," as it would work upon current concerts in the town.

WAGNER PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY HALL

Globe Jan 7

Dr Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in a Wagner program which was warmly applauded by the Tuesday subscribers. This was the conductor's last Boston appearance prior to his annual vacation. He will not conduct here again for three weeks to come. Meanwhile Henry Hadley and E. Fernandez Arbos will appear as guest leaders.

Yesterday's program was representative of both the early and the mature work of Wagner. The overture to "Rienzi," the Bacchanale from the revised version of "Tannhauser" prepared for the Paris performances in 1861, the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," the "Ride of the Valkyries," the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" were the chosen numbers.

The contrast between the sonorous trivialities of the "Rienzi" overture and the grandeur of the music from "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger" was startling, familiar as the distinction between early and later Wagner is to all concert goers. Those who claim on the strength of such careers as that of Mozart that musical talent manifests itself in adolescence, overlook such cases as Wagner's. Even with Mozart there is a gulf between the early piano sonatas and operas and the music of his last decade. But with Wagner there is nothing in the early work that foretells the splendors to come. If Wagner had died, like Schubert, at 31, he would now be forgotten.

Dr Koussevitzky's readings of all these numbers are already familiar to Boston audiences. He imparts to the music a personal eloquence, an individual dramatic emphasis which is nearly always impressive even when one is perfectly sure the performance is not at all what Wagner had in mind. Yesterday only the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," taken, except for the introductory pages, at a tempo strangely sluggish, failed to make an effect.

P. R.

MU

Herald Jan 7

Tuesday's Symphony

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the second of its Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony hall yesterday. The Wagnerian program comprised the overture to "Rienzi," the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser." The introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie," prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

This program was arranged as if it were intended to show the development of Wagner's operatic talent, though the Bacchanale, composed for the first performance in Paris at which the gentlemen of the Jockey Club whistled and otherwise misbehaved themselves, is of the later and more mature Wagner. From "Rienzi," which is poor Meyerbeer—with the overture noisily vulgar—to "The Mastersingers," was a great step—as great as Verdi's from his "Nabucco" to "Falstaff." Towards Meyerbeer, who was largely instrumental in obtaining the production of "Rienzi," Wagner showed his characteristic ingratitude, abusing him as a musician and a Jew. Tappert compiled a little dictionary of

The next concert of the series will against Wagner by musicians and critics. A dictionary of Wagner's ugly remarks about other composers and about men and women who had befriended him often with gifts of money would be equally entertaining.

Yet even in this vulgar overture to "Rienzi," with its circus pomp, there are hints at the greater Wagner to come, hints at "Lohengrin" and the better pages of "Tannhaeuser."

The music that followed yesterday was familiar to the great majority in the audience. Perhaps the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" was less known to some. The editor of the symphony's program books does not compile those of Tuesday afternoons. The compiler of yesterday's put the notes pertaining to the prelude to "Lohengrin" under the head of "Introduction to Act III." This text must have provoked amazement if one tried to reconcile the prose notes with the exultant music.

The hall was filled from floor to upper gallery. The applause was enthusiastic. And as usual, the louder the music, the louder the applause.

The next concert of the series will be on Feb. 10.

THIRD TUESDAY SYMPHONY

Post

All Wagner List Played at Matinee

If Dr. Koussevitzky in his apparent endeavor to instruct as well as to entertain the subscribers to the Tuesday afternoon Symphony concerts has given them thus far this season rather academic programmes, with two symphonies on each, he atoned for such severity at the concert of yesterday afternoon by offering an all-Wagner programme that might have served for a pension fund concert or the Sunday evening Pops.

Superficially this programme has followed the chronological order of the operas from which the excerpts performed were drawn. To be sure, "Tannhauser" was written between "Rienzi" and "Lohengrin," yet that opera was represented yesterday by the Paris version of the Bacchanale, composed some 20 years later than the opera itself. The programme, then, began with the overture to "Rienzi" and progressed to the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" by way of the aforesaid Bacchanale. These pieces made the first portion of the concert; after the intermission there followed the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkuere," the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

In all these pieces yesterday the orchestra gave a splendid account of itself, and almost without exception Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the music was to be commended and admired. Indeed, the only serious exception that might be taken was to his version of the Valkyries' ride, that to some has seemed always over-fast of pace and somewhat unnecessarily noisy.

It is hardly necessary to add that the audiences of yesterday received with great enthusiasm this programme of distinctly popular appeal.

Concert-Chronicle

Parisian Report

Trans Jan

RETURNED to Paris, Monsieur Prunières, the eminent writer about music and the performance thereof, is discoursing again—this time in Le Temps—about his autumn experiences in American concert-halls. The whole article, traversing the field from Boston to Chicago, will be reproduced in these columns on Saturday next. For the moment, here in free translation are three paragraphs about the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky: "There is a fertile rivalry between the Boston and the Philadelphia orchestras, between Serge Koussevitzky and Leopold Stokowski. They come in turn to New York with their orchestras, sometimes (sic) exchanging them courteously. Both are prodigious virtuosi of the baton. Koussevitzky is popular in France; but his concerts in Paris gave no true idea of the marvels that he accomplishes in Boston. To me his orchestra seems superior to the best in America. No words can express the splendor of the strings—power with no loss of velvet-like texture; brilliance without hardness; precise and edged attack yet never dry; exhaustless softness and sweetness in pianissimi. The brass and the woodwinds are not less admirable.

"The Bostonians play the classics in free-handed versions, in which much is left to the will and mood (fantaisie) of the conductor who inspirits them. With music of our own time, he is notably respectful of the composers' wishes. It was my good fortune to be present at the rehearsals of the new symphony written by Albert Roussel for the jubilee of the orchestra. I have rarely encountered a conductor so concerned with the exact conveyance of the intentions of the com- ... performance was beyond ... of Rous-

Continued on Page Thirteen

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Page Eleven

Stravinsky's Psalms

In winter mails from Europe have irritatingly intermittent and slow. Not until Saturday last arrived the following note from the London Times about the first performance of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" in Brussels on Dec. 13 last. "The Brussels Philharmonic Society held a two-days' festival at the week-end devoted to the works of Igor Stravinsky. It was attended by 4000 persons. The Psalm Symphony (sic), for mixed choir and orchestra, was given for the first time in Europe. This symphony was written by Stravinsky at the request of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by whom it was played during the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation. It is not a lyrical work of the cantata type, but a symphony sung and played at the same time, a symphony which finds in the text the basis for the musical development. . . .

"The Psalm Symphony was very well executed under the direction of M. Ansermet, the Swiss conductor, who is regarded as one of the best interpreters of Stravinsky's works. It is at once classical and modern. It is not lacking in grandeur, and the public received it very cordially. Stravinsky, who was present at the performance, was warmly acclaimed, and after the concert a reception was held in his honor, at which all the musical personages of Brussels were present."

Henry Hadley as Guest-Conductor

Trans Jan 15

Two New-Made Pieces on the Symphony Program for This Week

TO the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday comes Henry Hadley as guest-conductor for the first week of Dr. Koussevitzky's annual leave. Needless to repeat, he is a musician of national and international reputation, once fellows-townsman of metropolitan Bostonians. Following precedent at Symphony Hall, he sets a novel piece on his program, his own suite, "Streets of Peking." He spent last summer and autumn in China and Japan, in the latter country as guest-conductor of the Tokio New Symphony Orchestra. Visiting and travelling, he found time to record in tones his impressions of certain scenes and aspects of Oriental life. Life in Peiping, as viewed from its thoroughfares, became the specific subject. Mr. Hadley conducted the first performance of the new suite with the Tokio orchestra on Sept. 24, 1930. The first performance in the United States followed, under the composer's baton, with his own Manhattan Orchestra, in New York, Nov. 16, 1930. The suite has also been played in Chicago.

"Streets of Peking" is dedicated to the conductor of the Tokio New Symphony Orchestra, Viscount Hidemaro Konoye. The seven movements are all short—some exceedingly short. The first, for example, contains only twenty measures. It is entitled "Great Stone Man's Street," is dated in the score, Tokio, Sept. 8, '30. It is paced slowly, "Poco lento." Brass chords are answered by lively triplet figures in woodwinds. A violin theme soon emerges—and soon one is at the end of the twenty measures. The second is "Sweet Rain Street," written at Karuizawa, Japan, and dated Sept. 5. It is an Allegretto Scherzando for woodwinds, horns, strings without the double basses. There are delicate flute traceries, strings pizzicati, an oboe-solo in typical scherzo rhythm. There are harmonies that suggest conventional "Oriental" effects. Number Three is the Ricksha Boy, "Ma Ben." Musically he is an Allegro. His leit-motiv (if one may use the term) is the ricksha bell, which the score indicates parenthetically may be a bicycle bell. The movement is the most considerable thus far encountered. The burden is borne by a theme in the brass with figuration in woodwinds; by an expressive contrasting theme for English horn. The score confides no date of composition.

Number Four is "Jade Street"—in moonlight—moderato e tranquillo. Once more Mr. Hadley uses the smaller orchestra of some of the earlier numbers. "Jade Street" begins with fanciful, imaginative figures in flutes. It contains also a horn solo of importance. Number Five is "Shoemakers' Street," allegretto giocoso. Once more full orchestra. The percussive xylophones are given no little prominence in the principal theme. Again the turns of melody and harmony are of the kind long accepted by Western ears as Oriental Of course it would be a dull wit that did not associate the xylophones with the title of the movement. In neither of these two has the composer added a date.

Sixth comes "Sleeping Lotuses"—"slowly and dreamily" A duet for English horn and clarinet is prominent. Flutes add a decorative and gently colorful bit. This time we have a date line from the composer—Karuizawa, Japan, Sept. 1, '30. Final piece is "The Forbidden City," suitable climax to the suite. It is fully scored, energetically rhythmed. Slow brasses and more swiftly moving bells play a significant part. Once more appears the Westerner's Orientalism in harmonic color and in rhythm. Mr. Hadley follows neither Mr. Eichheim's methods as research-worker with native Eastern music; or the attempts of the most advanced moderns to uncover new shades of emotion that shall be particularly suggestive of an exotic subject. In language long known he writes seven pleasant little pieces. Their pleasantness is his reward.

From Mr. McKinley

In his program Mr. Hadley also includes Carl McKinley's tone-poem, "Masquerades," already played in Boston at a concert of the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music, and on "Conservatory night," last summer at the Pops. A year ago Mr. McKinley joined the faculty of the Conservatory. Further back, he was organist at the Capitol Theater in New York. While he held this position he wrote "Masquerades" for the orchestra of that theater. By a curious chain of circumstances it was played first by one of the symphony orchestras of that city, and not by the orchestra fro which it was destined.

"Masquerades" has no program more detailed than the title suggests. It is cast in a single movement for full orchestra. Three bits of material present themselves in the first few phrases: one forceful, "peppy"; a second gently melodic; the third in the intriguing waltz-figures of the past century. There are episodes—one of more sustained waltz-like character; another, more extended, suggested by the jazz of the day. In rhythm and in melody Mr. McKinley has drawn from this fountain of American idiom.

Like Mr. Hadley, Mr. McKinley has not joined those who attempt to extend the bounds of the art and science of musical composition. From the common store of musical resource he draws his material; in an aside adds to it from the popular music around him. If one can hear Strauss or Debussy or Rimsky-Korsakov in this score, it is not that Mr. McKinley has used these composers as models, but that they have contributed significantly to that common fund to which all but the experimenters and the innovators must have recourse. At long last, the analyst can no better sum up this piece than has the composer when he gave it for title—"Masquerades."

A. H. M.

As Henry Hadley Takes the Baton

Trans Jan 16

AT the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge last evening, Henry Hadley proffered a program of novelties—the same program which he will project at Symphony Hall this afternoon and tomorrow evening as guest-conductor during the vacation of Dr. Koussevitzky. Even the oldest number, Haydn's Symphony in E-flat, No. 1 in the Breitkopf and Härtel catalogue, is so infrequently heard as to produce an entirely fresh if not a particularly stimulating impression. Mr. Hadley's own "Salome," though more familiar to symphony audiences when tone-poems were more the fashion, has been neglected sufficiently of late to make it appear novel to the present-day listener. Still better deserving the term is Carl McKinley's "Masquerade" and Mr. Hadley's latest piece, "Streets of Pekin," bearing the recent date of September, 1930. A well-known figure to the public of Boston and suburbs, facile composer of long service and wide reputation, genial and particular leader of musicians, Mr. Hadley received a cordial welcome. He conducted with the authority and precision of a musician long accustomed to orchestral precedure. Angular but not ungraceful, he expressed his intentions with broad gestures of his arms and sweeping movements of his tall body. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was quite its accurate, responsive and polished self under his leadership, the musicians following his beat with ease and responding readily to the peculiarities of his leadership.

Principal interest in the occasion converged upon Mr. Hadley's new suite, "Streets of Pekin," and Mr. McKinley's "Masquerade." Haydn's early symphony was not inexpertly chosen as preliminary piece against which might be set to good advantage the two novelties. This is the symphony popularly known as "with the drum-roll." Even against the comparatively mild modernism of Hadley and McKinley, it is serene, inoffensive music and it must be admitted, rather dull throughout the greater portion of its length. It begins auspiciously with its drum-roll and prophetic introductory chords, but the subsequent measures of neat pattern-making appear, to contemporary listeners, not particularly inspired. There are two or three engrossing variations inthe slow movement, the trio of the minuet is delightful and the closing movement contains some stirring measures. Mr. Hadley read the score with straightforward accuracy with no attempt to discover fresh nuances.

Though it may be said that Mr. McKinley and Mr. Hadley ignore cert in trends of the time as regards orchestral composition, they are none the less individual and sincere in using the idiom which is more naturally their medium of expression. At one time organist in a New York theater and now member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, Mr. McKinley has observed at close range the fashion of the people's music outside the hallowed concert hall. By this is meant the music of the movie palace, the musical stage and jazz. "Masquerade" has some first-rate jazz. True, it is idealized jazz in the main, in a skilful and workmanlike transcription, but it is rough and earthy enough to be unashamedly toe-tickling at the same time. Orchestrally, it lithers and glints with the sheen that is the essence of present-day pleasure-seeking. Its honesty is one of its most engaging features. The young people of yesterday's audience enjoyed it immensely.

Continued on Following Page

As Mr. Hadley Leads

Continued from Preceding Page

This is scarcely the time to review Mr. Hadley's "Salome." Written in the idiom of Wagner and Strauss, but not necessarily imitative of these two composers, it became familar nearly twenty years ago. It serves now to cite the fact that even then Mr. Hadley was an adroit manipulator of orchestral effect, a skilled technician and a confirmed melodist, as he is today. The change in fashion is to him as well as to others who, through no fault of their own, found their creative faculties shaped by an earlier school, unfortunate.

"Streets of Pekin" is one of Mr. Hadley's most graceful and spontaneous works. Not so very long ago, the Symphony Orchestra produced in Sanders Theater Ravel's orchestra transcription of Musorgsky's much-admired "Pictures at an Exhibition." There is very little difference between the artistic concept of either piece. Both are descriptive pieces based upon external impressions. Ravel has used his orchestra in the way best known to him. Hadley, likewise, has used peculiar means, regardless of the practices of others. Though it may be said that his orchestral harmony reflects the Western idea of Chinese musical effect, no one has yet come forward with sufficient authority to successfully dislodge this idea. Personal impressions are legitimate in all art. Suffice it that "Streets of Pekin" has much material of objective melodic beauty, particularly in the case of the excerpt entitled "Jade Street." Harmony and orchestral color please the sensuous ear. We sometimes like to have our music please the sensuous ear. For which reason, yesterday's audience received Mr. Hadley's new piece with much enthusiasm.

N. M. J.

WAGNER PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY HALL

Globe Jan 7

Dr Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in a Wagner program which was warmly applauded by the Tuesday subscribers. This was the conductor's last Boston appearance prior to his annual vacation. He will not conduct here again for three weeks to come. Meanwhile Henry Hadley and E. Fernandez Arbos will appear as guest leaders.

Yesterday's program was representative of both the early and the mature work of Wagner. The overture to "Rienzi," the Bacchanale from the revised version of "Tannhauser" prepared for the Paris performances in 1861, the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," the "Ride of the Valkyries," the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" were the chosen numbers.

The contrast between the sonorous trivialities of the "Rienzi" overture and the grandeur of the music from "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger" was startling, familiar as the distinction between early and later Wagner is to all concert goers. Those who claim on the strength of such careers as that of Mozart that musical talent manifests itself in adolescence, overlook such cases as Wagner's. Even with Mozart there is a gulf between the early piano sonatas and operas and the music of his last decade. But with Wagner there is nothing in the early work that foretells the splendors to come. If Wagner had died, like Schubert, at 31, he would now be forgotten.

Dr Koussevitzky's readings of all these numbers are already familiar to Boston audiences. He imparts to the music a personal eloquence, an individual dramatic emphasis which is nearly always impressive even when one is perfectly sure the performance is not at all what Wagner had in mind. Yesterday only the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," taken, except for the introductory pages, at a tempo strangely sluggish, failed to make an effect. P. R.

MU

Herald Jan 7

Tuesday's Symphony

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the second of its Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony hall yesterday. The Wagnerian program comprised the overture to "Rienzi," the Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser." The introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie," prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

This program was arranged as if it were intended to show the development of Wagner's operatic talent, though the Bacchanale, composed for the first performance in Paris at which the gentlemen of the Jockey Club whistled and otherwise misbehaved themselves, is of the later and more mature Wagner. From "Rienzi," which is poor Meyerbeer—with the overture noisily vulgar—to "The Mastersingers," was a great step—as great as Verdi's from his "Nabucco" to "Falstaff." Towards Meyerbeer, who was largely instrumental in obtaining the production of "Rienzi," Wagner showed his characteristic ingratitude, abusing him as a musician and a Jew. Tappert compiled a little dictionary of

The next concert of the series will against Wagner by musicians and critics. A dictionary of Wagner's ugly remarks about other composers and about men and women who had befriended him often with gifts of money would be equally entertaining.

Yet even in this vulgar overture to "Rienzi," with its circus pomp, there are hints at the greater Wagner to come, hints at "Lohengrin" and the better pages of "Tannhaeuser."

The music that followed yesterday was familiar to the great majority in the audience. Perhaps the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" was less known to some. The editor of the symphony's program books does not compile those of Tuesday afternoons. The compiler of yesterday's put the notes pertaining to the prelude to "Lohengrin" under the head of "Introduction to Act III." This text must have provoked amazement if one tried to reconcile the prose notes with the exultant music.

The hall was filled from floor to upper gallery. The applause was enthusiastic. And as usual, the louder the music, the louder the applause.

The next concert of the series will be on Feb. 10.

THIRD TUESDAY SYMPHONY

Post

All Wagner List Played at Matinee

If Dr. Koussevitzky in his apparent endeavor to instruct as well as to entertain the subscribers to the Tuesday afternoon Symphony concerts has given them thus far this season rather academic programmes, with two symphonies on each, he atoned for such severity at the concert of yesterday afternoon by offering an all-Wagner programme that might have served for a pension fund concert or the Sunday evening Pops.

Superficially this programme has followed the chronological order of the operas from which the excerpts performed were drawn. To be sure, "Tannhauser" was written between "Rienzi" and "Lohengrin," yet that opera was represented yesterday by the Paris version of the Bacchanale, composed some 20 years later than the opera itself. The programme, then, began with the overture to "Rienzi" and progressed to the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" by way of the aforesaid Bacchanale. These pieces made the first portion of the concert; after the intermission there followed the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkuere," the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

In all these pieces yesterday the orchestra gave a splendid account of itself, and almost without exception Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the music was to be commended and admired. Indeed, the only serious exception that might be taken was to his version of the Valkyries' ride, that to some has seemed always over-fast of pace and somewhat unnecessarily noisy.

It is hardly necessary to add that the audiences of yesterday received with great enthusiasm this programme of distinctly popular appeal.

Concert-Chronicle

Parisian Report

Trans Jan

RETURNED to Paris, Monsieur Prunières, the eminent writer about music and the performance thereof, is discoursing again—this time in Le Temps—about his autumn experiences in American concert-halls. The whole article, traversing the field from Boston to Chicago, will be reproduced in these columns on Saturday next. For the moment, here in free translation are three paragraphs about the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky: "There is a fertile rivalry between the Boston and the Philadelphia orchestras, between Serge Koussevitzky and Leopold Stokowski. They come in turn to New York with their orchestras, sometimes (sic) exchanging them courteously. Both are prodigious virtuosi of the baton. Koussevitzky is popular in France; but his concerts in Paris gave no true idea of the marvels that he accomplishes in Boston. To me his orchestra seems superior to the best in America. No words can express the splendor of the strings—power with no loss of velvet-like texture; brilliance without hardness; precise and edged attack yet never dry; exhaustless softness and sweetness in pianissimi. The brass and the woodwinds are not less admirable.

"The Bostonians play the classics in free-handed versions, in which much is left to the will and mood (fantaisie) of the conductor who inspirits them. With music of our own time, he is notably respectful of the composers' wishes. It was my good fortune to be present at the rehearsals of the new symphony written by Albert Roussel for the jubilee of the orchestra. I have rarely encountered a conductor so concerned with the exact conveyance of the intentions of the composer. The performance was beyond praise. This Third Symphony of Roussel (which is surely his masterpiece) ascended skywards."

Continued on Page Thirteen

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Page Eleven

[illegible] with [illegible] Genealogy can only one interested [illegible] many years to get this information [illegible] been trying to get Tozer or Towzer. I have [illegible] married John Tozer of Sarah Pattee [illegible] days' festival [illegible] to the works of Igor Stravinsky. It was attended by 4000 persons. The Psalm Symphony (sic), for mixed choir and orchestra, was given for the first time in Europe. This symphony was written by Stravinsky at the request of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by whom it was played during the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation. It is not a lyrical work of the cantata type, but a symphony sung and played at the same time, a symphony which finds in the text the basis for the musical development. . . .

"The Psalm Symphony was very well executed under the direction of M. Ansermet, the Swiss conductor, who is regarded as one of the best interpreters of Stravinsky's works. It is at once classical and modern. It is not lacking in grandeur, and the public received it very cordially. Stravinsky, who was present at the performance, was warmly acclaimed, and after the concert a reception was held in his honor, at which all the musical personages of Brussels were present."

Henry Hadley as Guest-Conductor

Herald Jan 15

Two New-Made Pieces on the Symphony Program for This Week

TO the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday comes Henry Hadley as guest-conductor for the first week of Dr. Koussevitzky's annual leave. Needless to repeat, he is a musician of national and international reputation, once fellows-townsman of metropolitan Bostonians. Following precedent at Symphony Hall, he sets a novel piece on his program, his own suite, "Streets of Peking." He spent last summer and autumn in China and Japan, in the latter country as guest-conductor of the Tokio New Symphony Orchestra. Visiting and travelling, he found time to record in tones his impressions of certain scenes and aspects of Oriental life. Life in Peiping, as viewed from its thoroughfares, became the specific subject. Mr. Hadley conducted the first performance of the new suite with the Tokio orchestra on Sept. 24, 1930. The first performance in the United States followed, under the composer's baton, with his own Manhattan Orchestra, in New York, Nov. 16, 1930. The suite has also been played in Chicago.

"Streets of Peking" is dedicated to the conductor of the Tokio New Symphony Orchestra, Viscount Hidemaro Konoye. The seven movements are all short—some exceedingly short. The first, for example, contains only twenty measures. It is entitled "Great Stone Man's Street," is dated in the score, Tokio, Sept. 8, '30. It is paced slowly, "Poco lento." Brass chords are answered by lively triplet figures in woodwinds. A violin theme soon emerges—and soon one is at the end of the twenty measures. The second is "Sweet Rain Street," written at Karuizawa, Japan, and dated Sept. 5. It is an Allegretto Scherzando for woodwinds, horns, strings without the double basses. There are delicate flute traceries, strings pizzicati, an oboe-solo in typical scherzo rhythm. There are harmonies that suggest conventional "Oriental" effects. Number Three is the Ricksha Boy, "Ma Ben." Musically he is an Allegro. His leit-motiv (if one may use the term) is the ricksha bell, which the score indicates parenthetically may be a bicycle bell. The movement is the most considerable thus far encountered. The burden is borne by a theme in the brass with figuration in woodwinds; by an expressive contrasting theme for English horn. The score confides no date of composition.

Number Four is "Jade Street"—in moonlight—moderato e tranquillo. Once more Mr. Hadley uses the smaller orchestra of some of the earlier numbers. "Jade Street" begins with fanciful, imaginative figures in flutes. It contains also a horn solo of importance. Number Five is "Shoemakers' Street," allegretto giocoso. Once more full orchestra. The percussive xylophones are given no little prominence in the principal theme. Again the turns of melody and harmony are of the kind long accepted by Western ears as Oriental Of course it would be a dull wit that did not associate the xylophones with the title of the movement. In neither of these two has the composer added a date.

Sixth comes "Sleeping Lotuses"—"slowly and dreamily" A duet for English horn and clarinet is prominent. Flutes add a decorative and gently colorful bit. This time we have a date line from the composer—Karuizawa, Japan, Sept. 1, '30. Final piece is "The Forbidden City," suitable climax to the suite. It is fully scored, energetically rhythmed. Slow brasses and more swiftly moving bells play a significant part. Once more appears the Westerner's Orientalism in harmonic color and in rhythm. Mr. Hadley follows neither Mr. Eichheim's methods as research-worker with native Eastern music; or the attempts of the most advanced moderns to uncover new shades of emotion that shall be particularly suggestive of an exotic subject. In language long known he writes seven pleasant little pieces. Their pleasantness is his reward.

From Mr. McKinley

In his program Mr. Hadley also includes Carl McKinley's tone-poem, "Masquerades," already played in Boston at a concert of the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music, and on "Conservatory night," last summer at the Pops. A year ago Mr. McKinley o ned the faculty of the Conservatory. Further back, he was organist at the Capitol Theater in New York. While he held this position he wrote "Masquerades" for the orchestra of that theater. By a curious chain of circumstances it was played first by one of the symphony orchestras of that city, and not by the orchestra fro which it was destined.

"Masquerades" has no program more detailed than the title suggests. It is cast in a single movement for full orchestra. Three bits of material present themselves in the first few phrases: one forceful, "peppy"; a second gently melodic; the third in the intriguing waltz-figures of the past century. There are episodes—one of more sustained waltz-like character; another, more extended, suggested by the jazz of the day. In rhythm and in melody Mr. McKinley has drawn from this fountain of American idiom.

Like Mr. Hadley, Mr. McKinley has not joined those who attempt to extend the bounds of the art and science of musical composition. From the common store of musical resource he draws his material; in an aside adds to it from the popular music around him. If one can hear Strauss or Debussy or Rimsky-Korsakov in this score, it is not that Mr. McKinley has used these composers as models, but that they have contributed significantly to that common fund to which all but the experimenters and the innovators must have recourse. At long last, the analyst can no better sum up this piece than has the composer when he gave it for title—"Masquerades." A. H. M.

As Henry Hadley Takes the Baton

Globe Jan 16

AT the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge last evening, Henry Hadley proffered a program of novelties—the same program which he will project at Symphony Hall this afternoon and tomorrow evening as guest-conductor during the vacation of Dr. Koussevitzky. Even the oldest number, Haydn's Symphony in E-flat, No. 1 in the Breitkopf and Härtel catalogue, is so infrequently heard as to produce an entirely fresh if not a particularly stimulating impression. Mr. Hadley's own "Salome," though more familiar to symphony audiences when tone-poems were more the fashion, has been neglected sufficiently of late to make it appear novel to the present-day listener. Still better deserving the term is Carl McKinley's "Masquerade" and Mr. Hadley's latest piece, "Streets of Pekin," bearing the recent date of September, 1930. A well-known figure to the public of Boston and suburbs, facile composer of long service and wide reputation, genial and particular leader of musicians, Mr. Hadley received a cordial welcome. He conducted with the authority and precision of a musician long accustomed to orchestral precedure. Angular but not ungraceful, he expressed his intentions with broad gestures of his arms and sweeping movements of his tall body. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was quite its accurate, responsive and polished self under his leadership, the musicians following his beat with ease and responding readily to the peculiarities of his leadership.

Principal interest in the occasion converged upon Mr. Hadley's new suite, "Streets of Pekin," and Mr. McKinley's "Masquerade." Haydn's early symphony was not inexpertly chosen as preliminary piece against which might be set to good advantage the two novelties. This is the symphony popularly known as "with the drum-roll." Even against the comparatively mild modernism of Hadley and McKinley, it is serene, inoffensive music and it must be admitted, rather dull throughout the greater portion of its length. It begins auspiciously with its drum-roll and prophetic introductory chords, but the subsequent measures of neat pattern-making appear, to contemporary listeners, not particularly inspired. There are two or three engrossing variations inthe slow movement, the trio of the minuet is delightful and the closing movement contains some stirring measures. Mr. Hadley read the score with straightforward accuracy with no attempt to discover fresh nuances.

Though it may be said that Mr. McKinley and Mr. Hadley ignore cert in trends of the time as regards orchestral composition, they are none the less individual and sincere in using the idiom which is more naturally their medium of expression. At one time organist in a New York theater and now member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, Mr. McKinley has observed at close range the fashion of the people's music outside the hallowed concert hall. By this is meant the music of the movie palace, the musical stage and jazz. "Masquerade" has some first-rate jazz. True, it is idealized jazz in the main, in a skilful and workmanlike transcription, but it is rough and earthy enough to be unashamedly toe-tickling at the same time. Orchestrally, it lithers and glints with the sheen that is the essence of present-day pl a ure-seeking. Its honesty is one of its most engaging features. The young people of yesterday's audience enjoyed it immensely.

Continued on Following Page

As Mr. Hadley Leads

Continued from Preceding Page

This is scarcely the time to review Mr. Hadley's "Salome." Written in the idiom of Wagner and Strauss, but not necessarily imitative of these two composers, it became familar nearly twenty years ago. It serves now to cite the fact that even then Mr. Hadley was an adroit manipulator of orchest al effect, a skilled technician and a confirmed melodist, as he is today. The change in fashion is to him as well as to others who, through no fault of their own, found their creative faculties shaped by an earlier school, unfortunate.

"Streets of Pekin" is one of Mr. Hadley's most graceful and spontaneous works. Not so very long ago, the Symphony Orchestra produced in Sanders Theater Ravel's orchestra transcription of Musorgsky's much-admired "Pictures at an Exhibition." There is very little difference between the artistic concept of either piece. Both are descriptive pieces based upon external impressions. Ravel has used his orchestra in the way best known to him. Hadley, likewise, has used peculiar means, regardless of the practices of others. Though it may be said that his orchestral harmony reflects the Western idea of Chinese musical effect, no one has yet come forward with sufficient authority to successfully dislodge this idea. Personal impressions are legitimate in all art. Suffice it that "Streets of Pekin" has much material of objective melodic beauty, particularly in the case of the excerpt entitled "Jade Street." Harmony and orchestral color please the sensuous ear. We sometimes like to have our music please the sensuous ear. For which reason, yesterday's audience received Mr. Hadley's new piece with much enthusiasm. N. M. J.

100

DR. HADLEY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Plays Own "Salome" and "Streets of Pekin"

Post Jan 17

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky is now taking the well-earned fortnight's rest that it has been his custom to take in mid-season, therewith entrusting two pairs of Symphony Concerts to guest conductors. Thus the concert of yesterday afternoon, as will that of this evening, brought to the conductor's stand an eminent American musician who has more than once before presided, Henry Hadley.

TWO OF OWN WORKS

Since Dr. Hadley is composer as well as conductor, he not unnaturally likes to appear simultaneously in both capacities; hence yesterday under his baton a revival of his tone-poem, "Salome," last played here in 1907, and the first Boston performance of his new suite, "Streets of Pekin," seven short descriptive pieces, fruit of a recent visit to the Orient. To the classics Dr. Hadley paid his respects by placing at the head of his programme Haydn's seldom-heard Symphony in E-flat major, known in Germany as the "symphony of the drum-roll," and he recognized a younger colleague by playing after this symphony Carl McKinley's "Masquerade," a piece heard here in Boston twice last season, at a concert of the orchestra of the New England Conservatory, the institution where Mr. McKinley is now teaching, and at a Pop concert.

Mr. McKinley's piece has already been played by several of the major American orchestras and it is to be presumed that he had offered it to Dr. Koussevitzky. If that is the case, it is not altogether easy to see why Dr. Koussevitzky should have rejected it, especially since his eagerness to help the deserving young American composer is well known.

"Masquerade" Well Received

This "Masquerade" is not a particularly individual or original music. It is not important. But as a symphonic treatment of dance forms, from the waltz to the fox-trot, it is entertaining, gay and brilliant, and it "comes off." And if a choice is to be made between unimportant music which comes off and unimportant music which does not, the former is, from the listener's standpoint, much to be preferred, though Dr. Koussevitzky has given us plenty of the latter, domestic as well as foreign. "Masquerade" was well received by yesterday's audience, and from his seat in the balcony the composer was compelled many times to bow his acknowledgements.

In that it followed one of the less genial and inspired of Haydn's symphonies, "Masquerade" had yesterday a flattering setting. One of the 12 that Haydn wrote for his concerts in London, this symphony in E flat has been overshadowed by most of its companions. The most pleasing movement of the four is the Andante, with its recurring theme of folk-song character. Dr. Hadley conducted the symphony in straightforward fashion, yet it might be said that in the role of interpreter he did less for Haydn than for McKinley's music and for his own.

To come finally to Dr. Hadley's compositions, both the youthful tone-poem and the recent suite place the well-intentioned reviewer in the quandary wherein Dr. Hadley's music generally places him. It were idle to deny Dr. Hadley's mastery of every musical resource, as it were also idle to deny his possession of a certain gift for apposite and telling expression. There are glowing and seductive pages in "Salome," derived to be sure, like much music of the period of its composition, straight from Wagner. There are atmospheric and suggestive pages in the Chinese suite, an evocation of the spell and mystery of the East accomplished without recourse to bald thematic or instrumental literalism that, somewhat paradoxically, may quite easily fail of its purpose. Yet, with these compelling and arresting pages come measures that are undistinguished, platitudinous, even banal. There is much that is emptily bombastic in "Salome"; there are measures in the suite that stand not much above the level of tailor-made incidental music for stage-play or film.

Both compositions obviously pleased yesterday's audience, and at the close of the concert there was much applause for the composer-conductor.

Herald Jan 17

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

As Dr. Koussevitzky is taking a vacation of two weeks Henry Hadley, the conductor of the Manhattan orchestra of New York, was the leader yesterday afternoon. He will lead tomorrow night. The conductor of the concerts next week will be Enrique Fernandez Arbos. Mr. Hadley arranged this program: Haydn, Symphony No. 1 E flat major. McKinley, "Masquerade" (first time at these concerts). Hadley, "Salome," tone poem (after Oscar Wilde). Hadley, Suite "Streets of Pekin" (first time in Boston).

Mr. Hadley, cordially welcomed, was loudly applauded throughout the concert, as conductor; and in the latter part, as composer. He has had much experience as a conductor in cities of this country and of Europe; Buenos Aires, and Tokio are not foreign to him. It was a great pleasure to hear the Symphony by Haydn, a composer who is much neglected, and when attention is paid to him by conductors the Symphonies chosen are thrice familiar. Dr. Koussevitzky rejoiced the audience by bringing out the "Horn" Symphony. The one chosen yesterday is as fresh as if it were composed last year. It has vitality; it overflows with high spirits; here and there are passages that are singularly "modern"; harmonically and in mood. Mr. Hadley's interpretation was not perfunctory, as is too often the case when a conductor deigns to notice Haydn; nor was it too reverential. The music appealed to him; he knew what he wished for the performance; the orchestra sympathized with him; the result was delightful.

Mr. McKinley's "Masquerade" was played in Boston for the first time at a concert of the New England Conservatory of Music's orchestra late in 1929. Last June it was heard at a "Pop." concert. Composed in 1924, it waited a public hearing till it was performed in 1926 at a New York Stadium concert. It has been played by symphony orchestras of Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia, New York, Syracuse. The composer, born at Yarmouth, Me., in 1895, is now a member of the New England Conservatory's faculty. He disclaims any program or descriptive intention" for his "Masquerade." The title suffices.

This music is agreeable to hear, while it is playing, but it leaves no definite impression; it does not disclose marked individuality. When it breaks into what is loosely known as "jazz," the rhythms lead one to expect pages that are exhilarating, exciting. The hearer remains calm, and longs for a less refined, less genteel handling. After all, frank vulgarity in moderation, is not displeasing in compositions of this order. Not that a musical masquerade should be a tonal orgy, but it should quicken the pulse and stir the blood. Even the most refined composer should be able to let himself go occasionally, as Beethoven did at the end of the "Egmont" overture and in the finales of the "Eroica" and the Seventh Symphonies.

Hadley's "Salome" was performed for the first time in this country by the Boston Symphony orchestra in April, 1907. It was composed before 1905. It made a favorable impression when it was first heard here. The audience yesterday evidently enjoyed the various sections that tell in tones the story of Salome and John the Baptist according to Wilde, who invented the character of Salome (unnamed by the evangelists), having been fascinated by pictures, legends, tales and poems in which she is the dancing heroine. Mr. Hadley's tone poem was highly creditable to him at the time he wrote it. Frankly descriptive, it has picturesque pages. If there are measures that show the influence of the Strauss of the tone poems—even in Mr. McKinley's "Masquerade" there is a fleeting reminder of Till Eulenspiegel's impudence—there are many more that are Mr. Hadley's own. The dance section is not too deliberately oriental in character, which is a blessing, for there has been far too much pseudo-orientalism in music. When Mr. Eichheim gives us the real thing, bringing the native instruments with him, the effect is chiefly the gratification of curiosity—and this in spite of all his skill and taste as a musician.

Mr. Hadley conducted a series of orchestral concerts last September in Tokyo where his suite "Streets of Pekin" was first performed. There are seven short movements. There is no attempt to be rigorously, phonographically oriental. In fact, the Suite might easily bear another title. Occasionally a theme pops up that Mr. Hadley may have heard, as he sojourned in the east, but the treatment throughout the Suite is European-American. Two of the slow movements have genuine charm—especially the one with the expressive violoncello solo, beautifully played by Mr. Bedetti. These movements might as well have been entitled "Nocturne" and "Moonlight on the Hudson." The Suite is interesting; there are skilfully orchestrated pages. It is the work of a well-grounded musician who happened to be in the east and paid his compliment by giving his new work the title "Streets of Pekin," wtih sub-titles which would give the local color not to be found in the music itself.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Mr. Arbos has arranged the following program for next week: Corelli, [illegible]ing Cesar Franck, Symphony in D minor; Suite. De Falla; Suite from "El Amor Brujo;" Albeniz, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra" (arranged for orchestra by Arbos).

HADLEY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

McKinley's "Masquerade" and Hadley Pieces Heard

Globe Jan 17

Dr Koussevitzky is taking his annual midseason vacation. Yesterday's Symphony concert was conducted by Henry Hadley, as guest. Next week E. Fernandez Arbos will return as guest conductor. Mr Hadley's program yesterday included Haydn's E-flat Symphony, the one with the drum roll; a tone poem entitled "Masquerade," by Carl McKinley; Mr Hadley's "Salome," first performed in 1927, and his latest work, "Streets of Pekin," written in Japan last Summer.

Mr Hadley, born in Somerville in 1871, grew up and studied music in this city, though he has not lived here since the 1890s. He last appeared as guest conductor at the Boston Symphony concerts five years ago. In the meantime he has more than once conducted the People's Symphony as guest. He is now living in New York and conducting concerts by the Manhattan Symphony. A good deal of his music has been heard in Boston from time to time.

Mr McKinley, born in Yarmouth, Me. in 1895, and a graduate of Harvard, is now a member of the New England Conservatory faculty. His "Masquerade," whitten in 1924, has been played at the Pops in Boston and at series of orchestral concerts in a number of other American cities. It is, rather surprisingly, the first work of his to be played by the Boston Symphony.

Light Music

"Masquerade" has no program beyond that implied by the title. It is an ingratiating and lively piece of light music, written with gusto and discrimination. Mr McKinley has succeeded better than anyone else one can recall in securing from a symphony orchestra some of the effects many musicians admire in the best jazz bands. His "blues" are delightful. The style of the piece is not modernistic. He does not break rules and smash precendents out of any doctrinaire radicalism.

But despite the conventionality of the idiom and a few reminiscences, "Masquerade" is an original and agreeable piece, one that would bear repetition at these concerts far better than would some recent imported novelties by Lourie and others. Mr Hadley gave a sympathetic reading of McKinley's music and a spirited one of the familiar Haydn symphony. The audience liked McKinley's piece better than it likes most new pieces. The composer was obliged to stand repeatedly and bow in his place in the first balcony.

Mr Hadley's choice of program yesterday showed that it was as composer rather than as conductor that he wished to come before the Boston Symphony audience. His long experience and the resultant skill in orchestral routine left no difficulties in the way of his giving an authoritative interpretation of his own music.

Tone Poem

His "Salome," published in 1906, was finished before he saw Richard Strauss' opera, also based on Wilde's notorious play. If he had known that Strauss was writing a "Salome" he would doubless have selected a different topic for his tone poem. With the exception of the symphony, "Youth and Life," one felt that Hadley's "Salome" is the most interesting and the most successful artistically of his numerous compositions. Its style is sometimes turgid, sometimes too facile, sometimes reminiscent. But despite obvious faults, this tone poem was for 1906 an original and stimulating work. Nor has it in 1930 lost all its imaginative appeal.

The orthodoxy and conventionality characteristic of Mr Hadley's music are also shown in the new "Streets of Pekin," with its seven brief sections suggested by impressions of that city. The audience was pleased with the suave and piquant Orientalism of this score, not based on actual Chinese music, or on modernist technique, but on a tradition long familiar to Western ears. Even those who prefer Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" or Stravinsky's "Nightingale" as musical pictures of China cannot deny to Mr Hadley the mint of doing well what he set out to do.

P. R.

Symphonic Afternoon In Routine

TRANS. JAN. 17

Henry Hadley for Conductor, With His Own and Others' Pieces Drifting By

THERE are concerts to be discussed, praised, remembered. There are concerts to be discussed, blamed, forgotten. There are also concerts that merely drift past the best-intentioned listener; proceed in routine; leave no other trace behind. No long, annual series may altogther escape them. Now and then they recur in our Symphony Concerts, energized and manifold as Dr. Koussevitzky, above all his predecessors, keeps them. For the first time this season one such befell yesterday at Symphony Hall. "The master"—as the word goes in New York — is on winter "holiday." That is to say, he is devoting a fortnight, free from rehearsals and concerts, to the making of plans and the study of scores for the half year to come. Consequently a guest-conductor reigned in his place—and in this January of 1931, guest-conductors are hard to come by.

To these two pairs of concerts from which Dr. Koussevitzky is annually absent, it has become custom to invite, first, a notable composer who can also conduct in his own music; second, a notable conductor to set forth his specialties before a new audience. For some years past, such a composer—Honegger, Ravel, Glazunov—has been on tour in the United States, ready and waiting for invitation, possibly with a program slipped casually into his portfolio. His presence, his conducting, the excursion through his "works," were sure to make an event of his pair of concerts. This season, however, no eminent composer is spending the winter in the United States; while such Americans as Mr. Loeffler or Mr. Carpenter are too familiar figures to make an occasion, even if they had the inclination.

European conductors, on visit, are likewise few. The rising Russo-Parisian, Vladimir Golschmann, has "come out" to take over the St. Louis Orchestra for a few weeks—the particular week included in which, were he disengaged, Symphony Hall might have sought him. Mr. Fernandez-Arbos lately finished his annual term in St. Louis and is available for next week in Boston. Again, most conductors settled in America were out of the choice. They lead "union" orchestras; while the Boston Orchestra remains obstinately "non-union." Shall Mr. Stock, for example, risk a lasting grudge in Chicago for the pleasure and honor of a week in Boston? Not advisedly. From a field that was nearly empty, Symphony Hall finally picked Henry Hadley. He might pass for composer-conductor, having divided his working life between the two careers. He was Boston-born and bred. More than once he had been called to Symphony Hall. Like a prudent sailor, riding the musical seas these forty years, he has made and kept friends in every port. Wherefore he was guest at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon; will be such at the repetition this evening.

Now Mr. Hadley as conductor and composer is a highly respectable talent, of the sort that we good-natured Americans, almost always polite in the arts, take kindly and propulsively. The fortunate recipients of our tolerant good will hear or read no harsh words about themselves and their work; make their bows, gain their plaudits, go confidently along their way, with never a thought of troublesome self-criticism. If, heeding King Solomon, they are "diligent in business" and watch out for opportunity and connections, they gradually "arrive"; are finally taken for granted. In this agreeable position, as he turns into his sixtieth year, Mr. Hadley now finds himself. Nobody lifted an eyebrow of surprise when it was announced that he would be guest this week at Symphony Hall. Nor, visibly, did anyone toss hat in air. Yesterday he was welcomed to the stage with polite applause, mild and brief; at each reentrance renewed. The usual audience or seemly substitutes—was present in the usual numbers; sat tranquilly through a concert of the usual length, along the way improving its acquaintance with the daughter of Herodias, upon whom Mr. Hadley bestowed a tone-poem and the editor of the program-book an essay. At a quarter past four the company dispersed, stirred to neither approval nor demur. There had merely been another Symphony Concert.

Out of long experience, Mr. Hadley is routined conductor. As the stock phrase goes, he knows what he wants and the means wherewith to get it; while before him on Friday was an orchestra as sensitive as it is puissant, with the loyal Burgin, as concert-master, holding it to familiar mettle. Playing upon it, Mr. Hadley brought to pass a faithful, competent, smooth-surfaced performance of Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, the first of the London series. It was deficient, however, in felicity and finesse of detail; sensibility to tone and pace; feeling for substance and style; in the qualities by which more imaginative and finely strung conductors individualize such a piece, the composer and themselves. The audience, with Muck's Haydn, and Koussevitzky's, subconsciously in its ears and head, testified to less than its usual pleasure in such a piece.

With [illegible] own compositions, which filled half the concert, Mr. Hadley succeeded better. In matter and manner, his tone-poem, "Salome," is of the musical period in which he most flourished and with which he remains most in sympathy—the first decade of the century, twenty years back. Into the piece went the best of his invention, resource and imagination, to make a whole less calculated and put together than many another of his scores. If he wrote thoughtfully, he wrote also ardently. In these days of other fashions and a different goal in music-making, not a little of "Salome" sounds outmoded or conventional. Strauss himself, in a whole music-drama, has not been able to save Wilde's princess and her Jokanaan from semi-oblivion. Yet there are sonorities and delineative measures on Mr. Hadley's pages that still make their effect. The conductor-composer manifestly exhibits the tone-poem as his favorite and longest-lived child. Warrantably, it received the warmest applause of the afternoon.

The newest addition to the accumulated Hadleyana—the composer must be near, or have passed, his Opus 100—is a suite "Streets of Peking," travel-sketches and travel-notes set down in tones during a recent journey to the Orient. Mr. Hadley was not disposed to the research and assimilation with strange scales and instrumental timbres that have made Mr. Eichheim a curious and unique composer. Nor did the rhythms and colors of land and folk in the Far East touch his imagination as they touched, say, Rousseel. He saw and heard as tourist; wrote as competent and conventional musician. He would be atmospheric and glamorous, fanciful and moonlit; or large and sonorous; or else rattle in street-scenes and pleasant and humorous din. The common stock of music the world over yields him much. The common stock of Oriental color in the concert-hall okes it out. The harmonic and instrumental surfaces are wholly conventional. A more undividualized music were hard to imagine. In composition and in performance a lighter hand than Mr. Hadley's would have better served it.

Along with the Hadleyan Suite came another and more fortunate effort to make something out of nothing—"Masquerade," written by Carl McKinley, New Englander, now of the faculty at the Conservatory; in recent past variously played hereabouts. It is free in form; employs a full orchestra, plentiful in the percussive corner; has no more "program" than the single word of the title implies. A recognizable figure wanders up and down the staves, the orchestra and the listening imagination. As persistent a motiv undergoes sundry variations. Perhaps in the play with the figure and in the disguises of the theme, hearers are to find the title fulfilled. More apparent, and equally suiting it, are dance-rhythms—some out of the popular stock of the jazz age—handled elastically and amusingly, spangled with harmonic and instrumental color, Gruenberg-like, alive with sudden snaps and catches. Seemingly Mr. McKinley has a flair for that sort of thing in that sort of treatment. It may even be counted as offset to a tendency to remember, oftener than to invent, his materia musica. . . . Altogether, a better afternoon for the common stocks of music than for invention and individuality among American composers. Peace, and a long peace, to respectable talents.

H. T. P.

HENRY HADLEY IS GUEST AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

Henry Hadley, native of Somerville, one of America's foremost musicians, is the guest conductor of this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But this circumstance failed to make yesterday's matinee as stimulating as it should have been, and the reason lies in the mediocrity of the program.

Mediocre Haydn began this concert—Haydn of a Symphony in E-flat, last played at these concerts, apparently, before this respondent was born. What interest there was in its current performance was prompted not by the vitality of the musical ideas, which are, as a matter of fact, rather feeble, but by several unusual (for Haydn's day), factors in the form and instrumentation of the Symphony.

Next came Carl McKinley, teacher at the New England Conservatory, whose "Masquerade" received its first performance at these concerts, though it had been previously played in other cities and even here at the "Pops" concerts. The virtues of this score lay in its undoubted sincerity of emotion, in the scholarly, at times sonorous orchestration, in an occasional episode musically convincing. But the episodes themselves seemed to us too disconnected, most of the musical ideas too obviously rehashed from composers of the turn of the century, and even the "Blues" section not bound by any necessary ties of kinship with the rest of the score. The performance of this work, and the composer who was present, were heartily applauded.

To round out the program Mr. Hadley played two of his own compositions—"Salome," a symphonic poem and a Suite for Orchestra, "Streets of Pekin." The latter work, suggested by the composer's recent sojourn in the Orient, we found the most fertile in inspiration of any piece on the program.

Boston Symphony

For the first week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation, Henry Hadley, distinguished American conductor and composer, was invited to take over the podium and incidentally to set before the Boston public some examples of his own compositions. For the concerts of Jan. 16 and 17, therefore, Mr. Hadley arranged a program which was made up of Hadyn's Symphony in E flat (B. & H. No. 1), Carl McKinley's "Masquerade," and Mr. Hadley's Tone Poem, "Salome," and Suite, "Streets of Peking."

Mr. Hadley's musicianship and authoritative leadership are well known to audiences not only in the United States, but in Europe, South America and the Far East. With the coöperation of the splendid orchestral instrument lent to him by Dr. Koussevitzky, he obtained an excellent performance of the Haydn Symphony ("with the drum-roll"), and exhibited equal command of his forces in the works from American pens which filled the remainder of the program.

It was natural that interest should center in these indigenous works. Carl McKinley, a native of what is known in New England as "the State o' Maine," is now a member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, in Boston. "Masquerade" was written in 1924. It had been played twice previously in Boston, but not before "at these concerts." The composer says that it is "without program or descriptive intention other than that implied in its title." He has employed a large orchestra to restate very competently certain musical truths which first were discovered variously in Vienna and in Harlem.

Mr. Hadley's tone poem, after Oscar Wilde's tragedy, has been played many times since its first performance in Boston under Dr. Muck in 1907. The work was composed, as the program notes pointed out, before Strauss's opera on the same subject was produced at Dresden, and was completed before Mr. Hadley was acquainted with Strauss's score. It is evident, however, that it had not been completed before certain other European musical masterworks had been made known to the world. But originative artists are rare, and it was perfectly proper that Mr. Hadley should tell his story in the musical language which 25 years ago was commonly current.

The "Peking" Suite was composed no earlier than last September, while Mr. Hadley was serving as guest conductor of the Tokyo New Symphony Orchestra. It has been heard in Tokyo, in New York and in Chicago. There are seven divisions, descriptive of contrasted scenes of city life in the East. The idiom is effectively Oriental in the Puccinian style, though some of the atmosphere comes from no farther away than Paris. The most interesting of the sketches is the fourth, called "Jade Street (Moonlight)." Here with strings, flute and horn, the composer has conveyed impressions of loveliness.

NUARY 17, 1931

Mr. Hadley was cordially received at the Friday concert, and at the close there were mutual congratulations between conductor and orchestra.

L. A. S.

From Symphony Hall

Dr. Koussevitzky now plans to include Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica"—music in which he excels—in the Symphony Concerts of Jan. 23 and 24, when he returns to Symphony Hall Before long also, he will find room for his promised and awaited repetition of Sibelius's Seventh Symphony.

Returning to Symphony Hall for a concert on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 1, Mr. Heifetz announces this program of violin-pieces:

The Lark ..... Castelnuovo-Tedesco
(Poem for Violin in Rondo form)
Scottish Fantasia ..... Bruch
Romanza ..... Auer
(In Memory of Mr. Heifetz's Master who Died last Summer)
Waltz in A minor ..... Schubert-Achron
Fragment from the Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue "The Afternoon of a Faun" Debussy
Gypsy Dance ..... Halffter-Heifetz
Tzigane ..... Ravel

Reported subscriptions to the annual guarantee fund for the Symphony Concerts now touch $58,694. The sum asked by the trustees of the orchestra is $100,000. The distance to go is considerable.

Concert Chronicle

Stravinsky: His Psalms

At the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra and a chorus from The Cecilia will repeat Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony," first heard here last December, soon to be conveyed to New York. This week the New Republic prints a piece about it written by Paul Rosenfeld. In the article are two or three salient paragraphs:

"The 'Symphonie de Psaumes' is not only the livest piece Stravinsky has produced since the 'Symphonies for Wind Instruments.' It is the old Stravinsky: of the robust blood of the big ballets towering like red girders in the sky of impressionistic music. It is the old orgiastic, barbaric brother, even though the fashionable, Thomistic dedication 'To the Glory of God' suggests the unhappy Johnny-on-the-spot 'modernity' of his neo-classic things. The rhythms are pulsating, brusque, exciting. The tonality is high, penetrating, shrill: piccolos, brass, drums in boldest combinations. The thematic substance and the melodic line are strong and individual, of a piece with the rigid, monotonous, strangely pleasing material of 'Renard' and 'Les Noces.' A certain priestly aristocracy controls the music, perhaps in harmony with its devotional character. But not a tinselly paste one; and there is no farrago of Bach and Clementi. The work is affecting both in the choruses and the interludes.

"Whether the symphony is the equal of 'Les Noces' and 'Le Sacre' we cannot say. Perhaps not: it appears a little thinner than these, to be ranged with 'Renard' and 'The Story of the Soldier' and the 'Symphonies for Wind Instruments.' The communication of new aural and emotional experiece is none the less positive. There is nothing fortuitous in the fact that the verses given the chorus are taken from the Twenty-eighth, the Thirty-ninth and the One Hundred and Fiftieth Psalms. The music indeed is a gush of waters in the waste land, the end of a barren period, and called for such words."

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week on Feb. 27 and 28:

Entr'acte from the Opera, "Gwendoline", Chabrier
Symphony, No. 2, in C major ..... Hill
(New: First Times)
Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra, Beethoven
(Violinist: Mr. Heifetz)
Overture to Goethe's Play, "Egmont" .Beethoven

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary matinée of the Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday next in Symphony Hall:

Tone-Poem, "Finlandia" ..... Sibelius
Symphony, No. 7, in One Movement ... Sibelius
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor ..... Chaikovsky

New—from Mr. Arbos

To the Symphony Concerts of the week-end Mr. Arbos, guest-conductor of the moment, brings, as he did two years ago, arrangements of his own from the dances of Albeniz's "Iberia." This time they are "El Albaicin" and "Navarra." Of "Iberia" Carl Van Vechten wrote in The Garret: "These pieces, without exception, are all masterpieces of piano-literature. More; they are the corner-stone, the Koran, of the modern Spanish school. They are the dances and songs, the sights and sounds, of the peninsula, translated with peculiar felicity into the language of the piano, which Albeniz has even successfully extended for his purposes. In rhythm, in emotion, in harmony, in the final content, and in their polyphonic complexity they are almost unique." One may add that in the orchestral dress given some of them by Mr. Arbos they are as felicitously treated.

"El Albaicin" has been praised more than many of the others. The composer's direction is "Allegro assai, ma melancolico." It would suggest the gypsy quarter at Grenada. Debussy said that "in it one discovers the fragrance of the blossom-filled nights of Spain." In an article on Albeniz in The Musical Quarterly Edgar Istel writes of the "guitar figurations and the melodic peculiarities of the canto jondo, which give this movement its specific character." The canto jondo is the profound, often tragic, cantilena of ancient, traditional Andalusian folk-music. In "El Albaicin" the middle section is derived directly from it. Throughout the piece there are many effects suggestive of guitars. Mr. Van Vechten discovers "an old gypsy woman singing a plaintive melody— 'Wanderlust,' wildness and woe—the dirty, gypsy tents, poverty, the life of Bohemians."

"Navarra" was left incomplete by Albeniz. Déodat de Sévérac completed the version for piano, which Mr. Arbos has scored for orchestra. It is a bravura fantasia on a jota theme. The jota, of Moorish origin, is one of the most popular of Spanish song-dances. Every province has its own jota, but the most famous are those of Aragon, Valencia and Navarre. (The title of the present piece indicates its origin.) The jota is a kind of waltz, but with much more freedom. The man and the woman face each other, using castanets; advance and retreat aggressively, as if in combat. Such couples sometimes form a circle. There is no suggestion of voluptuousness, but rather a militant spirit. Nevertheless, in the twelfth century, Alben Jot, from whom the dance takes its name, was routed out of Valencia because of his "licentious" singing. He found refuge in Aragon.

A. H. M.

The American and The Spanish Scene

As a Guest from Madrid Notes The Contrast in Ways With Music

SAID Enrique Fernandez-Arbos, conductor of the Royal Orchestra in Madrid, to be guest-conductor, for a second time, at the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Saturday:

"The chief drawback in America to the encouragement of a genuine love for and appreciation of good music lies in the fact that music is encouraged in the young only up to the age of fifteen or sixteeen. They are given music lessons, —indeed huge sums are spent on music lessons. They are given educational concerts unknown anywhere else in the world. Then their musical education is finished at the time when it should be continuing, since America has the finest orchestras in the world today. But how many young people do you see in concert audiences? Very, very few.

"Americans, who have somehow kept alive their love for music, get back to it when they are forty-five or fifty, but all those intervening years have been spent —how? In business and sports, chiefly. You see, when the American adolescent gets to high school, and later to college, he is expected to give his energies to sports. Anglo-Saxon countries make a god of sports! At the same time he prepares himself for business or a paying profession. But to be an artist in music is hardly considered for a life-work, because of the prevailing tradition that there is something shameful, feminine and impractical about a career in the arts. So it is not easy for a talent to be brought to maturity here. At an important age in development it is too often crushed under this system in which music is encouraged up to high-school or college age then dropped.

"In Europe young people are raised to revere the arts and to enter them if their talents warrant. When I have visited colleges in America I have found the schools of music quite separate from the other schools—in the minds of the students. School concerts are not regarded as important, like games. In high schools I have found the teaching of the ukulele and the banjo emphasized for the school orchestras. What they were needing greatly was to learn to read and to interpret music, to sing the best things in choirs. . . . And another reason for this condition in music is that in America the generations are separated, whereas in European countries they mix, going together to parties, concerts, plays. Here the social life of the young is confined to the young. I cannot understand it, unless it is that the older generation is not interested in the things vital to the young.

"In Spain the working classes—farmer and farm-hand, laborer, skilled worker, clerk—support music; while the well-to-do are indifferent. In America the wealthy are its support. In the tours of our orchestra through Spanish towns, many having a population of only five thousand, the whole populace turns out for the concert. They escort the orchestra with cheers through the streets. Often the concert is given in the bull-ring to accommodate the large numbers. Those people, many of whom do not wear shoes to the concert, instinctively know what is good in music. Their opinions, freely expressed, are independent and honest. They feel beauty. The Spanish peasants like Bach, Wagner, Beethoven. They prefer Bach to the more emotional Chaikovsky. They like the moderns—Debussy, Ravel, Stravinsky. They like the American moderns, like Bloch and Carpenter.

"And how they express their likes and dislikes! Sometimes I never hear the end of a piece, as the audience is on its feet, shouting and applauding. Now they have their bands, and are playing composers they never heard of twenty years ago, like Ravel and Strauss. Every town in Spain has formed a Philharmonic Society, with a number of subscribers who pay a dollar or two a month with which to defray the expenses of visiting orchestras. It is not a business enterprise but is managed without pay by lovers of music. All the money goes to the musicians."

T. Z. W.

ARBOS AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Receives Ovation for His Reading of Franck

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Many years ago concert-master at the Boston Symphony Orchestra and much more recently guest conductor at a pair of Symphony Concerts, Enrique Fernandez Arbos returned to Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, to direct this week's concerts in the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky. Well received throughout the afternoon, Mr. Arbos was accorded what might be described as an ovation after the Symphony of Cesar Franck, which completed the first half of the programme.

WARMLY RECEIVED

Occasionally audiences restore, if they often shatter, one's faith in human nature. There have been more exciting, more sensational performances of Franck's Symphony at Symphony Hall, performances far better calculated to sway, to arouse, to inflame the susceptible hearer. Yet not within long memory has that symphony been received so warmly as it was received yesterday.

Familiar as it is and clear as it is today, the Symphony of Franck proves often a stumbling-block to conductors. Some, taking their cue from the idolatrous attitude of Vincent d'Indy, endeavor to read into the music the mysticism and other-worldliness of "Father" Franck the man. Others again, following the implications of the printed page, produce a version of the music which, to quote an inspired commentator, might be described as a blend of the sentimentality of Gounod and the theatricality of Liszt.

Reminds Some of Gericke

But Franck's Symphony has no need to be regarded, on the one hand, as music of the cloister nor, on the other, to be set forth as music of the boudoir and the footlights. Read and played simply as music, without exaggeration, over-emphasis or pose, it makes, as it made yesterday, its fullest effect and appeal. It were difficult to decide, in commenting on the interpretation of Mr. Arbos, which to stress first, the unfailing rightness of his tempi, his lucid exposition of the music's structure, his ability to seize upon significant detail without doing violence to the larger concept, or his unfailing feeling for a euphony that steadily charmed the ear yet never once cloyed. After the performance of yesterday one enthusiast was heard to declare that the Symphony had not so sounded in that auditorium since the distant days of Wilhelm Gericke.

For the rest, Mr. Arbos introduced to Boston yesterday a suite of three pieces for strings, arranged by one E. Pinelli from the sonatas of Corelli, and also the conductor's own effective transcriptions for full orchestra of two piano pieces of Albeniz, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra." Between Franck's Symphony and these last-named pieces there came the familiar suite from De Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," to be seen on the stage of the Opera House next Wednesday evening.

Corelli a Master

Corelli's music, anticipating now that of Bach, now that of Handel, and now that of the later Italians, yet having, withal, an individuality of its own, gave much pleasure. No mere pioneer was Arcangelo Corelli, but a master in his own right.

De Falla's music, perhaps the most significant that has come out of modern Spain, was sympathetically interpreted by his gifted countrymen. Beside it the music of Albeniz seemed of the conventional, the parlor Spain, though "Navarra," recalling a little Chabrier's brilliant "Espana," made an effective final number and brought forth warm applause.

ARBOS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Cesar Franck Symphony Brilliantly Performed

Enrique Fernandez Arbos conducted yesterday's Symphony concert as guest, in the absence of Koussevitzky, who is taking his customary mid-season vacation. The noted Spanish conductor was applauded with unusual warmth for his remarkably subtle and brilliant reading of Cesar Franck's symphony. De Falla's suite from his ballet "El amor brujo," a suite by Corelli, and two piano pieces by Albeniz, admirably transcribed for orchestra by Mr Arbos were the other numbers. This concert was one of the most enjoyable of recent seasons.

Mr Arbos, recalled by most of yesterday's audience from his appearances as quest conductor in 1929, was remembered also by the elder generation as having been for the season of 1903-4 concert master of the Boston Symphony under Gericke. He is conductor of the Madrid Orchestra, and has made many appearances as guest in Europe and the United States.

Suite by Corelli

The little suite by Corelli with which the concert began was arranged by Pinelli from a collection of violin sonatas. It is new to Boston. The opening sarabande is unusually beautiful. The other movements heard yesterday, a gigue and a badinerie, are less remarkable. Mr Arbos' flexible rhythm, his sensitive phrasing, his feeling for lightness and brightness of tone made his reading notable. A violinist himself, he got the violins in the orchestra to play more gracefully, more deftly, than is their present habit. A musician of the first order, Mr Arbos adds to impeccable taste imaginative intensity.

These qualities were even more strikingly exemplified in the performance of the Franck symphony which followed, a performance that was the best given here in many seasons. This symphony, regarded 40 years ago as unpleasantly modernistic, has become, with the passage of time one of the best liked works in the entire orchestral repertory. It is now suffering the fate of most popular classics, and meeting the dislike, even the scorn, of the youthful musical intelligentsia.

One must concede that Franck's habit of ceaseless modulation sometimes degenerates into a mannerism, and that some of the climaxes, especially in the first movement, can be made to sound bombastic and vulgar.

Mr Arbos, who obviously loves and understands this symphony, contrived to bring out all its beauties and minimize its defects. Yesterday's audience was thrilled beyond its wont by listening to a masterpiece eloquently yet reverently interpreted. He never obtruded his personality between the listener and the music.

Brilliant Ballet Music

As a Spaniard, Mr Arbos obviously has special qualifications for interpreting the music of his own country. Its rhythms fascinate, yet too often baffle foreign musicians. In De Falla's brilliant ballet music, and in his own even more sonorous and brilliant arrangements of Albeniz, Mr Arbos showed a master's command of rhythm. Here, one felt, was the true Spain; here, and not in Bizet's "Carmen," Chabrier's "Espana," or Rimsky Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." These sinuous, swaying rhythms, phrase balancing phrase with no hint of metronomic rigidity, were fascinating.

The orchestra has never sounded better than it did yesterday. Mr Arbos likes brilliant, sonorous tone, but he obviously detests overplaying, excessive loudness, blatant brass and other tonal exaggerations. His long and varied experience as a conductor has made him able to impose his will on an orchestra easily and successfully.

His absorption in his task of conducting, his freedom from any hint of self-consciousness or affectation, compelled respect and liking. One hopes he will appear in Boston more often in future.

Dr Koussevitzky will conduct next week a program including a new introduction and allegro by Elgar, Sibelius' Seventh Symphony and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

P. R.

102

1931 Herald Jan 24

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Enrique Fernandez-Arbos, as a guest, conducted the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Corelli, Suite; Franck, symphony in D minor; De Falla, suite from the ballet-pantomime, "El Amor Brujo"; Albeniz, two pieces, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra," piano pieces transcribed for orchestra by Mr. Arbos.

Corelli was known to the symphony audience by his "Christmas" concerto. The suite played yesterday consists of a Sarabande, a Gigue and a Badinerie, a term equivalent to juggling or foolery, a term found in a concerto by Bach. Ettore Pinelli, a Roman musician of note, took these movements from a book of Corelli's sonatas, and showed taste in the selection. How much he did to the original music is unknown to us, but there is fidelity to the old grace and spirit; there is no attempt at impudent modernization, fortunately; for the music is charming in its simplicity—the Sarabande with its simple tenderness; the Gigue, fresh and sparkling, not overlabored and spun out as is too often the case in Bach's movements of this nature; the Badinerie precisely what the title indicates. Mr. Arbos gave the necessary nuances with a fine regard for the spirit of Corelli's period, and did not try to give undue importance by overconducting. How beautiful this old music is! What a spell it works, and by what simple means! The trouble with so many of contemporaneous composers is that they cannot write simply, for they have few musical ideas; so they are forced to follow the frog in the fable, or they strive to startle an audience by desperate endeavors to be original, thinking that they will be like Offenbach's Archduke Ernest:

"Original! Original!
Combien je suis original!
Non rien n'est plus original,
Qu'un Archiduc original!"

And that the hearers will shout in chorus:

"Oui, c'est un original!"

In Mr. Arbos's reading of Franck's symphony many features of the detail, features in the thematic development were brought out, but not in a manner to check the musical flow; not as if certain passages—revealed clearly to the audience for the first time—were so many digressions, but as if they were illustrations, comments on the treatment of the fundamental ideas; and so the ultimate triumph of faith over the torments of doubt was all the more glorious. The performance was thus poetically dramatic; the drama was that of the questioning soul. Too much stress has been put on the singular goodness, the child-like innocence of Franck's character. It has been wisely said that in the soul of every saint, evil lurks. Blessed is the holy man that realizes this; thus is he humanized! It is curious that when Franck tried to portray evil, when the hosts of hell were supposed to be wicked in song, as in "The Beatitudes," he only was conventionally operatic in Meyerbeer's worst manner. The mental struggle between doubt and faith inspired the composer of the symphony. No wonder that after the performance of yesterday the orchestra joined the audience in tumultuous applause.

Excellent as was the performance of De Falla's music, an interpretation arresting through the understanding and the fire of the composer's friend and countryman, it still holds good that ballet music, whatever its intrinsic worth, suffers by separation from the action. The reading yesterday was splendid in vitality, dash and color, but the music would have been thrice as significant if it had served to emphasize the strange drama on the stage.

It is fortunate for Albeniz that he is not known by his own orchestration of the pieces in "Iberia." Mr. Arbos urged Albeniz to arrange them for the orchestra, but in the two that were ready for performance the composer showed little skill. It was meet and proper that Mr. Arbos himself should undertake the task. The symphony audience heard "La Fete-dieu a Seville" and "Tirana" two years ago when the transcriber was a guest conductor. Yesterday it heard "El Albaicin" and "Navarra," the first from "Iberia"; the second a posthumous work which was left unfinished. Deodat de Severac completed it for the piano, but his musical nature was not en rapport with that of the Spaniard. Mr. Arbos in his arrangement completed "Navarra" as a Spaniard should. It is not probable that any other countryman was the man for the task; Mr. Arbos has a peculiar gift for orchestration. He is master of finesse as well as gorgeous coloring. And so yesterday the music of Albeniz seemed the soul of Spain—the Spain of the Moors and the gypsies.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts to be conducted next week by Dr. Koussevitzky will comprise: Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for Strings"; Sibelius's symphony No. 7, and Strauss's Symphonia Domestica.

Symphony

A Friendly Symphonic Afternoon

Mr. Arbos, as Guest, Prevails in Franck's Symphony And Spanish Pieces

Trans Jan 24

CYNICUS has invented a new wisecrack. Through the intermission, at the Symphony Concert on Friday, he was busy circulating it. The audience, he said, and not Dr. Koussevitzky, had gone on vacation. Every one knew that the conductor was working in his study at the programs for the Bach Festival and other plans for the second half of the season. Through a fortnight he had "passed up" rehearsals and concerts, only to busy himself with scores. Whereas an appreciable part of the usual audience was taking a second Friday holiday. Look around anywhere, and familiar figures were missing; while up in the second balcony there were rush-seats standing empty.

The subscribers in presence—Cynicus rattled on—were clearly in vacation mood. Last week they had lolled through Mr. Hadley's array of his own and other masterpieces; while today they had settled back in their chairs to hear a comfortable performance of Franck's familiar Symphony; only to be aroused by Mr. Arbos's well-placed fervors. Cynicus himself had picked the half-hour to listen with one lobe of such brain as he has; while with the other he chose the family guests for a supper-party he is soon giving on his sister-in-law's birthday. The conductor's vigors detached him from that pious task and he had joined in the tumult of applause that crowned the performance. Cynicus, who migrated from New York twenty-five years ago, had clapped the louder, because he had overheard someone calling Mr. Arbos "our old and esteemed friend"—in the "most patronizing Boston manner."

The gentleman from Madrid is indeed rather more than "our old and esteemed master" [illegible] turn [illegible] ears [illegible] hing [illegible] ting [illegible] In [illegible] ead- [illegible] from our eminences of the baton. Before them the composers outspread scores. In front of them the orchestra sits ready to do their bidding. Behind them we of the audience await the illumination of the masterpiece in hand by the light of their personalities. (If sometimes it turns out to be a darkening of the composer's counsels, never mind. All "right-thinking" people take genius as they find it.) In contrast, Mr. Arbos is a paragon of faithful, honest, straightforward conducting. Clear-minded musician, he reads the score on his desk as the composer set it down. Practised conductor, he transmits it to hearers without a thought of "filtering it through his own personality." When the orchestra is as sympathetic as it was yesterday, the transmission is the richer. (Mr. Burgin had no need to spur his mates as he did a week ago.)

For those who would have the conductor mirror to the composer, there is usually no more truthful glass—Toscanian finesse aside—than Mr. Arbos. His modesty and poise likewise commend him. Of late years, on his travels, he has been quiet apostle of the older and younger Spanish composers. But he does not overload a program with their works; while one, yesterday, long since gained international recognition — de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer." When he is himself transcriber for orchestra, as he was now with two piano-pieces by Albéniz, the record on the program-sheet suffices. He is all for Albéniz in a new dress, as little as may be for himself as dressmaker. He has, besides, piquant ways longer to be remembered than a deal of "personality." Who that watched him on Friday will forget the little springs into the air with which he emphasized to the orchestra the swift, sharp changes of rhythm in de Falla's ballet?

Yet Mr. Arbos, like the rest of us, can be unobtrusively in the fashion. Time was when a classic or a modern overture began symphonic programs. Now the mode is an eighteenth-century piece—concerto or suite, as often as not for string choir. Mr. Arbos's choice lighted upon a suite of three movements, assembled and arranged from sonatas of Corelli. The first was a Sarabande, slow-paced, grave and songful; the second a lightly accented gigue; the third, the orchestral chit-chat and sport with figures that the day named "badinerie." The suite was not Bach, father or sons; no more was it Handel. It was not even the later and luscious Vivaldi. Instead, it gave a quiet pleasure of its own. Invention was not Corelli's strong point; nor could he compass vivid and stirring polyphony. By exception in his Roman day, he had skill and what we should now call "feeling" for instrumental voices. For its time Corelli's Sarabande is uncommonly rich-textured; while in the finale he is making play not only with figures but also with the contrasts of brighter and darker strings. The texture and the timbres were both the gainers by the tone of Dr. Koussevitzky's choir.

Nor could Mr. Arbos resist the fashionable temptation to dramatize Franck's intrinsically contemplative Symphony. It is not necessary to believe with the elderly people who "enjoyed" the war (because it brought them excitement) that Germans are the authors of all evil; but certain it is that Dr. Muck set that fashion at Symphony Hall. Not even Dr. Koussevitzky, who dramatized first, last and nearly all the time, outdid him in the apocalyptic, and also sonorous, proclamation of the triumphant chief motiv in final progress toward the heavenly heights. Then and there Mr. Arbos kept brass choir and strings within plausible bounds. He no more than saw Franck facing, elate, the sun of righteousness.

Rather, the Arbosian specialty was the rhythming of this motiv whenever it entered emphatically or in climax as though Stravinsky himself had written it, as though the orchestra of "Le Sacre" were sounding it. All of which, it is permissible to suggest, is a bit far from "Father" Franck hearing the trumpets of beatitude as he mused in the organ loft of Sainte-Clothilde; or from the Franck who, with this motiv, speaks nobly of the soul. Mr. Arbos, however, departs pardoned, as becomes a guest. From his hand, ear and true divination the second movement sang itself out of a troubled sadness into ingenuous and tender beauty. Therein, for these measures, is the Franckian essence. Not a trace of symphonic "theater" marred or distorted them.

Now and again in the Spanish pieces, Mr. Arbos's Iberian blood ran clear and hot, even through the veins of the late sixties. He was not, apparently, the first conductor of "Love the Sorcerer" in the theater of Pastora Imperio, the gypsy dancer; but he was the first to lead de Falla's music, in earlier, slenderer form, into the concert-room as suite or tone-poem. Of course, the rhythm of the Fire Dance beats when Miss Hess, the Englishwoman, plays it from the piano; or when Dr. Koussevitzky, the Russian, outflings it across Symphony Hall. With Mr. Arbos, however, as with Mme. Argentina, the rhythm beats home as no foreigner can drive it. More: the conductor had not traversed a dozen measures before memories of the dancer pushed him into an imaginary orchestra-pit and she herself, passioning above the ritual fire, filled the stage. All things Spanish are not possible to all the world any more than "Die Meistersinger" goes better in Paris than it does in Munich.

It was to be noted also that Mr. Arbos often infused into the orchestra the guitar-like, metallic quality of de Falla's rhythmic figures; that he drew from the songs, sung—in the concert-version—by the English horn, an undernote of restless melancholy. Both instincts in the conductor worked to the greater glory of de Falla and to illusion and atmosphere in his gypsying. But a ballet is not a ballet until it is represented in the theater, as the Argentina ought long since to have proved with "Love the Sorcerer" and her Spanish train. Instead, no farther away than next Wednesday, the Chicagoan dancers and mimes will proffer it in the Opera House.

The other Spanish pieces—transcriptions of Albéniz's "El Albaicin," which is the gypsy quarter of Granada, and of his Jota of Navarre—came, went and left not too many traces behind. Both are pages from the books of piano-pieces in which he traversed Spain on tonal tour. But he has whipped out sharper rhythms than any that beat from this Jota; been more lavish and hot with harmonic color. "El Albaicin" may not be all that Debussy imagined out of his delight in Spanish perfumes and Spanish nights; but the doleful, aching gypsy-tune that haunts it, runs in strange and piercing idiom; while Mr. Arbos, scoring for orchestra, hears the metallic timbres, the guitar-like figures, no less than he did conducting through de Falla's more adept ballet.

H. T. P.

Dr Koussevitzky, back from his vacation, will conduct the Monday Symphony concert tomorrow. The program commemorates the 175th anniversary of the composer's birth by including two Mozart numbers. About Hortense Monarth, who will play the piano solo in Mozart's D minor concerto, no information has been made public. Her name is unknown to the Globe reviewer.

Globe Jan 25

The novelty on this week's Symphony program in the regular series is an introduction and allegro for strings by Elgar.

Music

Mon Jan 24

Boston Symphony

For the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter holidays, Enrique Fernandez Arbós was called to the dais of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program he set for the concerts of Jan. 23 and 24 in Symphony Hall, Boston, consisted of a Corelli Suite (Sarabande—Gigue—Badinérie); Franck's Symphony; de Falla's Suite from "El Amor Brujo," and two Albeniz piano pieces transcribed for orchestra by Mr. Arbós, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra." The Corelli item and the transcriptions were played for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Arbós was welcomed with exceptional warmth, and not only because 27 years ago he was concertmaster of the Boston orchestra. He was remembered too for his vital leadership as guest conductor at a pair of concerts two years ago. He was saluted even more enthusiastically after the symphony and at the close of the concert; for he had reasserted the qualities which won admiration on his previous visit. He obviously had the coöperation of the superb orchestra as well as the good will of the audience, and a most pleasurable concert resulted.

The Corelli Suite was characteristic and charming, and was delightfully performed. Mr. Arbós employed for it the full string orchestra—contrary to Dr. Koussevitzky's present practice with old-time music—but he so held the players in leash that there was no sense of over-weight.

One had anticipated that Mr. Arbós would diverge from the Koussevitzkyan path also by giving a "straight" reading of the symphony, but evidently the Spanish approach to this score is similar to the Russian, for the visitor made it as dramatic as ever did the resident commissioner. This pointing up has stirred protest before; no doubt it will again, but not from your correspondent. Years ago we wearied of the "grandeur" of the Franck Symphony, and we welcome treatment which decently veils the banality of some of its material.

Mr. Arbós of course is in effect ambassador of the music of Spain. It was a pleasure to hear the familiar and admired music of de Falla come alive under his baton. The first of the two transcriptions from Albeniz also was agreeable to hear, but we doubt whether the second was worth the transcriber's trouble. Philip Hale's erudite program notes informed us that this piano piece was left unfinished, and was completed by Déodat de Sévérac "in a contradictory manner,' as Henri Collet thinks. 'Déodat was too original not to stamp his own charming but not exuberant personality on it.'" That, no doubt, is why it seemed uninteresting. The orchestrations were expert and effective.

L. A. S.

Amer Jan 24

ARBOS LEADS SYMPHONY IN CONCERT

By MOSES SMITH

Enrique Fernandez-Arbos, Spanish musician, conducts this week's Symphony concerts, while Mr. Koussevitzky completes his annual mid-winter leave. The visiting conductor chose a program that begins with a Suite of Corelli, heard in its present form for the first time in Boston, Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony, a suite drawn from de Falla's "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), and two piano pieces of Albeniz, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra," translated for orchestra by the conductor.

Mr. Arbos pleased when he conducted as guest at a pair of concerts here a couple of years ago. At yesterday's matinee the audience was similarly impressed, for it applauded with vigor at the conclusion of each piece. The visiting Spaniard quite obviously knows the conductorial "business." As the orchestra played the Spanish works under his direction the music called up most graphic images. De Falla's acidic score did not have quite the sting Mr. Koussevitzky drew from it, as we recall, but the result was more colorful. In the Albeniz pieces, moreover, Mr. Arbos indicated he is an able orchestrator as well.

Of the performance of the Franck Symphony we write with greater reservations. Mr. Arbos is a member of that school (which includes Mr. Koussevitzky, incidentally) which dramatizes Franck's mighty masterpiece. Much as we like this conception—for Franck's angelic mysticism is now an exploded myth—it seemed to us that Mr. Arbos overdramatized. Before the Symphony had been completed the brasses were fairly shrieking. There was exaggerated bringing out of inner voices—and lower voices, too, notably the double-basses. The reading was so intensely "human" that it became almost hysterical.

The orchestra played unusually well under Mr. Arbos, achieving at times notable sonority and great variety of color.

1931 Herald Jan 24

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Enrique Fernandez-Arbos, as a guest, conducted the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Corelli, Suite; Franck, symphony in D minor; De Falla, suite from the ballet-pantomime, "El Amor Brujo"; Albeniz, two pieces, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra," piano pieces transcribed for orchestra by Mr. Arbos.

Corelli was known to the symphony audience by his "Christmas" concerto. The suite played yesterday consists of a Sarabande, a Gigue and a Badinerie, a term equivalent to juggling or foolery, a term found in a concerto by Bach. Ettore Pinelli, a Roman musician of note, took these movements from a book of Corelli's sonatas, and showed taste in the selection. How much he did to the original music is unknown to us, but there is fidelity to the old grace and spirit; there is no attempt at impudent modernization, fortunately; for the music is charming in its simplicity—the Sarabande with its simple tenderness; the Gigue, fresh and sparkling, not overlabored and spun out as is too often the case in Bach's movements of this nature; the Badinerie precisely what the title indicates. Mr. Arbos gave the necessary nuances with a fine regard for the spirit of Corelli's period, and did not try to give undue importance by overconducting. How beautiful this old music is! What a spell it works, and by what simple means! The trouble with so many of contemporaneous composers is that they cannot write simply, for they have few musical ideas; so they are forced to follow the frog in the fable, or they strive to startle an audience by desperate endeavors to be original, thinking that they will be like Offenbach's Archduke Ernest:

"Original! Original!
Combien je suis original!
Non rien n'est plus original,
Qu'un Archiduc original!"

And that the hearers will shout in chorus:

"Oui, c'est un original!"

In Mr. Arbos's reading of Franck's symphony many features of the detail, features in the thematic development were brought out, but not in a manner to check the musical flow; not as if certain passages—revealed clearly to the audience for the first time—were

Art Palace METROPOLITAN
NOW PLAYING—

that of the questioning soul—the stress has been put on the singular goodness, the child-like innocence of Franck's character. It has been wisely said that in the soul of every saint, evil lurks. Blessed is the holy man that realizes this; thus is he humanized! It is curious that when Franck tried to portray evil, when the hosts of hell were supposed to be wicked in song, as in "The Beatitudes," he only was conventionally operatic in Meyerbeer's worst manner. The mental struggle between doubt and faith inspired the composer of the symphony. No wonder that after the performance of yesterday the orchestra joined the audience in tumultuous applause.

Excellent as was the performance of De Falla's music, an interpretation arresting through the understanding and the fire of the composer's friend and countryman, it still holds good that ballet music, whatever its intrinsic worth, suffers by separation from the action. The reading yesterday was splendid in vitality, dash and color, but the music would have been thrice as significant if it had served to emphasize the strange drama on the stage.

It is fortunate for Albeniz that he is not known by his own orchestration of the pieces in "Iberia." Mr. Arbos urged Albeniz to arrange them for the orchestra, but in the two that were ready for performance the composer showed little skill. It was meet and proper that Mr. Arbos himself should undertake the task. The symphony audience heard "La Fete-dieu a Seville" and "Tirana" two years ago when the transcriber was a guest conductor. Yesterday it heard "El Albaicin" and "Navarra," the first from "Iberia"; the second a posthumous work which was left unfinished. Deodat de Severac completed it for the piano, but his musical nature was not en rapport with that of the Spaniard. Mr. Arbos in his arrangement completed "Navarra" as a Spaniard should. It is not probable that any other countryman was the man for the task; Mr. Arbos has a peculiar gift for orchestration. He is master of finesse as well as gorgeous coloring. And so yesterday the music of Albeniz seemed the soul of Spain—the Spain of the Moors and the gypsies.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts to be con-

Symphony

A Friendly Symphonic Afternoon

Mr. Arbos, as Guest, Prevails in Franck's Symphony And Spanish Pieces

Trans Jan 24

CYNICUS has invented a new wisecrack. Through the intermission, at the Symphony Concert on Friday, he was busy circulating it. The audience, he said, and not Dr. Koussevitzky, had gone on vacation. Every one knew that the conductor was working in his study at the programs for the Bach Festival and other plans for the second half of the season. Through a fortnight he had "passed up" rehearsals and concerts, only to busy himself with scores. Whereas an appreciable part of the usual audience was taking a second Friday holiday. Look around anywhere, and familiar figures were missing; while up in the second balcony there were rush-seats standing empty.

The subscribers in presence—Cynicus rattled on—were clearly in vacation mood. Last week they had lolled through Mr. Hadley's array of his own and other masterpieces; while today they had settled back in their chairs to hear a comfortable performance of Franck's familiar Symphony; only to be aroused by Mr. Arbos's well-placed fervors. Cynicus himself had picked the half-hour to listen with one lobe of such brain as he has; while with the other he chose the family guests for a supper-party he is soon giving on his sister-in-law's birthday. The conductor's vigors detached him from that pious task and he had joined in the tumult of applause that crowned the performance. Cynicus, who migrated from New York twenty-five years ago, had clapped the louder, because he had overheard someone calling Mr. Arbos "our old and esteemed friend"—in the "most patronizing Boston manner."

The gentleman from Madrid is indeed rather more than "our old and esteemed friend" from his days as concert-master under Gericke in 1903 to his first return "as guest" at Symphony Hall two years ago. He is in fact an able and refreshing conductor, even when weeks of exacting work in St. Louis have tired him. In these days we expect "individual readings" from our eminences of the baton. Before them the composers outspread scores. In front of them the orchestra sits ready to do their bidding. Behind them we of the audience await the illumination of the masterpiece in hand by the light of their personalities. (If sometimes it turns out to be a darkening of the composer's counsels, never mind. All "right-thinking" people take genius as they find it.) In contrast, Mr. Arbos is a paragon of faithful, honest, straightforward conducting. Clear-minded musician, he reads the score on his desk as the composer set it down. Practised conductor, he transmits it to hearers without a thought of "filtering it through his own personality." When the orchestra is as sympathetic as it was yesterday, the transmission is the richer. (Mr. Burgin had no need to spur his mates as he did a week ago.)

For those who would have the conductor mirror to the composer, there is usually no more truthful glass—Toscaninian finesse aside—than Mr. Arbos. His modesty and poise likewise commend him. Of late years, on his travels, he has been quiet apostle of the older and younger Spanish composers. But he does not overload a program with their works; while one, yesterday, long since gained international recognition — de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer." When he is himself transcriber for orchestra, as he was now with two piano-pieces by Albéniz, the record on the program-sheet suffices. He is all for Albéniz in a new dress, as little as may be for himself as dressmaker. He has, besides, piquant ways longer to be remembered than a deal of "personality." Who that watched him on Friday will forget the little springs into the air with which he emphasized to the orchestra the swift, sharp changes of rhythm in de Falla's ballet?

Yet Mr. Arbos, like the rest of us, can be unobtrusively in the fashion. Time was when a classic or a modern overture began symphonic programs. Now the mode is an eighteenth-century piece—concerto or suite, as often as not for string choir. Mr. Arbos's choice lighted upon a suite of three movements, assembled and arranged from sonatas of Corelli. The first was a Sarabande, slow-paced, grave and songful; the second a lightly accented gigue; the third, the orchestral chit-chat and sport with figures that the day named "badinerie." The suite was not Bach, father or sons; no more was it Handel. It was not even the later and luscious Vivaldi. Instead, it gave a quiet pleasure of its own. Invention was not Corelli's strong point; nor could he compass vivid and stirring polyphony. By exception in his Roman day, he had skill and what we should now call "feeling" for instrumental voices. For its time Corelli's Sarabande is uncommonly rich-textured; while in the finale he is making play not only with figures but also with the contrasts of brighter and darker strings. The texture and the timbres were both the gainers by the tone of Dr. Koussevitzky's choir.

Nor could Mr. Arbos resist the fashionable temptation to dramatize Franck's intrinsically contemplative Symphony. It is not necessary to believe with the elderly people who "enjoyed" the war (because it brought them excitement) that Germans are the authors of all evil; but certain it is that Dr. Muck set that fashion at Symphony Hall. Not even Dr. Koussevitzky, who dramatized first, last and nearly all the time, outdid him in the apocalyptic, and also sonorous, proclamation of the triumphant chief motiv in final progress toward the heavenly heights. Then and there Mr. Arbos kept brass choir and strings within plausible bounds. He no more than saw Franck facing, elate, the sun of righteousness.

Rather, the Arbosian specialty was the rhythming of this motiv whenever it entered emphatically or in climax as though Stravinsky himself had written it, as though the orchestra of "Le Sacre" were sounding it. All of which, it is permissible to suggest, is a bit far from "Father" Franck hearing the trumpets of beatitude as he mused in the organ loft of Sainte-Clothilde; or from the Franck who, with this motiv, speaks nobly of the soul. Mr. Arbos, however, departs pardoned, as becomes a guest. From his hand, ear and true divination the second movement sang itself out of a troubled sadness into ingenuous and tender beauty. Therein, for these measures, is the Franckian essence. Not a trace of symphonic "theater" marred or distorted them.

Now and again in the Spanish pieces, Mr. Arbos's Iberian blood ran clear and hot, even through the veins of the late sixties. He was not, apparently, the first conductor of "Love the Sorcerer" in the theater of Pastora Imperio, the gypsy dancer; but he was the first to lead de Falla's music, in earlier, slenderer form, into the concert-room as suite or tone-poem. Of course, the rhythm of the Fire Dance beats when Miss Hess, the Englishwoman, plays it from the piano; or when Dr. Koussevitzky, the Russian, outflings it across Symphony Hall. With Mr. Arbos, however, as with Mme. Argentina, the rhythm beats home as no foreigner can drive it. More: the conductor had not traversed a dozen measures before memories of the dancer pushed him into an imaginary orchestra-pit and she herself, passioning above the ritual fire, filled the stage. All things Spanish are not possible to all the world any more than "Die Meistersinger" goes better in Paris than it does in Munich.

It was to be noted also that Mr. Arbos often infused into the orchestra the guitar-like, metallic quality of de Falla's rhythmic figures; that he drew from the songs, sung—in the concert-version—by the English horn, an undernote of restless melancholy. Both instincts in the conductor worked to the greater glory of de Falla and to illusion and atmosphere in his gypsying. But a ballet is not a ballet until it is represented in the theater, as the Argentina ought long since to have proved with "Love the Sorcerer" and her Spanish train. Instead, no farther away than next Wednesday, the Chicagoan dancers and mimes will proffer it in the Opera House.

The other Spanish pieces—transcriptions of Albéniz's "El Albaicin," which is the gypsy quarter of Granada, and of his Jota of Navarre—came, went and left not too many traces behind. Both are pages from the books of piano-pieces in which he traversed Spain on tonal tour. But he has whipped out sharper rhythms than any that beat from this Jota; been more lavish and hot with harmonic color. "El Albaicin" may not be all that Debussy imagined out of his delight in Spanish perfumes and Spanish nights; but the doleful, aching gypsy-tune that haunts it, runs in strange and piercing idiom; while Mr. Arbos, scoring for orchestra, hears the metallic timbres, the guitar-like figures, no less than he did conducting through de Falla's more adept ballet.

H. T. P.

Dr Koussevitzky, back from his vacation, will conduct the Monday Symphony concert tomorrow. The program commemorates the 175th anniversary of the composer's birth by including two Mozart numbers. About Hortense Monarth, who will play the piano solo in Mozart's D minor concerto, no information has been made public. Her name is unknown to the Globe reviewer.

Globe Jan 25

One novelty on this week's Symphony program in the regular series is an introduction and allegro for strings by Elgar.

Music
Mon Jan 24

Boston Symphony

For the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter holidays, Enrique Fernandez Arbós was called to the dais of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program he set for the concerts of Jan. 23 and 24 in Symphony Hall, Boston, consisted of a Corelli Suite (Sarabande—Gigue—Badinérie); Franck's Symphony; de Falla's Suite from "El Amor Brujo," and two Albeniz piano pieces. transcribed for orchestra by Mr. Arbós, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra." The Corelli item and the transcriptions were played for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Arbós was welcomed with exceptional warmth, and not only because 27 years ago he was concert-master of the Boston orchestra. He was remembered too for his vital leadership as guest conductor at a pair of concerts two years ago. He was saluted even more enthusiastically after the symphony and at the close of the concert; for he had reasserted the qualities which won admiration on his previous visit. He obviously had the coöperation of the superb orchestra as well as the good will of the audience, and a most pleasurable concert resulted.

The Corelli Suite was characteristic and charming, and was delightfully performed. Mr. Arbós employed for it the full string orchestra—contrary to Dr. Koussevitzky's present practice with old-time music—but he so held the players in leash that there was no sense of over-weight.

One had anticipated that Mr. Arbós would diverge from the Koussevitzkyan path also by giving a "straight" reading of the symphony, but evidently the Spanish approach to this score is similar to the Russian, for the visitor made it as dramatic as ever did the resident commissioner. This pointing up has stirred protest before; no doubt it will again, but not from your correspondent. Years ago we wearied of the "grandeur" of the Franck Symphony, and we welcome treatment which decently veils the banality of some of its material.

Mr. Arbós of course is in effect ambassador of the music of Spain. It was a pleasure to hear the familiar and admired music of de Falla come alive under his baton. The first of the two transcriptions from Albeniz also was agreeable to hear, but we doubt whether the second was worth the transcriber's trouble. Philip Hale's erudite program notes informed us that this piano piece was left unfinished, and was completed by Déodat de Sévérac "in a 'contradictory manner,' as Henri Collet thinks. 'Déodat was too original not to stamp his own charming but not exuberant personality on it.'" That, no doubt, is why it seemed uninteresting. The orchestrations were expert and effective.

L. A. S.

Amer Jan 24

ARBOS LEADS SYMPHONY IN CONCERT

By MOSES SMITH

Enrique Femandez-Arbos, Spanish musician, conducts this week's Symphony concerts, while Mr. Koussevitzky completes his annual mid-winter leave. The visiting conductor chose a program that begins with a Suite of Corelli, heard in its present form for the first time in Boston, Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony, a suite drawn from de Falla's "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), and two piano pieces of Albeniz, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra," translated for orchestra by the conductor.

Mr. Arbos pleased when he conducted as guest at a pair of concerts here a couple of years ago. At yesterday's matinee the audience was similarly impressed, for it applauded with vigor at the conclusion of each piece. The visiting Spaniard quite obviously knows the conductorial "business." As the orchestra played the Spanish works under his direction the music called up most graphic images. De Falla's acidic score did not have quite the sting Mr. Koussevitzky drew from it, as we recall, but the result was more colorful. In the Albeniz pieces, moreover, Mr. Arbos indicated he is an able orchestrator as well.

Of the performance of the Franck Symphony we write with greater reservations. Mr. Arbos is a member of that school (which includes Mr. Koussevitzky, incidentally) which dramatizes Franck's mighty masterpiece. Much as we like this conception—for Franck's angelic mysticism is now an exploded myth—it seemed to us that Mr. Arbos overdramatized. Before the Symphony had been completed the brasses were fairly shrieking. There was exaggerated bringing out of inner voices—and lower voices, too, notably the double-basses. The reading was so intensely "human" that it became almost hysterical.

The orchestra played unusually well under Mr. Arbos, achieving at times notable sonority and great variety of color.

Concert-Chronicle

Jan 26 Trans

Orchestral Finance

THE curious about the finances of symphony orchestras may read in the last program-book, to reach Boston, of the Chicago Orchestra: "When Orchestra Hall was built and it was thought its revenue would support the orchestra, the pay-roll was $103,000. This year it is $315,000. At current rates the income from all orchestral activities will be about $303,000. The cost of operation will be about $400,000, leaving an estimated deficiency of $97,000.

"Net revenues from the building will take care of about $56,000 of this loss, leaving a deficit of about $41,000. Approximately $14,000 of this can be met by current income from endowment funds, but there will be a net deficit of $27,000 above all income. An increase of endowment is therefore necessary unless the Association's activities are to be lessened or the orchestra cut in numbers or in pay. None of these things ought to be."

As yet the Chicago Orchestral Association has asked no guarantee fund from the public, as is annual practice by the trustees of the Boston Orchestra It prefers to increase its Endowment Fund, which lately received $50,000 from a "Friend of the Orchestra." Bostonians have seldom, if ever, made such gifts to the Endowment Fund at Symphony Hall; but their response to the annual deficit is generous. To make the inevitable comparison: the operating income, the operating outgo and the annual deficit of the Boston Orchestra are double those of the Chicago Orchestra—because of a longer period and a wider range of activity, along with a more costly personnel. Symphony Hall in 1930 yielded the Boston Orchestra $96,700 in contrast with the Chicagoan $56,000 from Orchestra Hall. But the income—$17,286 in 1930—from the Endowment Fund, exceeds by only $3000 the Chicagoan revenue from the similar source. Hence the annual appeal to guarantors.

Mus Trus Jan 26

Symphony Concert

Last night in Symphony Hall, the third program in the Monday series of concerts was conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, newly returned from his mid-winter vacation. The soloist was Hortense Monath, and the program comprised the Mozart Symphony in G minor, the Mozart Piano Concerto in D minor and Moussorgsky's amusing "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

The Mozart Symphony and the Moussorgsky miniatures, having been recently noticed, do not require further comment here. Miss Monath, we are informed (there were, unfortunately, no program notes regarding her), is from Newark, N. J., and a winner of a Schubert Memorial prize in pianoforte. With every evidence of excellent pianistic training, she played the concerto with a touch brilliantly crisp. Her technical equipment is entirely adequate to the demands made by this music, yet, singularly enough, her performance left us both unconvinced and unenthusiastic. Despite the fact that the concerto material itself is not in the happiest Morzartean vein (the cadenzas by Beethoven and Hummel are curiously out of the picture), there are to be found many measures of lyric beauty which somehow appeared to escape the notice of Miss Monath. On the whole, her performance was one of youthful exuberance, untempered by sentiment, except for a momentary excursion in the second movement. Miss Monath was accorded applause of considerable

Herald Jan 26

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Monday night series took place in Symphony hall last evening. The program comprised Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and Concerto in D minor for the piano; Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The pianist was Hortense Monath.

Strange to say, the least familiar piece on the program was the piano concerto, least familiar to the Symphony audiences, though a favorite with young pianists who daringly hope to play it some day in public. Other concertos by Mozart have been heard here within the last dozen years, but the one in D minor has been unaccountably neglected.

As for the symphony, it cannot be too familiar. With each repeated hearing the wonder grows. One might ask whether "Pictures at an Exhibition" as now orchestrated is not Ravel's more than Moussorgsky's. This question, however, is of purely academic interest when the performance was as engrossing as it was last night.

In the concerto Miss Monath showed herself a musician of no small abilities. A pupil of Schnabel, and known already in Boston under the name of Hortense Husserl, she possesses a fine technic and a force that few women are endowed with. She played with taste and warm feeling. She is not yet master of her qualities which often results in an unpleasantly hard attack and predominance of the bass and minor parts. Her scale work is beautiful, and she is especially happy in light passage work. The accompaniment was beautifully played.

L. B. D.

With a Bouquet for Mozart's Birthday

Trans Jan 27

THE Monday Symphony series has its triumphs, too; they are all the more enjoyable when unexpected. Last evening, Young Modernist glanced at the program-book with some misgivings—two formal pieces from Mozart and the now familiar "Pictures at an Exhibition" from Ravel and Musorgsky. He reckoned without Dr. Koussevitzky and the surprising young talent of Miss Hortense Monath, piano soloist for the occasion, not to mention the undiminished freshness of Mozart's music in this one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary year of the composer's birth.

During the entire first division of the program, Mozart prevailed in graceful intimacy. The Symphony in G Minor (K. 550) was extensive and persuasive introduction. It welcomed Dr. Koussevitzky to his accustomed place, though the patrons of Monday were less affected by his absence than those of Friday and Saturday. It re-established the orchestra's sensitive way with Mozart. According to current practice, Dr. Koussevitzky used a diminished instrumentation, the circle of musicians surrounding him in a compact little famly. From the opening Allegro, one could sense the conductor's gentle tug at the reins, the gradual gathering together of delicate resources, the re-invocation of that firmness within elasticity with which he makes the music of Mozart so immediately appealing. As is now and then his wont, he retarded the Andante beyond usual procedure, extracting with extreme care the essence of every melody. Seemingly, for the time, the performance hung in the balance. The succeeding Minuet and Trio brought quickened pace, and through the Finale, the Boston Symphony was its precise and sparkling self. Here, the woodwinds, outdoing themselves in true tone and pointed from their interest.

For less familiar Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky chose the Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra in D Minor, with Miss Hortense Monath (sometimes appearing as Hortense Husserl) as soloist. Miss Monath gave an impressive performance from the start. The first movement of the Concerto is prelude-like and prophetic, though more sombre in import than the ensuing Romanza and Rondo, which are melodically among Mozart's most charming inspirations. Miss Monath has developed an excellent technique for Mozart and her temperament is entirely sympathetic. Among her most admirable attributes is a singing tone of beautiful quality. Her touch is exceedingly elastic and discriminating, clearly emphasizing the melody notes while giving full weight to accompanying figures. A keen sense of harmony permits her to make Mozartean design sound with warmth and richness commonly overlooked in contemporary performance, while her skilful use of the pedal in achieving legato and in relating melodic strands is exceptional. Especially worthy of note is the fact that her performance has character. Conductor and pianist together worked out an engrossing interpretative scheme, the musicians quickly responding to the pianist's whole-souled devotion to her music and she in turn deriving encouragement from their interest. Mozartean melody has seldom been more persuasive than it was last evening in the Romanza, while the pert rhythm, the clarity of tone and lilt of phrasing in the Rondo were uncommonly delightful. The audience followed the performance with increasing attention and applauded with unusual cordiality at the close of the piece, thrice recalling her to the stage.

After Mozart, Ravel's transcription of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" sounded with almost overwhelming eloquence. The depth, richness, color and piquancy of this music appeared as a truly amazing contrast to the slender lines of the preceding eighteenth-century pieces. From its printed appearance, the program at first seemed a peculiar arrangement. As it actually sounded, it was an excellent example of Mr. Koussevitzky's sense of symmetry. The "Pictures at an Exhibition" are now in the established repertory. With familiarity, the musicians have not become disinterested, but on the contrary, increase their skill and pleasure with every page. The piece gains decidedly with repetition.

N. M. J.

Trans Jan 29

The exigencies of program-making and of travel-schedules compel Dr. Koussevitzky to defer for a fortnight the marking by the Symphony Orchestra of Mr. Loeffler's seventieth birthday. The anniversary falls tomorrow; but at the concert of that day—and the following Saturday—the conductor must play pieces necessary for the journey Southward next week. The orchestra will not be heard again in Boston until Friday and Saturday, Feb. 13 and 14; while Mr. Loeffler himself will be absent for a time in Cleveland, to hear the first performance of his dedicatory piece written for the orchestra of that city on its entrance into a new hall.

Consequently not until Feb. 13 and 14 can Dr. Koussevitzky fill the second part of a pair of Symphony Concerts with Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and "La Bonne Chanson," to be played in the presence of the composer and as the homage of his city. . . . During the same week the Philharmonic Society of New York will also pay him tribute. For its concerts of Feb. 12, 13, 14 and 15 Mr. Molinari, then conducting, announces "Pagan Poem," in the modest hope that at the first or the last of the series, Mr. Loeffler may honor the Society with his presence. "Six performances of an American composition in a single week by two great Eastern orchestras," writes one of his friends, "seems something like a record."

Elgar as "Novelty" At Symphony Hall

Trans Jan 24

THE novelty of the week at Symphony Hall this week is novel only in the sense that it has remained unplayed in Boston. For it dates from 1905, when Stravinsky was still studying with Rimsky-Korsakov (or at any rate had just completed his course with that master), and Debussy's "Pelléas and Mélisande" was only a very few years old. Debussy was still the chief bone of contention in the musical world. And the very newest scandal in such matters was the treatment of the young Ravel at the hands of the committee that declared him ineligible to compete further for the Prix de Rome. Elgar, the composer of our novelty, was being hailed as the redeemer of English music; even in those days was not "advanced" or "futuuristic" or "modern" enough to shock the most conservative.

Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings, Opus 47, is dedicated "To his friend, Professor S. S. Sanford, Yale University, U. S. A." It is in the key of G (minor and major). It is scored for string quartet and orchestra; the orchestral voices are each divided into two parts. Its first performance was by the London Symphony Orchestra, March 8, 1905, on an all-Elgar program. In 1914, when it was performed by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the excellent Mr. Borowski wrote in the program books "To Mr. Ernest Newman Elgar stated that his work had its origin in Wales, 'where he was impressed by the sound of distant singing, in which the cadence of a falling third caught his fancy. From the train of thought thus generated sprang the main theme of the work, the pseudo-Welsh tune. Later on, a song heard in the valley of the Wye, reinforced the Welsh impressions and led to the completion of the work.'"

The Introduction (G minor) alternates between short divisions oderato and Allegretto. The Moderato is an impetuous descending figure. The Allegretto brings the bright tripping motif which will presently blossom into the chief theme of the Allegro, the main body of the work. Twice these are repeated. Then the viola of the solo quartet sings the haunting theme which Elgar evolved out of things heard during his Welsh travels. This at once receives a certain amount of development. Then, after a restatement of the introductory figure we are led into the Allegro and with it the key of G major. The tripping motif above alluded to is fully worked out. This in turn gives way to a bright and sprightly division in staccato repeated sixteenth notes. Following which there is an extended fugal exposition upon an exceedingly lively and active subject. After this is fully worked out there is return to the two previous divisions of the Allegro, the one on the bright tripping motif and the one on the repeated sixteenth notes. And at the end there is a full-throatd and expressive climax on the lyrical Welsh theme.

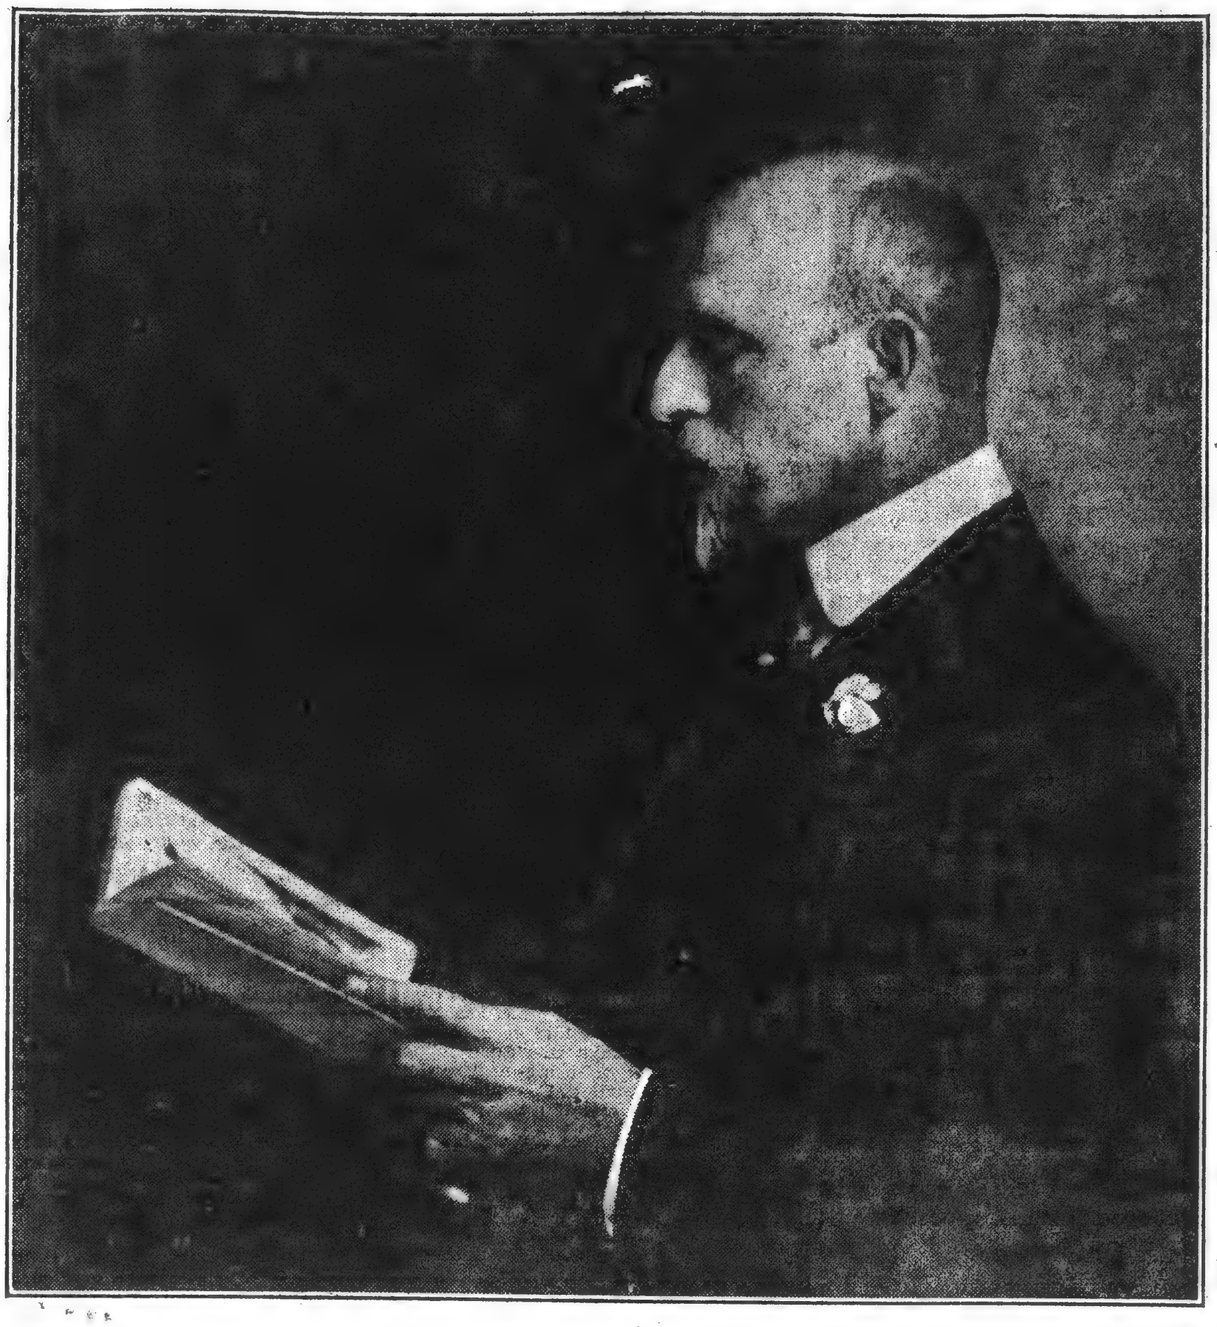
A. H. M.

104

Players --- Music and Musicians

Seventy Years Now Bear Him Witness

Lawrence Gilman Plaits The Birthday Wreath



(Garo)

Charles Martin Loeffler: Born at Mulhouse (Alsace) Jan. 30, 1861 Now Living at Medfield

IF Charles Martin Loeffler at seventy is not, musically speaking, the First Citizen of Massachusetts, at least he seems so to many among those who observe that Commonwealth from a distance. It is almost half a century since Loeffler came to America (the French ship "Le Canada" brought him to New York rom Havre in July, 1881); and during most of that half-century he has been conspicuously associated with the musical life of Boston. He joined the Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1882-83, and remained a member of the organization for two decades. He became an American citizen in 1887. Since his retirement to Medfield, he has continued, in his reluctant and self-challenging way, to add to his output as a creative artist; and whatever he has put forth has redounded to the honor of musical art as practised in the land of his adoption. Long ago he was ranked by the discerning as the most individual and in many ways the most remarkable music-maker in America. He is still a solitary figure, salient, aloof, autonomous—a composer extraordinary for his purity of intention, his distinction of thought, his choiceness of procedure. He is among the aristocrats of musical style. Even when he pays brief court to Jazzerella, he cannot quite dissemble the grand seigneur, and is inclined to address the wench as if she were his worshipped lady, the veritable Dulcinea del Toboso.

—

Loeffler's field of reference (barring his tentative dalliance with Jazzerella), is remote from the preoccupations of our day. Music and musicians have traveled far from the time when composers were addicted to symphonic poems, and chose for their subjects doomed and piteous children, veiled hand-maidens and sinister dread Queens, Sorceresses out of Virgil, wind among Celtic reeds, the deathlessness of Helen. Composers no longer write symphonic poems, or, if they do, they go for their subjects to regions far removed from those nameless lands "In the strange years of legends" that yielded such music as Loeffler's. They go to the football field, or the railroad yard, or the steel-mill—which is all very well, and quite as it should be; though one may be tempted to ask if the drop-kick or the locomotive or the foundry have yet given us any music that shows signs of enduring vitality. Will Honegger's "Pacific, 231" still be snorting and pounding through the symphonic night thirty years after it was written, as Loeffler's Ygraine and Tintagiles still cry to us from the darkness of their nameless land a generation after their composer set them there; as his pagan Sorceress still sings to us her amorous, incantatory songs? Perhaps. Criticism has naught to do with prophecy. Yet we may wonder.

—

The musical idiom of Loeffler is not that of today—a grave disadvantage which it shares with the idioms of Debussy, Brahms, Wagner, Schubert, Beethoven, Mozart, Bach, Monteverdi and other ancients. Yet, oddly enough, it remains an apt and expressive vehicle of beauty and eloquence and distinguished musical thought.

It remains, too, a curiously personal possession. There is no music quite like this, with its fineness of fiber, its uncompromising distinction, its blended subtlety and passion. Loeffler is sui generis: he is still, as Mr. Carl Engel once happily called him, "that rare and comforting thing in life and art—a perfect anomaly."

Often in Loeffler's music we are brought close to immemorial things—to sorrow and loveliness and transport and faith and the haunted destiny of man, his terrors and fantasies and dreams; so that we may find ourselves wondering if this is not, perhaps, art of the sort that can afford to be indifferent to the hues of time.

LAWRENCE GILMAN

At Washington last December, in the course of Dr. Koussevitzky's Beethoven Festival, Myra Hess played the composer's Fourth Piano-Concerto (in G major) with the Symphony Orchestra. In New York, three weeks ago, she repeated the performance at a subscription concert. For the third time—and in Boston at last—she will play the Concerto at the orchestra's supplementary matinée on Tuesday, Feb. 10, in Symphony Hall.

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky

FOR the Symphony Concerts of Friday, Feb. 13, and Saturday, Feb. 14, the next in the series:

Suite for Piano and String Orchestra.....Pilati
(New: First Times: Pianist, Mr. Sanromá)
Symphony ..... Honegger
(First Performances: Written for the Jubilee of the Orchestra)
Pagan Poem (After Vergil).....Loeffler
La Bonne Chanson (After Verlaine).....Loeffler
(Both Played to Mark the Composer's Seventieth Birthday)

For the supplementary matinée of the Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Feb. 10 in Symphony Hall:

Overture to Goethe's Play, "Egmont" Beethoven
Concerto, No. 4, in G major for Piano and Orchestra .....Beethoven
(Pianist: Miss Hess)
Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat major "Eroica" .....Beethoven

Other Quarters

From Mme. Povla Frijsh for her concert in the Repertory Theater on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 15:

Gioito al canto mio.....Peri
Mädchen mit dem rothen Mündchen—Marie—
Es hat die Rose sich baklacht.....Franz
Le temps des lilas.....Chausson
Villanelle des petits canards.....Chabrier
Lettre à une Espagnole.....Laparra
Habanera .....Grovlez
Nuit de printemps .....Gretchaninov
Errinnerung .....Arensky
Faden .....E. Wolf
Death the Commander.....Musorgsky
Et syn .....Grieg
The Birds .....Fagge
Melody—Old English Folk-Song.....Quilter

From the Gordon String Quartet for its concert in Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 10:

Quartet in A minor, Op. 51, No. 2....Brahms Quartet in A minor .....Carpenter
(First Time in Boston)
Quartet in F major .....Ravel

From Nikolai Orlov, the rising Russian pianist, for his concert in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 14:

Four Sonatas .....Scarlatti
Symphonic Studies .....Schumann
Twelve Preludes .....Chopin
Russian Dance from "Petrouchka"..Stravinsky
Toccata .....Debussy
Feux-Follets—Polonaise .....Liszt

For New York

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York next week. On Thursday evening:

Introduction and Allegro for Strings....Elgar
Symphony, No. 7, in One Movement....Sibelius
Symphonia Domestica.....Strauss

For Saturday afternoon:

Two Preludes (Adagio: Vivace) .....Bach
(Scored for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli)
Caprice for Orchestra with Piano..Stravinsky
(Pianist: Mr. Sanroma)
Symphonia Domestica .....Strauss

Incidents and Prospects

The Master Returns to His People

Koussevitzky Conducts Again, Sibelius and Strauss Memorably

THE CONDUCTOR who is not guest returned to his post yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. His orchestra rose to greet him, and there seemed less of formality than of feeling in their interchanges. Warmly the audience added its plaudits; but Dr. Koussevitzky was in the mood to settle at once into the work of the day. Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings may pass, for the moment, as so much preluding. Then followed, with Sibelius's Seventh Symphony, as signal a performance as in all their association conductor and orchestra have accomplished. Above even his later habit the composer is sparing with his forces—the usual strings, the usual wood-winds, horns, trumpets, trombones, kettle-drums; all in the usual, or less than the usual, numbers. He reduces the orchestra to its kernel. He uses it with the utmost directness of means and effect. There are no technical exactions, unless Sibelius finds them necessary to the disclosure of his thought, the release of his emotion. There are no flourishes of virtuosity, no exhibitional measures; for his Seventh Symphony he would have an orchestra of musicians rather than virtuosi. They play stripped. No harmonic veils, no luscious overlaying of timbres hide them. They attack directly, speak directly. They are sinewy and austere. They move unhurriedly, graphically and with power. The kernel of the Symphony Orchestra met every one of these tests; played with and for composer and conductor.

Within recollection, Dr. Koussevitzky has not been more master of himself, his band, the music before them. No overzeal trapped him. He did not dramatize a Symphony intrinsically undramatic. He did not sentimentalize a music that shuns every such weakening of emotion. No individual and enthralling raptures betrayed him from his post of command. There were no languors of motion, no lingering over-emphasis, for the sake of a choice sonority upon the ear. Dr. Koussevitzky saw in outline the tonal structure that Sibelius would raise. With him and for him he raised it. The composer is clear-minded in what he puts to music-paper. As lucidly the conductor adjusted every detail within that structure. The sinewy progress, the curt transitions; the stark speech — bare phrases, bare periods, bare harmonies, bare timbres; the impact of emerging motivs, the jab of unexpected modulation or dissonance; above all the great ground-swell from the depths upward, urging and expanding the whole—nothing of all these escaped Dr. Koussevitzky.

Ostensibly, this Seventh Symphony of Sibelius is an "absolute," self-contained music. If, as some infer, a program or a background haunted the composer's creating mind, he has divulged no hint. Yet a personal and introspective emotion deeply and unmistakably suffuses it; toward the end rises to passionate proclamation. Dr. Koussevitzy answered to the emotion and the passion; infused them into the performance; wrought them upon his more sensitive hearers. At every call, he was master of himself, the orchestra and the music in hand—the unsurpassed conductor, since Dr. Muck's day, of Sibelius in American concert-halls.

For the reviewer, putting pen to copy-paper, this Seventh Symphony remains nearly inexpressible. The motivs emerge; but in words for print their thrill weakens. They are born of intense personal emotion communicated to the hearer; but any paper-phrase bears them poor witness. Curt as they are, the naked ear hears in them—as naked—a puissant clang. They are enlarged, unfolded, new-accented, new-colored; opposed, contrasted, joined together. The structure unfolds and is upreared. The progress goes firmer and more variously. Changes of pace and mood bring new intensities.

Now an orchestral choir is the background; again it is the proclaiming voice. The choirs cry out to each other, urge each other on. To the isolated and united strings fall measures that seethe and cut. There are dark and sombre passages; then stark flashes of color in the wood-wind; in the brass heroic chanting. Dissonant chords sweep by. Climaxes rise and fall away, leaving the tremulous strings to whisper mysteries. But always the ground-swell mounting and passioned by the emotion within; making out of these motivs its own music. There is suspense and conclusion—an end in grandeur e once concentrated and outspread. The ear recalls, the mind assimilates, the tense, terse advance from strength to strength. For this Seventh Symphony is the symphony of Sibelius's power and will.

Though intermission separated the two, the other major piece of the afternoon made the veriest contrast—Strauss's spacious and showy (as it now seemed) "Symphonia Domestica." Set beside Sibelius's Seventh, the listener half-forgot its merits for its differences. Strauss now seemed prolix, as one who could not bear to leave his full-throated singing in the middle division, or abate by one jot the prancings of his double fugue; who dwelt too lovingly upon a conscious art of transition. Strauss's long-breathed themes after Sibelius's curt motivs! Strauss's harmonic and instrumental luxuriance beside Sibelius's bareness! The externalized characterization, the candid emotions of the tone-poem, over against the tight-lipped speech, the inner passion of the Symphony! Sibelius the introspective, self-devouring solitary. Strauss the high-placed composer, achieving one more tone-poem on the great scale out of the common stock of domestic emotion. Sibelius, inventing his own technique because no other may release him. Strauss, the heir and master of multifarious musical procedures.

So much for the accident of a chance juxtaposition upon a well-contrasted program. Rather, dwell upon the transfigurations that, for a second or a third time, Strauss's tone-poem underwent at Dr. Koussevitzky's imagining hands. The conductor cares little for the so-called drastic humors of Straussian domesticity; for the tonal delineation of some of its incidents—if the analysts are right in their over-numerous labels. For him — to choose convenient example—the striking clock is quite by the way. Nor, the listener suspects, is he much drawn to the music of the child, save where it yields sturdy measures or is suffused with the mother's tenderness. Instead, and diviningly, Dr. Koussevitzky is most for Strauss's characterization and Strauss's poetry. He is not content merely to array the motivs that express on this side and that the father and the mother. He gives them profile, warmth and animation; glamours them when they are in lighter interplay; invigorates them when they turn assertive. He is zealous to discover the poetry of many a page—for it is there; quick in response and revelation.

Believing and practicing, Dr. Koussevitzky distills beauty out of the gentle close of the first division. The second may sing the passion of artistic creation or the passion of marital love; likely enough would blend them both. Whatever the purpose, deep-toned, rich-texured, upswelling music floods the page. Dr. Koussevitzky sounds it deep and high. . . . Tenderly again he touches in the transition from sleep to waking; graces it as he passes; then springs into the frenzy of the high-leaping, hard-hitting, tirelessly exuberant fugue; at Strauss's call dashes in this memory and that of gentler moods; whips up the final strokes of characterization: so achieves the beaming, bounding end.

The "Symphonia Domestica" is more than a quarter-century old. Those years have sifted it; disclosed and preserved its more significant, poetized and universal content. Dr. Koussevitzky seizes upon these pages: transfigures them out of his own imagination; adds himself to Strauss as a conductor should. Thereby composer and composition are the gainers, which is the conductor's reward. Add, besides, an orchestra capable of all things and stimulated by the Straussian resource, craft and opportunity. Forthwith the "Symphonia Domestica" emerges purged from dross, clarified musically, poetized humanly, enriched throughout.

Back, finally, to Elgar's preluding, Sir Edward comes seldom nowadays into the Symphony Concerts; is known there only by his "Enigma Variations." These twenty years his symphonies have been counted antipathetic to American ears. His "Falstaff," his overtures, nearly all his work in the larger symphonic forms, are forgotten—if they were ever remembered. Outside the Variations, Dr. Koussevitzky prefers him in a transcription of Bach or in such a mingling of skill, scholarship and sonorities as the Introduction and Allegro of yesterday. In this instance Sir Edward writes sturdily; takes thought and proceeds with the dignity becoming the Master of the King's Music. More to the point and the pleasure, he is fertile in development and device; divides or masses his string choir with a clear preference for its united voice; is solicitous of detail; remembers a Welsh tune with a queer cadence; abounds more in matter than in mood; makes an end—the strings of Symphony Hall materially assisting—well on the sunny side of boredom. But the ancients had a way with them in such pieces; while the modernists have come nearer than Elgar's generation to recapturing it.

H. T. P.

STRAUSS OVERTOPS SYMPHONY

Elgar and Sibelius Used in Formidable List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the midst of a feast of opera, a Symphony Concert. But Dr. Koussevitzky, preparing his programme for the concert of yesterday which marked his return, after a three weeks absence, to what are called the "regular" Symphony Concerts, gave little thought to those who were to sit through "Die Walkuere" in the evening.

ELGAR, SIBELIUS AND STRAUSS

In other words, the programme of yesterday was, in some respects, a formidable one. Music by living composers made it. At the outset there came, for the first time in Boston, although the piece is by no means new, an Introduction and Allegro for strings by Edward Elgar, a composer heard here none too frequently of late. Followed the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, an austere and baffling composition known here only by performance at a single pair of concerts four years ago. And after Sibelius, for final number, came another symphony in one movement, though the piece is sometimes styled a tone-poem: the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss.

To speak first of the novelty of the afternoon, Sir Edward Elgar's composition begins genially, persuasively; there is mood and atmosphere; and we are told in the programme notes that the music was inspired by distant singing heard on a visit to Wales. But once launched upon his Allegro, Sir Edward indulges in what may be styled academic virtuosity. Save when the Welsh song returns this portion of the music is not free from the reproach of dryness and artificiality. But if it were Dr. Koussevitky's purpose to find yet another composition whereby he might disclose the technical prowess and tonal virtues of his string choir, he could hardly have found a better one. Perhaps the applause, which was unmistakably hearty, was as much for the performance as for the music.

Even more than did Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, more recently heard here, did the Finn's Seven and latest work in this form impress yesterday as music in which reticence or an unwillingness to speak out is carried to lengths approaching perversity.

Ever and anon in the course of this symphony come hints of the earlier Sibelius, though a Sibelius with his warmths cooled and his ardors diminished. But between these momentary gleams of light the music fades into something not far removed from barrenness. Perhaps our ears are not yet properly attuned to this music. Perhaps it is a true music of the future. Not a few of us, however, still unashamedly prefer the Sibelius of the first five, even, if the truth be told, of the first two symphonies.

Yet it is hardly safe to say that the powers of a contemporary composer are declining. When Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" was first given to the world, 27 years ago this coming spring, more than one voice was raised to proclaim the fact that Strauss was done for; that there remained in his music only a colossal technique; that inspiration and inventiveness, dangerous terms both, had failed him.

Persuasive and Eloquent

Now for many the "Domestica," that idyll expanded to the dimensions of an epic, music, if ever there was such, of the joy of living and the fullness of life, is the very crown of his symphonic writing. And that "period of decline," concerning which there was so much foreboding, was to bring forth among other things, "Salome," "Elektra" and "Der Rosenkavalier." No, Strauss was not done for in the year 1904.

For the music of Elgar and Sibelius Dr. Koussevitzky presumably did yesterday all that might be done; here the present reviewer at least has no basis for comparison But from the vantage-point of previous experience with many performances and many interpretations of the "Domestica," it may confidently be said that Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the score and his orchestra's playing of it is the most persuasive, the most eloquent that Boston has known.

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strauss' "Domestica" and Sibelius' Seventh Heard

Dr Koussevitzky, returning to his post after his annual mid-season vacation, chose a program from the elder feneration of living composers for generation of living composers for yesterday's Symphony concert. There were but three numbers, two of them symphonies, Sibelius' Seventh and Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." An introduction and Allegro for strings by Sir Edward Elgar, composed in 1904, but not previously performed in Boston, began the concert.

Dr Koussevitzky's interest in pieces for string orchestra is probably responsible for his choice of Elgar's well-written but dull piece, which is not one of the best works of that composer.

It is unfair to judge Elgar by his popular pieces of the salon type, or his "Pomp and Circumstance" marches. His oratorio, "The Dream of Gerontius," and his "Enigma" variations are the work of a composer greater than the Baxes and Waltons of the younger generation in England. But the music heard yesterday will not be often played in the future. Dr Koussevitzky showed off once more the qualities of the strings in the Boston Symphony, of whose virtuosity he is obviously proud. The audience applauded cordially.

Powerful Work

Sibelius Seventh Symphony, introduced here by Dr Koussevitzky in 1926, is an original and powerful work, by a composer who, like the masters of the past, goes his own way musically, never following current fashions or aligning himself with any much-touted group. Yesterday's performance was clearer, more accurate, and thus more genuinely eloquent than the one in 1926.

The music made a deep impression on some in the audience, though it still apparently baffled the great majority. The real greatness of Sibelius becomes more obvious with the passage of time. His music does not "date." It is the work of a master, and will live.

Richard Strauss' reputation has so far overshadowed that of Sibelius. His music, as the "Symphonia Domestica" abundantly proved yesterday, is more brilliantly scored, more effectively written. At a first hearing its appeal to a sophisticated audience is greater than that of the serious work of Sibelius, whose vogue with the public has rested on things like his "Finlandia" and "Valse Triste," at which the sophisticated musician is now apt to sneer.

Yet despite the superlative workmanship of Strauss, the magnificent sonorities of his orchestration, and, one must add, despite his "showmanship," his talent for getting himself and his music talked about, one begins to wonder whether the symphonies of Sibelius have not a better chance than all but two or three of Strauss' works of being in the orchestral repertory 50 years hence.

Admirable Performance

The chief trouble with the "Symphonia Domestica," as with "Heldenleben," aside from the curious bad taste of the programmatic description of life in the Strauss household, is a paucity of original musical ideas. Strauss can do wonders with a little musical material, to be sure. But he has not many ideas.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an admirable performance of Strauss' music, brilliant without ... ancy or coarseness, dramatic and emphatic only within the bounds set by the composer's directions.

The orchestra goes on tour next week. For Feb 13 and 14 the program now announced, subject, of course, to change, includes Honegger's new symphony written for the orchestra's anniversary season, two works by Loeffler, in honor of his recent 70th birthday, and a new suite for piano and strings by a young Italian named Pilati, otherwise unknown here.

P. R.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky's reappearance on the platform of Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, after his vacation of a fortnight, was greeted by vigorous and prolonged applause. He had arranged this program for the 14th concert: Elgar, Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, op. 47 (first time at these concerts perhaps the first time in Boston). Sibelius, Symphony No. 7, op. 105. Strauss, Symphonia Domestica.

Elgar, like cricket, Punch, and the "glorious bit-tah beer," is an English institution. Even Bernard Shaw, who before he turned his attention to dramatic work and various schemes for reforming society and bringing in the millennium, was a brilliant music critic, writing fearlessly and with full understanding, declared some months ago that Elgar is "one of the greatest composers in the world." Sir Edward, not to be outdone, said in a presumably hoarse voice choked with emotion: "Shaw is the best friend to any artist." Blest is the tie that binds.

In this instance is it not possible that G. B. S. was unduly heated by free indulgence in his habitual vegetables?

Take the piece heard yesterday. It was first performed over 25 years ago when Elgar was at the height of his creative powers. He had already sent out his overtures Cockaigne and In the South; also his Enigma Variations. What does one find in this Introduction and Allegro? Careful workmanship, a mastery of form and thematic treatment, sound, orthodox instrumentation, but little or no poetic thought, no imagination, little noteworthy melodic invention. A highly respectable work that arouses in the listener only respect for the maker.

If Elgar were the only British composer, one would not be surprised at finding leading critics in this year of grace analyzing at some length a march of his recently produced; speaking of its "effulgence," proclaiming it to be a masterpiece. But there are Delius. Bax, Vaughan Williams, Holst, Ireland, not to mention others. It should not be forgotten that Elgar is "Sir Edward." The title may impress even music critics.

Mr. Lawrence Gilman was right in characterizing Sibelius's seventh symphony as "enigmatic, puissant." Is it also, as he says, "strangely moving"? It is not a symphony for an afternoon's careless pleasure. The music is not descriptive, pictorial, decorative; it has no literary basis. In his earlier works Sibelius sought inspiration in Finland's epic "Kalevala." The works thus inspired, will be more generally popular than the later symphonies. (The first and second have already made their way; the people hear them gladly.)

The music of Sibelius is never frankly sensuous. It seldom accepts the canons of obvious beauty. His musical soul is proud, regardless of popular applause. In his latest works he seems to be writing for himself; to be absorbed in introspection and the expression of what he finds that is dear and important to himself alone. There are noble ideas, fleeting and haunting passages, in this symphony, but the plan and the conclusion of the whole are not easily grasped; nor could Sibelius give any explanation that would satisfy a doubting Thomas or a man from Missouri. He would simply say: "That's what I felt; that's what you may or may not feel." So it goes back to the famous definition of music by Walt Whitman. Jones is reminded by the instruments of Sibelius; Ferguson has ears and he does not hear, much less feel.

Strauss, on the other hand, made musical copy of his wife, interesting baby, and himself. He takes the hearer into the nursery, bathroom, bed chamber, and probably the kitchen, though no rapt admirer of Richard has pointed out the section of music particularizing the pots, pans, and servant giving notice. Here is skill wasted on the unimportant; gorgeous orchestral robes covering an insignificant body, as in Thackeray's picture of Louis XIV in royal dress and without it. The splendor of the performance was great; the enjoyment of the audience corresponded.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for Feb. 13 and 14 comprises Pilati's suite for piano and string orchestra (first time in Boston); Honegger's symphony composed for the orchestra's jubilee (first performance; Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and "Pagan Poem."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 15 1931

BUSHNELL SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seldom can a substitution in an important artistic event be made with such satisfaction as has been possible for the Bushnell Memorial management in announcing that instead of the scheduled concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Maestro Arturo Toscanini, will be heard here in April. One would probably find it difficult if not impossible to locate a Hartford lover of music who will not accept the revised arrangements with entire approval. It is safe to assume that the program to be given here will measure up to the high standard of excellence characteristic of the New York organization. Hartford concert-goers will be delighted to see Toscanini in action. His enthusiastic reception in a number of European cities last year is readily recalled as evidence of his fascinating ability to direct a large company of gifted musicians. The proposed concert will add further distinction to the brief but brilliant record of the Bushnell Memorial. This city will await with pleasure the approach of this outstanding musical event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Boston to See Dr. Hadley

Koussevitsky Again Asks Him to Conduct Symphony Orchestra There.

Dr. Henry K. Hadley, well-known propagandist for American composers and music, has been invited by Serge Koussevitsky to conduct three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, January 15, 16 and 17, as guest conductor.

On these programs there will appear Dr. Hadley's new Chinese suite, "Streets of Pekin," as well as his tone poem, "Salome." Carl McKinley, American composer, will be represented by his overture, "Masquerade," which already has been played in Chicago, Detroit and elsewhere. The first number on the program is the Haydn Symphony No. 1 in E flat major.

This is not the first time that Dr. Hadley has been invited to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Former invitations came from Dr. Muck as well as from Monteux and Fiedler, and Koussevitsky extended this courtesy in 1925.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 17 1931

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY HERE TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give its third concert of the season in Providence. As soloist of the evening, Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear in the Piano Capriccio of Stravinsky, one of the most recent scores of the noted Russian composer.

The Capriccio was first performed in Paris in December, 1929. Dr. Koussevitsky introduced it to this country in the Boston concerts of last Dec. 19 and 20, and to New York on Jan. 8, on which occasions Sanroma likewise played the solo part.

The concert will begin with Beethoven's First Symphony in C major—the score in which the master of Bonn was under the influence of his predecessors, Mozart and Haydn. This Symphony shows much of the charm and elegance of the early masters, while revealing the unmistakable and individual stamp of its creator.

The program will end with three notable excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the Ride of the Valkyries, Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 16 1931

IN TERMS OF MUSIC,
Comment in Season

Stravinsky's New "Cappriccio" is Contrasted With Beethoven's First Symphony and Wagner Items as the Boston Symphony Promises a Soloist.

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returned to the conductor's stand, the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday night will bring to the Albee Theatre a program of great interest and variety. Among the numbers are some of the choicest utterances of the greatest composers of musical history. Snugly tucked away among these epoch-making works is a recent piece by Stravinsky which certainly will afford an amazing interlude of contrast—provoke interesting comparisons between the old, the older and the very new. And no subject in music is more popular and trite than the proper placement of so-called modern music. The Stravinsky piece, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, will be found to be of the most advanced modernity.

The selection of Beethoven's First Symphony for the opening number of the concert is a most happy one. For many years this delightful symphony rarely has appeared on concert programs anywhere, a matter of wonderment and regret. That it was composed in the earlier years of the great master's life in what has been called a period of immaturity of composition does not matter, for it is so much finer and more worthy than so many works composed by others in the full flower of their abilities that it will always stand as one of the great symphonies.

Conspicuous among the many beauties here are the subjects in the first movement, freely tossed from flute to oboe only to be lost in the full orchestra, the mysterious developments of the woodwind, and above all the simple and graceful andante. Some of these phrases suggest the Third and Fifth symphonies where the ideas in Beethoven's mind seek expression in similar but renewed forms.

The last movement is to be thought of as pure music, and in the realm of sound, not of story. Simple messages changing in key with delightful ingenuousness allow the utmost delicacy of expression on the part of the orchestra, to which is added characteristic tone color of the orchestral instruments.

The "Caprice" of Stravinsky is new, having been heard only in Boston and New York. It is a piece of sheer virtuosity and requires the most advanced form of modernistic technique for its performance. No "program" accompanies this work, yet it is far more worthy of titles than many compositions that are so explained. Perhaps one may imagine the sentiment of Bach's Chromatic Fantasia or the "Italian Concerto" in the "Andante rhapsodico" and one surely may think of the most elaborate cabaret jazz in the close, but unless one is very familiar with the most modern idiom of tone association, this work will be most novel and fascinating. At the hands of the enormously gifted Sanroma and the equally perfect orchestra of Koussevitzky, this bit of glittering brilliance will find favor and perhaps imitation. First performed in Paris last season, it has been played in this country only by the artists we shall hear and by them only since December.

The "Ride of the Valkyries" is a popular concert number. It has been transcribed for piano, concert organ and almost every other instrumental combination. It does not suffer by removal from its proper place in the opera, as it is so complete in itself, an heroic episode of tremendous power and impressiveness. Particularly noteworthy is the work of the brass section of the orchestra, where Wagner has placed particular reliance upon the trombones. The "horse riding" motive is no novelty in music yet Wagner was the very first to appreciate its interest and to write it in classic and refined form. The melodramatic description is inseparable from the gorgeous music.

The Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" is considered by many as the greatest of all Wagner's compositions. It was written in a delirium of composition and into it enter the perfection of orchestral technique, and the highest conceptions of the composer's colossal genius. No matter how intimate one is with the score, or how often one hears the work, there are always new beauties to admire and add to one's musical information and knowledge.

From the impressive entrance of the violoncelli followed b ythe crash of the low woodwind to the last shuddering sob of the end, the hearer is held spellbound by the grandeur of its massive ensemble and by its absolute originality. The bass clarinet, one of the most beautiful of all orchestral instruments, frequently impersonates the singer. No stage setting nor voices are needed to complete the greatness of this incomparable work.

As will be seen readily by comparison with the sublime Prelude to "Tristan" the Overture to "Rienzi" belongs to the immature period of Wagner yet, as already said about Beethoven's first symphony, it is nevertheless well worth hearing and intimate acquaintance. splendid workmanship, its thematic material and full orchestration have made it a favorite on concert programs. Indeed, its opening passages recall in part those of Caesar Franck's symphonic poem far more recent vintage. The brass section is very prominent and is one of the very few compositions in which the tuba net is used. The use of the military march hymn "con spiritu cavalier" and employment of the snare drum is also characteristic and memorable.

Again the catholicity of Dr. Koussevitzky's programs is to be noted and there are many opportunities to hear the virtuosity of all choirs of the orchestra.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven—Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21.
- I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante cantabile con moto.
- III. Menuetto: Allegro Molto e vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.

Stravinsky—Capriccio for piano and orchestra.
- I. Presto.
- II. Andante rapsodico.
- III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.

Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, from "Die Walkure."
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde."
Wagner—Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
JAN 1931

Boston Symphony Orches

Next Tuesday evening in the Theatre at 8:15, the Boston Symp Orchestra under Dr. Serge Kou vitzky will give its third concer the season in Providence. As ist of the evening, Jesus Maria roma will appear in the Piano (riccio of Stravinsky, one of the recent scores of the noted Rus composer. The Capriccio was performed in Paris in Decem 1929. Dr. Koussevitzky introduce to this country in the Boston certs of last Dec. 19 and 20, and New York on Jan. 8, on which o sions Sanroma likewise played solo part. The concert will be with Beethoven's First Symphony C major, the score in which the m ter of Bonn was under the influe Mozart a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 17 1931

MUSICAL HARTFORD

Mr. Duffy Pleased With Recer Events in Bushnell Memorial

To the Editor of The Courant:—

Do we not note with interest th sudden cancellation of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra's appearan here? And are we not fortunate having the New York Philharmon Symphony in its stead? We are course, vastly disappointed that t Boston Symphony must break o with us, and we surely hope that will not be a permanent severance.

Musically, thus far, Hartford h been very fortunate. And, witho a doubt, about the most fortuna happening will be the New Yor Philharmonic Symphony's appea ance here. For it is a known fa that Toscanini is one of the greate masters of the baton living today. think, however, that to call him th greatest, when we have already wit nessed such a magnificent perform ance with Stokowski and his orches tra, is unjust to that great Polis conductor. He, too, is great. Is it n as just to call him the greatest our day? Why not say that these tw are the two greatest living con s!

, too, we have just had Pa . Although I believe it to h ing for a Negro artist to d ics as he can, neverthe or demonstrated tha le of a most ar regret, how uld caus eve

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
JAN 18 1931

ORCHESTRAS MARK THE WEEK IN NEW YORK'S MUSIC WORLD

Number Of Interesting Programs Offered By Manhattan, Boston And Philadelphia Groups; Lily Pons Again Draws Capacity To Metropolitan

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

A LOT of good orchestral music has been let forth for the delectation of New York music lovers during the past week. There has been some, too, which while less good intrinsically had a certain melancholy interest. As Toscanini's last concerts draw near his audiences grow larger until the sides of Carnegie Hall threaten to bulge into Seventh avenue and neighboring back yards. We had visits al from the valiant Bostonians, disseminators of musical "cultchaw," and from Philadelphians as well.

Mr. Toscanini gave another Wagner program which equalled in clar- that o ago venth ncert ff Im efully

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATTI, O.
POST
JAN 15 1931

BEREZOWSKY'S AGE IS SURPRISE

Guest Conductor Praises Cincinnati Symphony

DEFENDS MODERN MUSIC

Blond Russian Artist Chooses Varied Program

By May Bogan Dearness

Cincinnatians will have a hard time believing Nicolai Berezowsky is 31 years old when he steps on Emery Auditorium platform Friday afternoon and Saturday night to lead the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Berezowsky, who already has achieved international fame as a composer as well as a conductor, looks to be about 22. He is blond, with gray-blue eyes, a smooth, fair skin and stature probably a little less than medium.

His gracious manners already have won him a place in the hearts of many Cincinnatians.

Praise for Reiner

He lavishly praised the Cincinnati orchestra for its superb musicianship which he credited in great measure to Fritz Reiner, conductor for the last nine years.

Berezowsky deplored the severe criticism of music written in the present day. He refuses to term his music "modern." He believes music is either good or bad, not modern or classic, and judgment should be left to those who are professional. He is anxious that the public be less opinionated on compositions of this century.

The young conductor chose all numbers of his program except Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, which was requested by the Cincinnati office.

For his other three numbers he reached out in as many different directions. One is from the old school, being Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony; another in Stravinsky's Orchestral Suite from the ballet "Petrouchka" of the present-day works, and the last is Ravel's "Daphne et Chloe" Suite No. 2, which Berezowsky refuses to label "modern," but terms "good" present-day music.

Honored by Conductor

Berezowsky came to the United States first in 1922 and entered the first violin section of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Toscannini, who paid him the great tribute several years ago of playing one of Berezowsky's orchestral suites.

In 1926 the Russian artist married Miss Alice Newman, of New Orleans, with whom he became acquainted in Washington at one of Mrs. F. S. Coolidge's famous music festivals at which some of Berezowsky's works were played.

They have a son, Alexander, 1, and make their home in New York.

His wife, who is related to Mrs. J. Walter Freiberg, of Avondale, was expected in Cincinnati Thursday to hear the concerts and return to New York early next week with Mr. Berezowsky, who will immediately begin work there for the concert Feb. 1 of the League of Composers which is offering his latest chamber music composition.

Premiere in Boston

Early in March the composer-conductor will go to Boston for the premiere there of his new Symphony No. 2, which will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next season the Russian artist expects to devote to a new opera which he has been asked to write for a German publisher. This work will necessitate his living in Germany for a time to co-operate with his librettist.

Before undertaking this, however, he expects to write a concerto for two pianos and orchestra, which he has been requested to do for Germaine Schmidt, New York pianist.

He also has an invitation to conduct the famous Persimphans Orchestra in Moscow.

Among his works are two symphonies, two sextets, four string quartets, a piano sonata, suite for orchestra, a violin concert, a phantasy for two pianos and a comic opera.

Mozart's best symphonies are his operas! The remaining piece was the much overplayed Pictures at an Exhibition, by Moussorgsky, in Ravel's version.

At the second concert, Mr. Koussevitzsky, with the assistance of Myra Hess, performed the Beethoven G Major Concerto. As a matter of fact, I think Miss Hess more effective in the music of other composers, but she always plays with charm. The little dialogue between the piano and the strings in the slow movement was exquisitely delivered.

The Seventh Symphony of the same composer and the Egmont Overture also appeared on the program, neither of which need detain us.

PHILADELPHIANS' CONCERT

The Philadelphias were under the stick of Gabrilowitsch, who, fine musician that he is, always seems better at the keyboard than on the podium. Schubert's C Major Symphony. Of Heavenly Length, was the principal work. It was well given and being a true artist, Mr. Gabrilowitsch wanted you to know that it was Schubert and not Gabrilowitsch who was the main point of interest. (Did I hear someone say: What a contrast?)

Vaughan-Williams' First Norfolk Rhapsody was also given, a work based on folk tunes from that province of Britain. Mr. Vaughan-Williams is nothing if not patriotic.

More "intreeging," 'as Lorelei Lee says, were the variously spelled dances from Prince Igor, on this occasion called Polovetzkian. However, they are delightful however you spell them, even if they do need the chorus for their completest effect.

FIRST APPEARANCE

A small orchestral organization composed of players from the Boston Symphony and known as the Boston Chamber Orchestra, under the baton of Nikolas Slovinsky, made a first appearance here. They gave some agreeable music. Mozart's Symphony, written at the age of 8, led off the ball. It is recounted that the youthful composer asked his sister to remind him to give something interesting to the horns. He may have had the same idea in mind years later when he wrote A orns other the ham- ome- n he

IE

al Notes

, MUSICIAN AND ACTOR

"June Moon," an intriguing story of "Tin Pan Alley" is his first stage show.

Born in New York city, says the Boston Globe, Harry moved to Philadelphia with his parents at an early stage. His father was a musician and determined that Harry should be one, too. Harry had no objections. His whole life has been bound up in music.

Even his first job, in Philadelphia's biggest department store, was that of a musician with the store orchestra.

For a time he played with the Philadelphia Symphony. He played under the direction of Victor Herbert as one of his early memories.

The Shuberts brought Harry to New York to play. And then he came to Boston and was the leader of the orchestra at the Hotel Brunswick. It was at this time that Renard and Reisman, names famous to night club patrons of Boston and New York, played under him. Mr. Renard was one of Mr. Rosenthal's visitors at the matinee last Wednesday.

While he was in Boston Harry lived with a sister of the late Maj. Higginson. Looking for a room, Harry rang the wrong doorbell. He interested the woman who answered his ring after he told her he was a musician.

"My brother is sponsor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra," she said. And in the discussion of music that followed Harry found a new friend. She let him have a room in the house, content to listen to his music in return. "Things happen to me like that," says Harry.

Palm Beach, where he played for exclusive dances at the Band and Tennis Club, followed. Six years ago Harry went to London, where he wrote the score for "Bamboola," "Clo-Clo," "Sky High" and "Lady Fair." He came back to the United States to lead his own orchestra and to make new friends in "Bridgeport." "I never see my friends in New York—it's always when I'm somewhere else," said Harry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 15 1931

BUSHNELL SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seldom can a substitution in an important artistic event be made with such satisfaction as has been possible for the Bushnell Memorial management in announcing that instead of the scheduled concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Maestro Arturo Toscanini, will be heard here in April. One would probably find it difficult if not impossible to locate a Hartford lover of music who will not accept the revised arrangements with entire approval. It is safe to assume that the program to be given here will measure up to the high standard of excellence characteristic of the New York organization. Hartford concert-goers will be delighted to see Toscanini in action. His enthusiastic reception in a number of European cities last year is readily recalled as evidence of his fascinating ability to direct a large company of gifted musicians. The proposed concert will add further distinction to the brief but brilliant record of the Bushnell Memorial. This city will await with pleasure the approach of this outstanding musical event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Boston to See Dr. Hadley

Koussevitsky Again Asks Him to Conduct Symphony Orchestra There.

Dr. Henry K. Hadley, well-known propagandist for American composers and music, has been invited by Serge Koussevitsky to conduct three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, January 15, 16 and 17, as guest conductor.

On these programs there will appear Dr. Hadley's new Chinese suite, "Streets of Pekin," as well as his tone poem, "Salome." Carl McKinley, American composer, will be represented by his overture, "Masquerade," which already has been played in Chicago, Detroit and elsewhere. The first number on the program is the Haydn Symphony No. 1 in E flat major.

This is not the first time that Dr. Hadley has been invited to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Former invitations came from Dr. Muck as well as from Monteux and Fiedler, and Koussevitsky extended this courtesy in 1925.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 17 1931

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY HERE TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give its third concert of the season in Providence. As soloist of the evening, Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear in the Piano Capriccio of Stravinsky, one of the most recent scores of the noted Russian composer.

The Capriccio was first performed in Paris in December, 1929. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to this country in the Boston concerts of last Dec. 19 and 20, and to New York on Jan. 8, on which occasions Sanroma likewise played the solo part.

The concert will begin with Beethoven's First Symphony in C major—the score in which the master of Bonn was under the influence of his predecessors, Mozart and Haydn. This Symphony shows much of the charm and elegance of the early masters, while revealing the unmistakable and individual stamp of its creator.

The program will end with three notable excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the Ride of the Valkyries, Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 16 1931

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Stravinsky's New "Cappriccio" is Contrasted With Beethoven's First Symphony and Wagner Items as the Boston Symphony Promises a Soloist.

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returned to the conductor's stand, the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday night will bring to the Albee Theatre a program of great interest and variety. Among the numbers are some of the choicest utterances of the greatest composers of musical history. Snugly tucked away among these epoch-making works is a recent piece by Stravinsky which certainly will afford an amazing interlude of contrast—provoke interesting comparisons between the old, the older and the very new. And no subject in music is more popular and trite than the proper placement of so-called modern music. The Stravinsky piece, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, will be found to be of the most advanced modernity.

The selection of Beethoven's First Symphony for the opening number of the concert is a most happy one. For many years this delightful symphony rarely has appeared on concert programs anywhere, a matter of wonderment and regret. That it was composed in the earlier years of the great master's life in what has been called a period of immaturity of composition does not matter, for it is so much finer and more worthy than so many works composed by others in the full flower of their abilities that it will always stand as one of the great symphonies.

Conspicuous among the many beauties here are the subjects in the first movement, freely tossed from flute to oboe only to be lost in the full orchestra, the mysterious developments of the woodwind, and above all the simple and graceful andante. Some of these phrases suggest the Third and Fifth symphonies where the ideas in Beethoven's mind seek expression in similar but renewed forms.

The last movement is to be thought of as pure music, and in the realm of sound, not of story. Simple messages changing in key with delightful ingenuousness allow the utmost delicacy of expression on the part of the orchestra, to which is added characteristic tone color of the orchestral instruments.

The "Caprice" of Stravinsky is new, having been heard only in Boston and New York. It is a piece of sheer virtuosity and requires the most advanced form of modernistic technique for its performance. No "program" accompanies this work, yet it is far more worthy of titles than many compositions that are so explained. Perhaps one may imagine the sentiment of Bach's Chromatic Fantasia or the "Italian Concerto" in the "Andante rhapsodico" and one surely may think of the most elaborate cabaret jazz in the close, but unless one is very familiar with the most modern idiom of tone association, this work will be most novel and fascinating. At the hands of the enormously gifted Sanroma and the equally perfect orchestra of Koussevitzky, this bit of glittering brilliance will find favor and perhaps imitation. First performed in Paris last season, it has been played in this country only by the artists we shall hear and by them only since December.

The "Ride of the Valkyries" is a popular concert number. It has been transcribed for piano, concert organ and almost every other instrumental combination. It does not suffer by removal from its proper place in the opera, as it is so complete in itself, an heroic episode of tremendous power and impressiveness. Particularly noteworthy is the work of the brass section of the orchestra, where Wagner has placed particular reliance upon the trombones. The "horse riding" motive is no novelty in music yet Wagner was the very first to appreciate its interest and to write it in classic and refined form. The melodramatic description is inseparable from the gorgeous music.

The Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" is considered by many as the greatest of all Wagner's compositions. It was written in a delirium of composition and into it enter the perfection of orchestral technique, and the highest conceptions of the composer's colossal genius. No matter how intimate one is with the score, or how often one hears the work, there are always new beauties to admire and add to one's musical information and knowledge.

From the impressive entrance of the violoncelli followed by the crash of the low woodwind to the last shuddering sob of the end, the hearer is held spellbound by the grandeur of its massed ensemble and by its absolute originality. The bass clarinet, one of the most beautiful of all orchestral instruments, frequently impersonates the singer.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven—Symphony No. 1 in C major. Op. 21.
I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
II. Andante cantabile con moto.
III. Menuetto: Allegro Molto e vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.
Stravinsky—Capriccio for piano and orchestra.
I. Presto.
II. Andante rapsodico.
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.
Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, from "Die Walkure."
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde."
Wagner—Overture to "Rienzi."

stage setting nor voices are needed to complete the greatness of this incomparable work.

As will be seen readily by comparison with the sublime Prelude to "Tristan," the Overture to "Rienzi" belongs to the immature period of Wagner yet, as already said about Beethoven's first symphony, it is nevertheless well worth hearing and intimate acquaintance. Of splendid workmanship, its thematic material and full orchestration have made it a favorite on concert programs. Indeed, its opening passages recall in form those of Caesar Franck's symphony of far more recent vintage. The brass section is very prominent and is one of the very few compositions in which the cornet is used. The use of the military march hymn "con spiritu cavalier" with employment of the snare drum is characteristic and memorable.

Again the catholicity of Dr. Koussevitzky's programs is to be noted and there are many opportunities to hear the virtuosity of all choirs of the orchestra.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
JAN 17 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give its third concert of the season in Providence. As soloist of the evening, Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear in the Piano Capriccio of Stravinsky, one of the most recent scores of the noted Russian composer. The Capriccio was first performed in Paris in December, 1929. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to this country in the Boston concerts of last Dec. 19 and 20, and to New York on Jan. 8, on which occasions Sanroma likewise played the solo part. The concert will begin with Beethoven's First Symphony in C major the score in which the master of Bonn was under the influence of his predecessors, Mozart and Haydn. This symphony shows much of the charm and elegance of the early masters, while revealing the unmistakable and individual stamp of its creator.

The programme will end with three notable excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the Ride of the Valkyries, prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to "Rienzi."

think, he... greatest, when we have already ... nessed such a magnificent performance with Stokowski and his orchestra, is unjust to that great Polish conductor. He, too, is great. Is it not as just to call him the greatest of our day? Why not say that these two are the two greatest living con...s!

...n, too, we have just had Pa... Although I believe it to ... thing for a Negro artist to ... ics as he can, neverthe... demonstrated th... le of a most a... regret, how... uld can... ev...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
JAN 18 1931

ORCHESTRAS MARK THE WEEK IN NEW YORK'S MUSIC WORLD

Number Of Interesting Programs Offered By Manhattan, Boston And Philadelphia Groups; Lily Pons Again Draws Capacity To Metropolitan

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

A LOT of good orchestral music has been let forth for the delectation of New York music lovers during the past week. There has been some, too, which while less good intrinsically had a certain melancholy interest. As Toscanini's last concerts draw near his audiences grow larger until the sides of Carnegie Hall threaten to bulge into Seventh avenue and neighboring back yards. We had visits also from the valiant Bostonians, disseminators of musical "cultchaw," and from Philadelphians as well.

Mr. Toscanini gave another Wagner program which equalled in glory that which he set forth a week or so ago and raised his hearers to the seventh heaven of delight. For another concert he revived the once popular Raff Im Walde Symphony, giving it a carefully detailed performance.

CRITIC'S REACTION

One critic found the symphony "hopelessly outmoded" and the orchestration "old fashioned." How nice to possess such an Olympian point of view! But, how about a good deal of Beethoven's orchestration? Still, I do not wish to start any discussion of such a point.

Along with this the valiant Italian gave d'Indy's Istar Variations, which, it will be remembered, represent the Babylonian goddess performing a sort of Dance of the Seven Veils, each variation representing a veil, until at the end, the theme, and, presumably, the goddess as well, stand revealed as their respective creators fashioned them.

As a closing bit he also gave the overture to an opera of Rossini's which, your correspondent must confess, he had never heard of, namely, The Siege of Corinth. It was like most of Rossini's overtures which Mr. Toscanini seems determined New York shall grow to know, if not to love.

PRESENTS A NOVELTY

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a novelty, a Capriccio by Stravinsky. It was first heard last year in Paris. This time it had as the assistant pianist, the picturesquely named Spanish pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma. The piece represents the sometime cacophonous Igor, in one of his lighter, more sportive moods. The pianist is part of the organization rather than a soloist and the form is three-part though played without break.

The Capriccio is not great mu... It is not even good Stravinsky ... has in it nothing of the charm of ... Firebird, for instance. The themes ... undistinguished and the orchestrat... not outstanding. Here and there th... are flashes of the Stravinsky who w... and who, indeed, may still be, but w... most certainly, at the composing ... this particular piece, was not. M... Sanroma did his part well and wi... complete coordination with the orch... ra.

A MOZART SYMPHONY

Along with this, Mr. Koussevitz... gave Mozart's G Minor Symphony, ... ducing his orchestra to Mozartean pr... portions and playing with beautif... delicacy. But, as someone has sai...

Mozart's best symphonies are his operas! The remaining piece was the much overplayed Pictures at an Exhibition, by Moussorgsky, in Ravel's version.

At the second concert, Mr. Koussevitzsky, with the assistance of Myra Hess, performed the Beethoven G Major Concerto. As a matter of fact, I think Miss Hess more effective in the music of other composers, but she always plays with charm. The little dialogue between the piano and the strings in the slow movement was exquisitely delivered.

The Seventh Symphony of the same composer and the Egmont Overture also appeared on the program, neither of which need detain us.

PHILADELPHIANS' CONCERT

The Philadelphias were under the stick of Gabrilowitsch, who, fine musician that he is, always seems better at the keyboard than on the podium. Schubert's C Major Symphony. Of Heavenly Length, was the principal work. It was well given and being a true artist, Mr. Gabrilowitsch wanted you to know that it was Schubert and not Gabrilowitsch who was the main point of interest. (Did I hear someone say: What a contrast?)

Vaughan-Williams' First Norfolk Rhapsody was also given, a work based on folk tunes from that province of Britain. Mr. Vaughan-Williams is nothing if not patriotic.

More "intreeging,' 'as Lorelei Lee says, were the variously spelled dances from Prince Igor, on this occasion called Polovetzkian. However, they are delightful however you spell them, even if they do need the chorus for their completest effect.

FIRST APPEARANCE

A small orchestral organization composed of players from the Boston Symphony and known as the Boston Chamber Orchestra, under the baton of Nikolas Slovinsky, made a first appearance here. They gave some agreeable music. Mozart's Symphony, written at the age of 8, led off the ball. It is recounted that the youthful composer asked his sister to remind him to give something interesting to the horns. He may have had the same idea in mind years later when he wrote A Musical Joke, also played at this concert, as in one passage he has two horns playing out of tune with one another as a joke on inept composers of the time.

The conductor of the Boston Chamber Orchestra may have had something of the same sort in mind when he

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
JAN 17 19...

Musical Notes

"JUNE MOON" STAR, MUSICIAN AND ACTOR

Harry Rosenthal, starring in "June Moon," the clever Lardner-Kaufman show now running at the Wilbur Theater, Boston, has been writing music and leading his own orchestra for years, but strange "June Moon," an intriguing story of "Tin Pan Alley" is his first stage show.

Born in New York city, says the Boston Globe, Harry moved to Philadelphia with his parents at an early stage. His father was a musician and determined that Harry should be one, too. Harry had no objections. His whole life has been bound up in music.

Even his first job, in Philadelphia's biggest department store, was that of a musician with the store orchestra.

For a time he played with the Philadelphia Symphony. He played under the direction of Victor Herbert as one of his early memories.

The Shuberts brought Harry to New York to play. And then he came to Boston and was the leader of the orchestra at the Hotel Brunswick. It was at this time that Renard and Reisman, names famous to night club patrons of Boston and New York, played under him. Mr. Renard was one of Mr. Rosenthal's visitors at the matinee last Wednesday.

While he was in Boston Harry lived with a sister of the late Maj. Higginson. Looking for a room, Harry rang the wrong doorbell. He interested the woman who answered his ring after he told her he was a musician.

"My brother is sponsor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra," she said. And in the discussion of music that followed Harry found a new friend. She let him have a room in the house, content to listen to his music in return. "Things happen to me like that," says Harry.

Palm Beach, where he played for exclusive dances at the Band and Tennis Club, followed. Six years ago Harry went to London, where he wrote the score for "Bamboola," "Clo-Clo," "Sky High" and "Lady Fair." He came back to the United States to lead his own orchestra and to make new friends in "Bridgeport." "I never see my friends in New York—it's always when I'm somewhere else," said Harry.

...ncinnati Facilities To Be Made Available to Others

...The plan for co-ordination of law ...nforcement agencies in Hamilton, ...tler, Warren, Clermont, Camp... ...ell and Kenton counties soon will ...become a reality, it became appar... ...nt Thursday as officials in various ...communities affected made known ...heir opinions.

...The plan, submitted Wednesday ... the Cincinnati Regional Crime ...ommittee by the Cincinnati Bu... ...au of Governmental Research, ...lls for a unification of 147 police ...genoies in the cities, towns, villages, ...owships and magisterial districts ...f the six counties.

...Lack of a co-ordinated system of ...entification and of rapid means of ...mmunication and apprehension

UNDS ONLY OBSTACLE

...fficials of Neighboring Cities
O K Anticrime Scheme

WINS FAVOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 15 1931

BUSHNELL SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seldom can a substitution in an important artistic event be made with such satisfaction as has been possible for the Bushnell Memorial management in announcing that instead of the scheduled concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Maestro Arturo Toscanini, will be heard here in April. One would probably find it difficult if not impossible to locate a Hartford lover of music who will not accept the revised arrangements with entire approval. It is safe to assume that the program to be given here will measure up to the high standard of excellence characteristic of the New York organization. Hartford concert-goers will be delighted to see Toscanini in action. His enthusiastic reception in a number of European cities last year is readily recalled as evidence of his fascinating ability to direct a large company of gifted musicians. The proposed concert will add further distinction to the brief but brilliant record of the Bushnell Memorial. This city will await with pleasure the approach of this outstanding musical event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Boston to See Dr. Hadley

Koussevitsky Again Asks Him to Conduct Symphony Orchestra There.

Dr. Henry K. Hadley, well-known propagandist for American composers and music, has been invited by Serge Koussevitsky to conduct three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, January 15, 16 and 17, as guest conductor.

On these programs there will appear Dr. Hadley's new Chinese suite, "Streets of Pekin," as well as his tone poem, "Salome." Carl McKinley, American composer, will be represented by his overture, "Masquerade," which already has been played in Chicago, Detroit and elsewhere. The first number on the program is the Haydn Symphony No. 1 in E flat major.

This is not the first time that Dr. Hadley has been invited to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Former invitations came from Dr. Muck as well as from Monteux and Fiedler, and Koussevitsky extended this courtesy in 1925.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 17 1931

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY HERE TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give its third concert of the season in Providence. As soloist of the evening, Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear in the Piano Capriccio of Stravinsky, one of the most recent scores of the noted Russian composer.

The Capriccio was first performed in Paris in December, 1929. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to this country in the Boston concerts of last Dec. 19 and 20, and to New York on Jan. 8, on which occasions Sanroma likewise played the solo part.

The concert will begin with Beethoven's First Symphony in C major—the score in which the master of Bonn was under the influence of his predecessors, Mozart and Haydn. This Symphony shows much of the charm and elegance of the early masters, while revealing the unmistakable and individual stamp of its creator.

The program will end with three notable excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the Ride of the Valkyries, Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 16 1931

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Stravinsky's New "Cappriccio" is Contrasted With Beethoven's First Symphony and Wagner Items as the Boston Symphony Promises a Soloist.

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returned to the conductor's stand, the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday night will bring to the Albee Theatre a program of great interest and variety. Among the numbers are some of the choicest utterances of the greatest composers of musical history. Snugly tucked away among these epoch-making works is a recent piece by Stravinsky which certainly will afford an amazing interlude of contrast—provoke interesting comparisons between the old, the older and the very new. And no subject in music is more popular and trite than the proper placement of so-called modern music. The Stravinsky piece, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, will be found to be of the most advanced modernity.

The selection of Beethoven's First Symphony for the opening number of the concert is a most happy one. For many years this delightful symphony rarely has appeared on concert programs anywhere, a matter of wonderment and regret. That it was composed in the earlier years of the great master's life in what has been called a period of immaturity of composition does not matter, for it is so much finer and more worthy than so many works composed by others in the full flower of their abilities that it will always stand as one of the great symphonies.

Conspicuous among the many beauties here are the subjects in the first movement, freely tossed from flute to oboe only to be lost in the full orchestra, the mysterious developments of the woodwind, and above all the simple and graceful andante. Some of these phrases suggest the Third and Fifth symphonies where the ideas in Beethoven's mind seek expression in similar but renewed forms.

The last movement is to be thought of as pure music, and in the realm of sound, not of story. Simple messages changing in key with delightful ingenuousness allow the utmost delicacy of expression on the part of the orchestra, to which is added characteristic tone color of the orchestral instruments.

The "Caprice" of Stravinsky is new, having been heard only in Boston and New York. It is a piece of sheer virtuosity and requires the most advanced form of modernistic technique for its performance. No "program" accompanies this work, yet it is far more worthy of titles than many compositions that are so explained. Perhaps one may imagine the sentiment of Bach's Chromatic Fantasia or the "Italian Concerto" in the "Andante rhapsodico" and one surely may think of the most elaborate cabaret jazz in the close, but unless one is very familiar with the most modern idiom of tone association, this work will be most novel and fascinating. At the hands of the enormously gifted Sanroma and the equally perfect orchestra of Koussevitzky, this bit of glittering brilliance will find favor and perhaps imitation. First performed in Paris last season, it has been played in this country only by the artists we shall hear and by them only since December.

The "Ride of the Valkyries" is a popular concert number. It has been transcribed for piano, concert organ and almost every other instrumental combination. It does not suffer by removal from its proper place in the opera, as it is so complete in itself, an heroic episode of tremendous power and impressiveness. Particularly noteworthy is the work of the brass section of the orchestra, where Wagner has placed particular reliance upon the trombones. The "horse riding" motive is no novelty in music yet Wagner was the very first to appreciate its interest and to write it in classic and refined form. The melodramatic description is inseparable from the gorgeous music.

The Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" is considered by many as the greatest of all Wagner's compositions. It was written in a delirium of composition and into it enter the perfection of orchestral technique, and the highest conceptions of the composer's colossal genius. No matter how intimate one is with the score, or how often one hears the work, there are always new beauties to admire and add to one's musical information and knowledge.

From the impressive entrance of the violoncelli followed by the crash of the low woodwind to the last shudder and sob of the end, the hearer is held spellbound by the grandeur of its massed ensemble and by its absolute originality. The bass clarinet, one of the most beautiful of all orchestral instruments, frequently impersonates the singer.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven—Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21.
I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
II. Andante cantabile con moto.
III. Menuetto; Allegro Molto e vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale; Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.
Stravinsky—Capriccio for piano and orchestra.
I. Presto.
II. Andante rapsodico
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.
Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, from "Die Walkure."
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde."
Wagner—Overture to "Rienzi."

stage setting nor voices are needed to complete the greatness of this incomparable work.

As will be seen readily by comparison with the sublime Prelude to "Tristan," the Overture to "Rienzi" belongs to the immature period of Wagner yet, as already said about Beethoven's first symphony, it is nevertheless well worth hearing and intimate acquaintance. Of splendid workmanship, its thematic material and full orchestration have made it a favorite on concert programs. Indeed, its opening passages recall in form those of Caesar Franck's symphony of far more recent vintage. The brass section is very prominent and is one of the very few compositions in which the cornet is used. The use of the military march hymn "con spiritu cavalier" with employment of the snare drum is characteristic and memorable.

Again the catholicity of Dr. Koussevitzky's programs is to be noted and there are many opportunities to hear the virtuosity of all choirs of the orchestra.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
JAN 17 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give its third concert of the season in Providence. As soloist of the evening, Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear in the Piano Capriccio of Stravinsky, one of the most recent scores of the noted Russian composer. The Capriccio was first performed in Paris in December, 1929. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to this country in the Boston concerts of last Dec. 19 and 20, and to New York on Jan. 8, on which occasions Sanroma likewise played the solo part. The concert will begin with Beethoven's First Symphony in C major—the score in which the master of Bonn was under the influence of his predecessors, Mozart and Haydn. This symphony shows much of the charm and elegance of the early masters, while revealing the unmistakable and individual stamp of its creator.

The programme will end with three notable excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner—the Ride of the Valkyries, prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
JAN 18 1931

ORCHESTRAS MARK THE WEEK IN NEW YORK'S MUSIC WORLD

Number Of Interesting Programs Offered By Manhattan, Boston And Philadelphia Groups; Lily Pons Again Draws Capacity To Metropolitan

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

A LOT of good orchestral music has been let forth for the delectation of New York music lovers during the past week. There has been some, too, which while less good intrinsically had a certain melancholy interest. As Toscanini's last concerts draw near his audiences grow larger until the sides of Carnegie Hall threaten to bulge into Seventh avenue and neighboring back yards. We had visits also from the valiant Bostonians, disseminators of musical "cultchaw," and from Philadelphians as well.

Mr. Toscanini gave another Wagner program which equalled in glory that which he set forth a week or so ago and raised his hearers to the seventh heaven of delight. For another concert he revived the once popular Raff Im Walde Symphony, giving it a carefully detailed performance.

CRITIC'S REACTION

One critic found the symphony "hopelessly outmoded" and the orchestration "old fashioned." How nice to possess such an Olympian point of view! But, how about a good deal of Beethoven's orchestration? Still, I do not wish to start any discussion of such a point.

Along with this the valiant Italian gave d'Indy's Istar Variations, which, it will be remembered, represent the Babylonian goddess performing a sort of Dance of the Seven Veils, each variation representing a veil, until at the end, the theme, and, presumably, the goddess as well, stand revealed as their respective creators fashioned them.

As a closing bit he also gave the overture to an opera of Rossini's which, your correspondent must confess, he had never heard of, namely, The Siege of Corinth. It was like most of Rossini's overtures which Mr. Toscanini seem determined New York shall grow to know, if not to love.

PRESENTS A NOVELTY

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a novelty, a Capriccio by Stravinsky. It was first heard last year in Paris. This time it had as the assistant pianist, the picturesquely named Spanish pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma. The piece represents the sometime cacophonous Igor, in one of his lighter, more sportive moods. The pianist is part of the organization rather than a soloist and the form is three-part though played without break.

The Capriccio is not great music. It is not even good Stravinsky and has in it nothing of the charm of the Firebird, for instance. The themes are undistinguished and the orchestration not outstanding. Here and there there are flashes of the Stravinsky who was, and who, indeed, may still be, but who most certainly, at the composing of this particular piece, was not. Mr. Sanroma did his part well and with complete coordination with the orchestra.

A MOZART SYMPHONY

Along with this, Mr. Koussevitzky gave Mozart's G Minor Symphony, reducing his orchestra to Mozartean proportions and playing with beautiful delicacy. But, as someone has said, Mozart's best symphonies are his operas! The remaining piece was the much overplayed Pictures at an Exhibition, by Moussorgsky, in Ravel's version.

At the second concert, Mr. Koussevitzsky, with the assistance of Myra Hess, performed the Beethoven G Major Concerto. As a matter of fact, I think Miss Hess more effective in the music of other composers, but she always plays with charm. The little dialogue between the piano and the strings in the slow movement was exquisitely delivered.

The Seventh Symphony of the same composer and the Egmont Overture also appeared on the program, neither of which need detain us.

PHILADELPHIANS' CONCERT

The Philadelphias were under the stick of Gabrilowitsch, who, fine musician that he is, always seems better at the keyboard than on the podium. Schubert's C Major Symphony. Of Heavenly Length, was the principal work. It was well given and being a true artist, Mr. Gabrilowitsch wanted you to know that it was Schubert and not Gabrilowitsch who was the main point of interest. (Did I hear someone say: What a contrast?)

Vaughan-Williams' First Norfolk Rhapsody was also given, a work based on folk tunes from that province of Britain. Mr. Vaughan-Williams is nothing if not patriotic.

More "intreeging," 'as Lorelei Lee says, were the variously spelled dances from Prince Igor, on this occasion called Polovetzkian. However, they are delightful however you spell them, even if they do need the chorus for their completest effect.

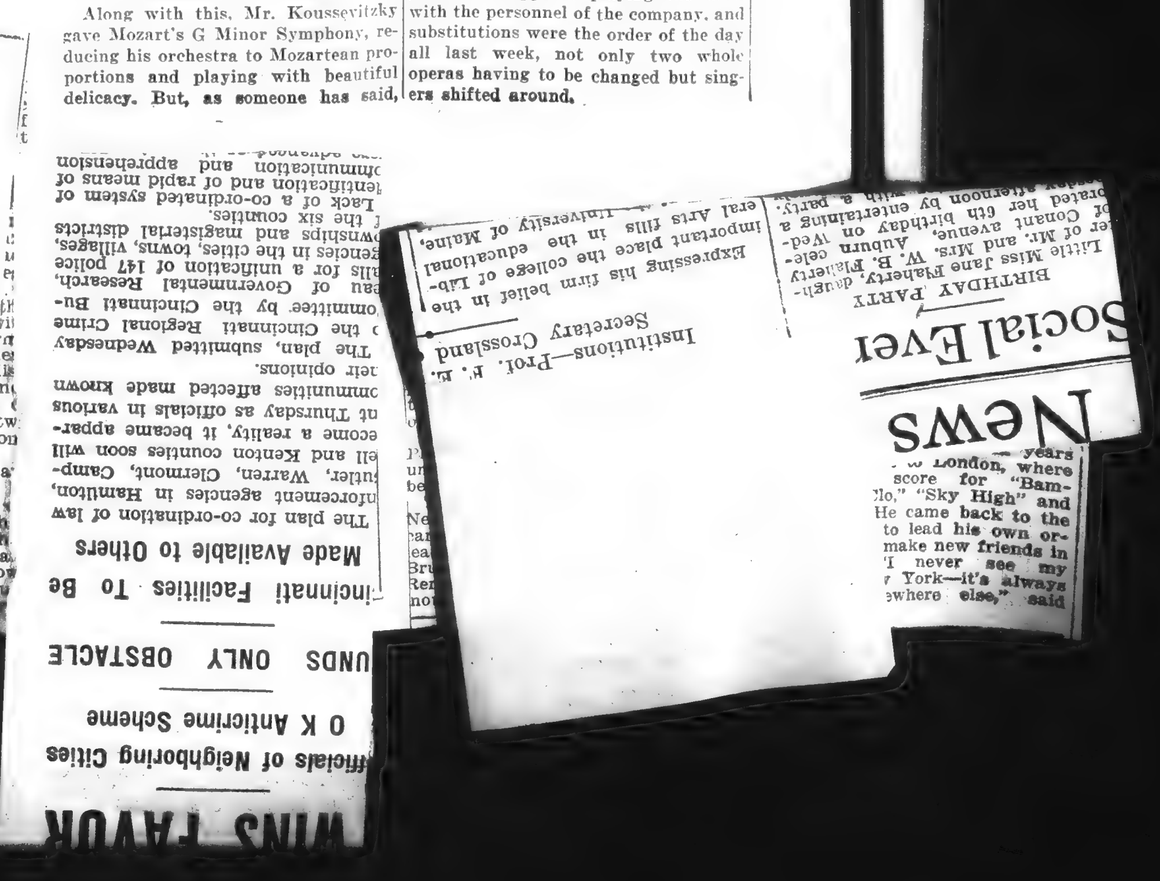
FIRST APPEARANCE

A small orchestral organization composed of players from the Boston Symphony and known as the Boston Chamber Orchestra, under the baton of Nikolas Slovinsky, made a first appearance here. They gave some agreeable music. Mozart's Symphony, written at the age of 8, led off the ball. It is recounted that the youthful composer asked his sister to remind him to give something interesting to the horns. He may have had the same idea in mind years later when he wrote A Musical Joke, also played at this concert, as in one passage he has two horns playing out of tune with one another as a joke on inept composers of the time.

The conductor of the Boston Chamber Orchestra may have had something of the same sort in mind when he included works by Ruggles and Henry Cowell on the same program. Mr. Cowell, it will be remembered, writes music for the piano which is played with the flat of the fist, the forearm from wrist to elbow, and even with . . . but we draw the veil. None of the pieces given need bother us.

PONS AT METROPOLITAN

Lily Pons, at the Metropolitan, again drew a capacity house to hear her in Rigoletto. The performance, except for Miss Pons, was undistinguished. Grippe is playing the devil with the personnel of the company, and substitutions were the order of the day all last week, not only two whole operas having to be changed but singers shifted around.



Musically Speaking

HELEN CALVERT McGRAW

Miss McGraw, Baltimore pianist, won the Walter Naumberg Musical Foundation Prize last year in a national competition which started with 169 entrants and dwindled down to 15. The award was worth about $1500 and provided her recital debut in New York. This will take place January 18 in Town Hall, the program she has selected for it being two Intermezzi from Brahms' Op. 118, Chopin's F minor Fantaisie, two Etudes from Scriabin's Op. 8, two Preludes by Debussy —"La Terrace des Audiences du Clair de Lune" and "Ce Qu'a Vu le Vent d'Ouest"—and Schumann's Carnaval.

Miss McGraw studied at the Peabody Conservatory with Alexander Sklarevski and at the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris with Cortot.

In more respects than one, the Beethoven Festival given a short time ago in Washington, under the management of Mrs. Wilson Greene, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go down as one of the truly memorable events even of the American musical season of 1930-31.

The very fact that a venture of this kind in a time such as this was a financial success was in itself not only surprising, but very decidedly encouraging. That so many people could be got together anywhere for a succession of Beethoven concerts strikes us as anomalous, to say the least. Perhaps, though, many things that are called anomalies are only seemingly so; it may be that all of us are too apt to base our judgments upon merely superficial indications and manifestations, and that there are deep forces at work which will, without conscious effort or ballyhoo on the part of any organized group, bring order out of the chaos into which the arts have fallen since the war and to establish again something like an aesthetic equilibrium.

Certainly there can be no greater steadying power than that yielded by the authentic masters; by becoming familiar with the criteria they established the intelligent person goes a long way towards putting himself in position to detect the false from the true in modern expression.

A Beautiful Performance

Some such thoughts as these occurred to us as a result of hearing the closing performance of the Beethoven Festival, the program of which consisted of the first and the last (Ninth or Choral) symphonies. It was the only one of the concerts we had a chance to attend and it was an inspiration from first to last. After a long siege of clamor, spiritual and otherwise, we felt, as it were, as if we had been through some mystic process of purification.

Both works were superbly read. The First Symphony came almost as a novelty, so seldom is it played. This is hard to understand, since it contains the material of greatness and has a Scherzo which Beethoven himself or anybody else rarely excelled.

We had not heard the Ninth since it was given here years ago by the defunct Baltimore Oratorio Society under the late Joseph Pache's direction. It has always been one of the marvels of the world to us. To think that Beethoven closed such a tragic career as his with a Hymn to Joy has a soothing and reassuring effect when one becomes too bitter about human nature.

The choral part was admirably sung by the National Capital Oratorio Association chorus, which evidently had been painstakingly trained by its leader, Albert W. Harned, and a first rate quartet of soloists—Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada van der Veer, Dan Gridley and Fraser Gange.

Koussevitzky

We have never had a better opportunity than this to study at close range the work of the Boston Symphony's director, Serge Koussevitzky. From this observation there arose the conviction that there are few orchestral leaders more amply endowed than he, both by way of temperamental qualification and schooling.

He seems actually to live the music; to suffer and exult with it. All this inner experience is reflected, not alone in the effects he gets out of his orchestra, but by his gesture and his facial expression. Both are quite as eloquent as those of the most accomplished actor, but if we have made you think there is anything of the poseur or actor about him, we have given utterly the wrong impression.

As for the Boston Sympony itself, it is as good as it was in the palmiest of its pre-war days when you couldn't get a seat to hear it at the Lyric for love or money. And now it is not considered safe to bring it here for more than one performance a season. What a pity!

We were told that about a hundred Baltimore people bought seats for the Washington Festival—it took place in the beautiful D. A. R. Continental Hall—and could not help wondering how many more would have gone had it been held here. Judging from the attendance at some of our affairs featuring musical artists of international renown, we should say that it was high time the real music lovers of Baltimore were doing something to make the city safe for the musical arts.

Kreisler

Though the audience at Kreisler's annual recital did not, as it so often used to do, overflow to the stage, it was the only one of the pre-Christmas season that even approximately filled all of the seats at the Lyric—not even Paderewski brought that about, though 5,000 heard him in Washington. Kreisler, indeed, is one of the very few who retain their drawing power. He has that rare thing about his art, or more properly, perhaps, about his personality as an artist and man, that appeals alike to 107

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE

MUSIC

By NOEL STRAUS

NEW YORK, Jan. 17.—To Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra New York is indebted for the first hearing of many an important novelty. It is quite some time, however, since the esteemed conductor and his men have introduced a new work here which so immediately caught the fancy of an audience as Igor Stravinsky's "Capriccio," which held the place of honor on the visiting organization's second program of the season presented in Carnegie hall.

When the "Capriccio," which is in the nature of a concerto for piano and orchestra, was given its world premiere at a concert of the Orchestra Symphonique of Paris on Dec. 6, 1929, under the direction of Ernest Ansermet, with Stravinsky as soloist, Moussourgsky's "Pictures of an Exhibition" figured on the list. This same set of pieces, in the orchestral garb provided for them by Ravel, found a place on the Carnegie hall bill, which was rounded out by the Mozart Symphony in G Minor.

The "Capriccio" made its local entry under the most auspicious circumstances. With Jesus Maria Sanroma officiating at the piano, it reveled in a dazzingly brilliant performance in which the virtuosity of the assisting artist and that of the orchestra were alike breathtaking. Mr. Sanroma, who had scored heavily when he first appeared in this city under the same baton in the Toch concerto, again proved an incomparable interpreter of modernistic music for his instrument at this reappearance. Conquering the extreme difficulties of the keyboard score with amazing ease, he made his share in the reading noteworthy for clarity, crispness and tonal glamour.

Those who expected that the "Capriccio" would bear any resemblance in style to the "Sacre" or the earlier methods of the composer in the "Firebird" and "Petruchka," were destined to be surprised, as well as any in the audience prepared to hear another effort in the mock-classical vein of "Musagetes." Like the latter, it exemplified Stravinsky's recent preoccupation with neo-classicism. But as might have been anticipated from Stravinsky's constant change of manner from one work to another, the "Capriccio" again showed its author in an entirely new light. In the almost forgotten piano concerto, he had adhered closely to Bach and Handel in his choice of thematic material and coupled the solo part to a jazz accompaniment. Reverting to a retes," he had

, founded on
, much the ent concerto which once for its subom innumerits coloring solutely dif-

y of its pre-ky's output.
a changed its harmonic is also distury roman-ir effect not the first of out in prac-
the elaborate filigree of the highly ornamental passage-work that forms one of the chief characteristics of the opus. Each plays his role in the second division, entitled "Andante rapsodico," while the final "Allegro capriccioso" goes to Vienna and the cabarets, as melodic sources. And yet because of its individual treatment, the work successfully manages to achieve a satisfactory sense of unity, despite this hodgepodge of ingredients.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE
JAN 18 1931

Igor Stravinsky Returns to Melody with Capriccio

Composer's Work, Modern in Chronological Rather Than Technical Sense, on Boston Symphony Program.—Popularity With Audiences Predicted

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It had been the intention of Dr. Koussevitzky when last the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Providence to give his audience a taste of musical modernity in the shape of Igor Stravinsky's new Capriccio for piano and orchestra and of a Symphony by Stravinsky's young compatriot, Nicholas Nabokov. The conductor's illness postponed the Boston premiere of Stravinsky's composition and the essential rehearsals for it, and Providence received instead a program of familiar pieces.

But Providence is to have the Capriccio after all, at the concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, although Nabokov's individual and genuinely charming Symphony will not accompanion it. Instead, the symphony is to be Beethoven's First, and three excerpts from the operas of Wagner conclude the list.

In connection with Nabokov's Symphony and Stravinsky's Capriccio the term "musical modernity" is to be taken in the chronological rather than in any technical sense—unless it be that these pieces represent something newer than the latest cacophonies, split intervals, combined tonalities or what-you-will: namely, a return to melody, to a simple and direct musical appeal. The public never really warmed to the other sort of thing, though the radical composers did not lack apologists among the critical fraternity nor imitators among the fledgling composers who lisped in dissonance. In the meanwhile Stravinsky, who with Arnold Schoenberg was one of the two fountain-heads of the post-Debussyan, anti-everything-that-has-gone-before music, has become a reactionary. Had become one, indeed, before this Capriccio was written. In his piano concerto he returned, in spirit at least, to Bach; in his "Oedipus Rex" to Monteverde and Handel; in his "Apollon Musagete" to Lully, Bellini and Desilbes; in another ballet to Tchaikowski.

There are passages in the new Capric-cio, to be sure, that suggest the pungency of the earlier Stravinsky, the Stravinsky of "Petrushka," if not the acerbities and asperities of "Le Sacre du Printemps." With these more individual measures of the authentic Stravinsky, measures of a hard, dry brilliance that only he could have achieved and that in part make the piece a distinguished contribution to the "literature" of piano and orchestra, come pages that, as one Boston reviewer happily phrased it, recall the "euphonious banalities" of minor 19th century composers.

Possibly Stravinsky now wishes to appear as a musical democrat, and in place of music that is caviar to the general write music that is quite within the ready comprehension of the man in the street. The Capriccio is destined to be popular with audiences. Three different assemblages at Symphony Hall have risen to it, deceived it with open arms, with a spontaneous enthusiasm that few contemporary pieces have evoked. Incidentally the presentation given it by Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the young Porto Rican-American pianist, is an admirable one, exactly tuned to the mood and tempo of the music.

Even if the Capriccio were formidable, cryptic or abetruse, there would be abundant foil to it in Tuesday evening's program. The First Symphony of Beethoven, which Dr. Koussevitzky conducts delightfully, is a pleasant, sprightly music, with occasional hints of the Beethoven to come but with more suggestion of the Haydn and Mozart that had gone before. Given a performance such as the Boston orchestra now gives it, this Symphony in C-major makes agreeable, even stimulating entertainment.

And for the average concert-goer there are no orchestral pieces more satisfying than the overtures and preludes to the to the operas of Wagner and those instrumental excerpts from those works that find their way to the concert hall. For Tuesday's program, to match the early Beethoven of the First Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen the early Wagner of the Overture to "Rienzi," a similar fusion of the prophetic and the derivative. Here "Tannhauser" is anticipated and Meyerbeer is remembered, though the elder composer could not have summoned a tenth of the younger's gusto.

This Overture to "Rienzi" is the final number. Before it come the "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure," that discloses Wagner the painter of huge frescoes, and the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" that reveal the greater Wagner, the Wagner who could plumb as has no other composer the depths of the human heart. To pass from the raptures of the dying Isolde to the circus pomps of "Rienzi" is to negotiate a descent from the sublime to something that now and then verge on the ridiculous. But it is a tradition that the loudest part of an orchestral program should always come at its close.

Musically Speaking

HELEN CALVERT MCGRAW

Miss McGraw, Baltimore pianist, won the Walter Naumberg Musical Foundation Prize last year in a national competition which started with 169 entrants and dwindled down to 15. The award was worth about $1500 and provided her recital debut in New York. This will take place January 18 in Town Hall, the program she has selected for it being two Intermezzi from Brahms' Op. 118, Chopin's F minor Fantasie, two Etudes from Scriabin's Op. 8, two Preludes by Debussy —"La Terrace des Audiences du Clair de Lune" and "Ce Qu'a Vu le Vent d'Ouest" — and Schumann's Carnaval.

Miss McGraw studied at the Peabody Conservatory with Alexander Sklarevski and at the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris with Cortot.

In more respects than one, the Beethoven Festival given a short time ago in Washington, under the management of Mrs. Wilson Greene, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go down as one of the truly memorable events even of the American musical season of 1930-31.

The very fact that a venture of this kind in a time such as this was a financial success was in itself not only surprising, but very decidedly encouraging. That so many people could be got together anywhere for a succession of Beethoven concerts strikes us as anomalous, to say the least. Perhaps, though, many things that are called anomalies are only seemingly so: it may be that all of us are too apt to base our judgments upon merely superficial indications and manifestations, and that there are deep forces at work which will, without conscious effort or ballyhoo on the part of any organized group, bring order out of the chaos into which the arts have fallen since the war and to establish again something like an aesthetic equilibrium.

Certainly there can be no greater steadying power than that yielded by the authentic masters: by becoming familiar with the criteria they established the intelligent person goes a long way towards putting himself in position to detect the false from the true in modern expression.

A Beautiful Performance

Some such thoughts as these occurred to us as a result of hearing the closing performance of the Beethoven Festival, the program of which consisted of the first and the last (Ninth or Choral) symphonies. It was the only one of the concerts we had a chance to attend and it was an inspiration from first to last. After a long siege of clamor, spiritual and otherwise, we felt, as it were, as if we had been through some mystic process of purification.

Both works were superbly read. The First Symphony came almost as a novelty, so seldom is it played. This is hard to understand, since it contains the material of greatness and has a Scherzo which Beethoven himself or anybody else rarely excelled.

We had not heard the Ninth since it was given here years ago by the defunct Baltimore Oratorio Society under the late Joseph Pache's direction. It has always been one of the marvels of the world to us. To think that Beethoven closed such a tragic career as his with a Hymn to Joy has a soothing and reassuring effect when one becomes too bitter about human nature.

The choral part was admirably sung by the National Capital Oratorio Association chorus, which evidently had been painstakingly trained by its leader, Albert W. Harned, and a first rate quartet of soloists—Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada van der Veer, Dan Gridley and Fraser Gange.

Koussevitzky

We have never had a better opportunity than this to study at close range the work of the Boston Symphony's director, Serge Koussevitzky. From this observation there arose the conviction that there are few orchestral leaders more amply endowed than he, both by way of temperamental qualification and schooling.

He seems actually to live the music: to suffer and exult with it. All this inner experience is reflected, not alone in the effects he gets out of his orchestra, but by his gesture and his facial expression. Both are quite as eloquent as those of the most accomplished actor, but if we have made you think there is anything of the poseur or actor about him, we have given utterly the wrong impression.

As for the Boston Sympony itself, it is as good as it was in the palmiest of its pre-war days when you couldn't get a seat to hear it at the Lyric for love or money. And now it is not considered safe to bring it here for more than one performance a season. What a pity!

We were told that about a hundred Baltimore people bought seats for the Washington Festival—it took place in the beautiful D. A. R. Continental Hall—and could not help wondering how many more would have gone had it been held here. Judging from the attendance at some of our affairs featuring musical artists of international renown, we should say that it was high time the real music lovers of Baltimore were doing something to make the city safe for the musical arts.

Kreisler

Though the audience at Kreisler's annual recital did not, as it so often used to do, overflow to the stage, it was the only one of the pre-Christmas season that even approximately filled all of the seats at the Lyric—not even Paderewski brought that about, though 5,000 heard him in Washington. Kreisler, indeed, is one of the very few who retain their drawing power. He has that rare thing about his art, or more properly, perhaps, about his personality as an artist and man, that appeals alike to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE
JAN 18 1931

MUSIC

By NOEL STRAUS

NEW YORK, Jan. 17.—To Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra New York is indebted for the first hearing of many an important novelty. It is quite some time, however, since the esteemed conductor and his men have introduced a new work here which so immediately caught the fancy of an audience as Igor Stravinsky's "Capriccio," which held the place of honor on the visiting organization's second program of the season presented in Carnegie hall.

When the "Capriccio," which is in the nature of a concerto for piano and orchestra, was given its world premiere at a concert of the Orchestra Symphonique of Paris on Dec. 6, 1929, under the direction of Ernest Ansermet, with Stravinsky as soloist, Moussourgsky's "Pictures of an Exhibition" figured on the list. This same set of pieces, in the orchestral garb provided for them by Ravel, found a place on the Carnegie hall bill, which was rounded out by the Mozart Symphony in G Minor.

The "Capriccio" made its local entry under the most auspicious circumstances. With Jesus Maria Sanroma officiating at the piano, it reveled in a dazzingly brilliant performance in which the virtuosity of the assisting artist and that of the orchestra were alike breathtaking. Mr. Sanroma, who had scored heavily when he first appeared in this city under the same baton in the Toch concerto, again proved an incomparable interpreter of modernistic music for his instrument at this reappearance. Conquering the extreme difficulties of the keyboard score with amazing ease, he made his share in the reading noteworthy for clarity, crispness and tonal glamour.

Those who expected that the "Capriccio" would bear any resemblance in style to the "Sacre" or the earlier methods of the composer in the "Firebird" and "Petruchka," were destined to be surprised, as well as any in the audience prepared to hear another effort in the mock-classical vein of "Musagetes." Like the latter, it exemplified Stravinsky's recent preoccupation with neo-classicism. But as might have been anticipated from Stravinsky's constant change of manner from one work to another, the "Capriccio" again showed its author in an entirely new light. In the almost forgotten piano concerto, he had adhered closely to Bach and Handel in his choice of thematic material and coupled the solo part to a jazz accompaniment. Reverting to a remoter past in "Musagetes," he had given that composition, founded on 17th century models, much the character of an ancient concerto grosso.

But the "Capriccio," which once more turns backward for its subject matter, pilfers from innumerable sources, while in its coloring it achieves a quality absolutely different from that of any of its predecessors in Stravinsky's output. Likewise it stands on a changed rhythmic basis, and its harmonic and melodic treatment is also dissimilar. Nineteenth century romantic influences show their effect not only on the themes of the first of the three movements, but in practically all of the elaborate filigree of the highly ornamental passagework that forms one of the chief characteristics of the opus. Each plays his role in the second division, entitled "Andante rapsodico," while the final "Allegro capriccioso" goes to Vienna and the cabarets, as melodic sources. And yet because of its individual treatment, the work successfully manages to achieve a satisfactory sense of unity, despite this hodgepodge of ingredients.

Igor Stravinsky Returns to Melody with Capriccio

Composer's Work, Modern in Chronological Rather Than Technical Sense, on Boston Symphony Program.—Popularity With Audiences Predicted

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It had been the intention of Dr. Koussevitzky when last the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Providence to give his audience a taste of musical modernity in the shape of Igor Stravinsky's new Capriccio for piano and orchestra and of a Symphony by Stravinsky's young compatriot, Nicholas Nabokov. The conductor's illness postponed the Boston premiere of Stravinsky's composition and the essential rehearsals for it, and Providence received instead a program of familiar pieces.

But Providence is to have the Capriccio after all, at the concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, although Nabokov's individual and genuinely charming Symphony will not accompany it. Instead, the symphony is to be Beethoven's First, and three excerpts from the operas of Wagner conclude the list.

In connection with Nabokov's Symphony and Stravinsky's Capriccio the term "musical modernity" is to be taken in the chronological rather than in any technical sense—unless it be that these pieces represent something newer than the latest cacophonies, split intervals, combined tonalities or whatyou-will: namely, a return to melody, to a simple and direct musical appeal. The public never really warmed to the other sort of thing, though the radical composers did not lack apologists among the critical fraternity nor imitators among the fledgling composers who lisped in dissonance. In the meanwhile Stravinsky, who with Arnold Schoenberg was one of the two fountain-heads of the post-Debussyan, anti-everything-that-had-gone-before music, has become a reactionary. Had become one, indeed, before this Capriccio was written. In his piano concerto he returned, in spirit at least, to Bach; in his "Oedipus Rex" to Monteverde and Handel; in his "Apollon Musagete" to Lully, Bellini and Desilbes; in another ballet to Tchaikowski.

There are passages in the new Capric-

cio, to be sure, that suggest the pungency of the earlier Stravinsky, the Stravinsky of "Petrushka," if not the acerbities and asperities of "Le Sacre du Printemps." With these more individual measures of the authentic Stravinsky, measures of a hard, dry brilliance that only he could have achieved and that in part make the piece a distinguished contribution to the "literature" of piano and orchestra, come pages that, as one Boston reviewer happily phrased it, recall the "euphonious banalities" of minor 19th century composers.

Possibly Stravinsky now wishes to appear as a musical democrat, and in place of music that is caviar to the general write music that is quite within the ready comprehension of the man in the street. The Capriccio is destined to be popular with audiences. Three different assemblages at Symphony Hall have risen to it, deceived it with open arms, with a spontaneous enthusiasm that few contemporary pieces have evoked. Incidentally the presentation given it by Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the young Porto [illegible] pianist, is an admirable [illegible]

Musically Speaking

HELEN CALVERT MCGRAW

Miss McGraw, Baltimore pianist, won the Walter Naumberg Musical Foundation Prize last year in a national competition which started with 169 entrants and dwindled down to 15. The award was worth about $1500 and provided her recital debut in New York. This will take place January 18 in Town Hall, the program she has selected for it being two Intermezzi from Brahms' Op. 118, Chopin's F minor Fantaisie, two Etudes from Scriabin's Op. 8, two Preludes by Debussy —"La Terrace des Audiences du Clair de Lune" and "Ce Qu'a Vu le Vent d'Ouest" — and Schumann's Carnaval.

Miss McGraw studied at the Peabody Conservatory with Alexander Sklarevski and at the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris with Cortot.

In more respects than one, the Beethoven Festival given a short time ago in Washington, under the management of Mrs. Wilson Greene, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go down as one of the truly memorable events even of the American musical season of 1930-31.

The very fact that a venture of this kind in a time such as this was a financial success was in itself not only surprising, but very decidedly encouraging. That so many people could be got together anywhere for a succession of Beethoven concerts strikes us as anomalous, to say the least. Perhaps, though, many things that are called anomalies are only seemingly so; it may be that all of us are too apt to base our judgments upon merely superficial indications and manifestations, and that there are deep forces at work which will, without conscious effort or ballyhoo on the part of any organized group, bring order out of the chaos into which the arts have fallen since the war and to establish again something like an aesthetic equilibrium.

Certainly there can be no greater steadying power than that yielded by the authentic masters; by becoming familiar with the criteria they established the intelligent person goes a long way towards putting himself in position to detect the false from the true in modern expression.

A Beautiful Performance

Some such thoughts as these occurred to us as a result of hearing the closing performance of the Beethoven Festival, the program of which consisted of the first and the last (Ninth or Choral) symphonies. It was the only one of the concerts we had a chance to attend and it was an inspiration from first to last. After a long siege of clamor, spiritual and otherwise, we felt, as it were, as if we had been through some mystic process of purification.

Both works were superbly read. The First Symphony came almost as a novelty, so seldom is it played. This is hard to understand, since it contains the material of greatness and has a Scherzo which Beethoven himself or anybody else rarely excelled.

We had not heard the Ninth since it was given here years ago by the defunct Baltimore Oratorio Society under the late Joseph Pache's direction. It has always been one of the marvels of the world to us. To think that Beethoven closed such a tragic career as his with a Hymn to Joy has a soothing and reassuring effect when one becomes too bitter about human nature.

The choral part was admirably sung by the National Capital Oratorio Association chorus, which evidently had been painstakingly trained by its leader, Albert W. Harned, and a first rate quartet of soloists—Jeannette Vreeland, Nevada van der Veer, Dan Gridley and Fraser Gange.

Koussevitzky

We have never had a better opportunity than this to study at close range the work of the Boston Symphony's director, Serge Koussevitzky. From this observation there arose the conviction that there are few orchestral leaders more amply endowed than he, both by way of temperamental qualification and schooling.

He seems actually to live the music; to suffer and exult with it. All this inner experience is reflected, not alone in the effects he gets out of his orchestra, but by his gesture and his facial expression. Both are quite as eloquent as those of the most accomplished actor, but if we have made you think there is anything of the poseur or actor about him, we have given utterly the wrong impression.

As for the Boston Sympony itself, it is as good as it was in the palmiest of its pre-war days when you couldn't get a seat to hear it at the Lyric for love or money. And now it is not considered safe to bring it here for more than one performance a season. What a pity!

We were told that about a hundred Baltimore people bought seats for the Washington Festival—it took place in the beautiful D. A. R. Continental Hall—and could not help wondering how many more would have gone had it been held here. Judging from the attendance at some of our affairs featuring musical artists of international renown, we should say that it was high time the real music lovers of Baltimore were doing something to make the city safe for the musical arts.

Kreisler

Though the audience at Kreisler's annual recital did not, as it so often used to do, overflow to the stage, it was the only one of the pre-Christmas season that even approximately filled all of the seats at the Lyric—not even Paderewski brought that about, though 5,000 heard him in Washington. Kreisler, indeed, is one of the very few who retain their drawing power. He has that rare thing about his art, or more properly, perhaps, about his personality as an artist and man, that appeals alike to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE
JAN 18 1931

MUSIC

By NOEL STRAUS

NEW YORK, Jan. 17.—To Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra New York is indebted for the first hearing of many an important novelty. It is quite some time, however, since the esteemed conductor and his men have introduced a new work here which so immediately caught the fancy of an audience as Igor Stravinsky's "Capriccio," which held the place of honor on the visiting organization's second program of the season presented in Carnegie hall.

When the "Capriccio," which is in the nature of a concerto for piano and orchestra, was given its world premiere at a concert of the Orchestra Symphonique of Paris on Dec. 6, 1929, under the direction of Ernest Ansermet, with Stravinsky as soloist, Moussourgsky's "Pictures of an Exhibition" figured on the list. This same set of pieces, in the orchestral garb provided for them by Ravel, found a place on the Carnegie hall bill, which was rounded out by the Mozart Symphony in G Minor.

The "Capriccio" made its local entry under the most auspicious circumstances. With Jesus Maria Sanroma officiating at the piano, it reveled in a dazzingly brilliant performance in which the virtuosity of the assisting artist and that of the orchestra were alike breathtaking. Mr. Sanroma, who had scored heavily when he first appeared in this city under the same baton in the Toch concerto, again proved an incomparable interpreter of modernistic music for his instrument at this reappearance. Conquering the extreme difficulties of the keyboard score with amazing ease, he made his share in the reading noteworthy for clarity, crispness and tonal glamour.

Those who expected that the "Capriccio" would bear any resemblance in style to the "Sacre" or the earlier methods of the composer in the "Firebird" and "Petruchka," were destined to be surprised, as well as any in the audience prepared to hear another effort in the mock-classical vein of "Musagetes." Like the latter, it exemplified Stravinsky's recent preoccupation with neo-classicism. But as might have been anticipated from Stravinsky's constant change of manner from one work to another, the "Capriccio" again showed its author in an entirely new light. In the almost forgotten piano concerto, he had adhered closely to Bach and Handel in his choice of thematic material and coupled the solo part to a jazz accompaniment. Reverting to a remoter past in "Musagetes," he had given that composition, founded on 17th century models, much the character of an ancient concerto grosso.

But the "Capriccio," which once more turns backward for its subject matter, pilfers from innumerable sources, while in its coloring it achieves a quality absolutely different from that of any of its predecessors in Stravinsky's output. Likewise it stands on a changed rhythmic basis, and its harmonic and melodic treatment is also dissimilar. Nineteenth century romantic influences show their effect not only on the themes of the first of the three movements, but in practically all of the elaborate filigree of the highly ornamental passagework that forms one of the chief characteristics of the opus. Each plays his role in the second division, entitled "Andante rapsodico," while the final "Allegro capriccioso" goes to Vienna and the cabarets, as melodic sources. And yet because of its individual treatment, the work successfully manages to achieve a satisfactory sense of unity, despite this hodgepodge of ingredients.

Igor Stravinsky Returns to Melody with Capriccio

Composer's Work, Modern in Chronological Rather Than Technical Sense, on Boston Symphony Program.—Popularity With Audience Predicted

BY WARREN STORREY SMITH

It had been the intention of Dr. Koussevitsky when last the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Providence to give his audience a taste of musical modernity in the shape of Igor Stravinsky's new Capriccio for piano and orchestra and of a Symphony by Stravinsky's young compatriot, Nicholas Nabokov. The conductor's illness postponed the Boston premiere of Stravinsky's composition and the essential rehearsals for it, and Providence received instead a program of familiar pieces.

But Providence is to have the Capriccio after all, at the concert in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, although Nabokov's individual and genuinely charming Symphony will not accompany it. Instead, the symphony is to be Beethoven's First, and three excerpts from the operas of Wagner conclude the list.

In connection with Nabokov's Symphony and Stravinsky's Capriccio the term "musical modernity" is to be taken in the chronological rather than in any any technical sense—unless it be that these pieces represent something newer than the latest cacophonies, split intervals, combined tonalities or what-you-will: namely, a return to melody, to a simple and direct musical appeal. The public never really warmed to the other sort of thing, though the radical composers did not lack apologists among the critical fraternity nor imitators among the fledgling composers who lisped in dissonance. In the meanwhile Stravinsky, who with Arnold Schoenberg was one of the two fountain-heads of the post-Debussyan, anti-everything-that-had-gone-before music, has become a reactionary. Had become one, indeed, before this Capriccio was written. In his piano concerto he returned, in spirit at least, to Bach; in his "Oedipus Rex" to Monteverde and Handel; in his "Apollon Musagete" to Lully, Bellini and Delibes; in another ballet to Tchaikowski.

There are passages in the new Capric-

cio, to be sure, that suggest the pungency of the earlier Stravinsky, the Stravinsky of "Petrushka," if not the acerbities and asperities of "Le Sacre du Printemps." With these more individual measures of the authentic Stravinsky, measures of a hard, dry brilliance that only he could have achieved and that in part make the piece a distinguished contribution to the "literature" of piano and orchestra, come pages that, as one Boston reviewer happily phrased it, recall the "euphonious banalities" of minor 19th century composers.

Possibly Stravinsky now wishes to appear as a musical democrat, and in place of music that is caviar to the general write music that is quite within the ready comprehension of the man in the street. The Capriccio is destined to be popular with audiences. Three different assemblages at Symphony Hall have risen to it, deceived it with open arms, with a spontaneous enthusiasm that few contemporary pieces have evoked. Incidentally the presentation given it by Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the young Porto R[illegible] pianist, is an admirable [illegible]

JAN 1 8 1931

14

Music in New York

H. B.

This week the engagement of Arturo Toscanini as conductor of the Philharmonic ends for the season. As usual there has been the most extraordinary enthusiasm for the work of this electrifying little man from Italy—some of the enthusiasm is genuine. I mean that there are enough really discriminating listeners in New York to understand and appreciate the delicate and beautiful art of the man who is one of the most extraordinary musicians alive. But not everyone who takes the name of Toscanini with hyperbolic praise knows what it is all about. There are always many in such a public who follow the lead of a few and shout themselves blue about the gills about each new thing. It is a kind of artistic snobbery that is hard to bear and that very often moves the honest musician and appreciator to an unwarrant disagreement.

Toscanini is not the only great conductor in the world. There have been others in New York within the last few years who excel him in some particulars as he excels them in others. But it is difficult for an untrained audience to preserve any balance or sense of proportion. If one man is great then forsooth all others must be of less stature. There were, for example, many things which the doughty little Mengelberg played better than anyone else. There were many, many things in Furtwangler's repertoire that could not be improved on. And there are many things played by Toscanini that do not call for the maximum of enthusiasm.

It is possible for a conductor to draw things a bit too fine at times, and this is precisely Toscanini's outstanding fault. For my taste it happens too often that the German classics under the suave and ultra-refined direction of Toscanini sound miniaturized. One misses sweep and epic grandeur and what is often necessary, a sort of boisterous, healthy, ruggedness. Everything with Toscanini is disciplined and pared down to a precision and delicacy that more than occasionally becomes too small.

In his choice of novelties he leans naturally to contemporary Italians, and he lavishes a quality of work on them that actually obscures their unworthiness.

* * * * *

This week I listened carefully to Toscanini's revival of the old Third Symphony of Raff. It is a tiresome and sleepy old piece, hopelessly out of date, bearing all the boring features of a diluted romanticism. Toscanini played it with superlative care and certainly presented it in the best possible light, and even then it was not easy to stay awake through it. The excessive refinement, the over graduated delicacy of dynamics only had the effect of further detracting from whatever interest the music might have had. The general effect of a repressed orchestra one blamed for the moment on the soporific score. But when there followed a performance of Vincent d'Indy's glittering and picturesque score of the Istar Variations, there was again a loss of color, of warmth, of climax—a general toning down of the very qualities which the work must have in order to come through to complete expression.

One of the maddening things about this excessive hero worship, this hysterical lack of critical perspective, is that no one is permitted even to set Toscanini's fine and great qualities in higher relief by mentioning those which are not so fine or so great. One is met by incredulous indignation as though the holiness of Deity had been assailed.

The very worst feature of all of this is that the public's fickle favor wears itself out through very excess. There is wild enthusiasm, uncritical acclaim for the new conductor who is a favorite for a little while, and then not even his good qualities are any longer recognized. He is then on the way out.

* * * * *

It is interesting to know that Segovia, the Spanish guitar virtuoso, is back again for what will doubtless be a highly successful season.

Who would think that a guitar player could pack houses in America year after year with guitar recitals? And audiences of discrimination and taste. The secret is simple enough. Segovia is a superlative artist, and if he played the ocarina he would probably do it so well that the world would wear a pathway to his concerts.

All of the attributes of great playing are in his art.

There have been three such phenomenal and unexpected successes in the concert world the last few years. Segovia, the guitarist; Harold Samuels, the Bach specialist; and the English singers who devote themselves to the exploitation of old English music. Each of these, one would think, could have but a small public, appealing, apparently to a small and special audience. But they have had distinct popular success, because of superior artistry.

The formula is simple enough. All one has to do is to play or sing something better than anyone else does.

Nevertheless, no one can ever accuse us of being a really unmusical nation when we so generously and continuously support such outstanding examples of fine music. One is less impressed even with the crowded houses that greet the series of symphony concerts, because there is always in these orchestral affairs the presence of a much press agented prima donna conductor. Opera is another matter. It will always survive where there is money and a seeking after fashion. Opera being the most expensive variety of musical entertainment there is not and never will be a shortage of audience. This will of course depend upon it remaining expensive. Popular priced opera has never gone well here.

* * * * *

Popular interest is engaged for the moment with a new little prima donna at the Metropolitan Opera House. Lily Pons, a French girl, young and winsome and appealing, a coloratura, made her debut last week in "Lucia" and was heard again to better advantage in "Rigoletto." According to all reports (I have not yet heard her) she was over press agented. That is always a misfortune because it antagonizes critics and public alike.

It is said that she is charming and that she really sings well.

* * * * *

The Boston Symphony came to town this week on one of its regular pilgrimages and under the direction of the always glamorous Sergei Kussevitsky, gave a fine concert. The novelty of the evening was the first hearing in this country of Strawinsky's new "Cappriccio." This work was first heard last year in Paris with the assistance of the composer as pianist. (The work has a piano obbligato part.) It was a rather dismal failure as a composition although the performance was all that the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra could make it. The performance introduced a new Spanish pianist who will doubtless be heard to better advantage later in recital or concert with music that affords him opportunity.

Strawinsky has evidently finished with himself as a composer. He has now for a long time contented himself with trivial and cheap and uninspired thematic material treated in a variety of fashions that derive from many epochs of the past.

Extraordinary how much Strawinsky was in the musical news a few years ago when his arresting "Sacre du Printemps," "Petrouschka" and other works seemed to single him out as the hope of the age.

Unless he unexpectedly strikes some new vein there seems to be nothing more to expect from him. Apparently he ended his carer in this country whn he came over to conduct his own works three or four years ago. Since then interest in him has been on a steady decline. Certainly his compositions of the past few years exhibit an astounding poverty of invention.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
JAN 1 8 1931

STYLE, 18TH CENTURY

Stravinsky's "Discovery" of That Epoch—The Operatic Handel of "Julius Caesar"

By OLIN DOWNES.

It has been said that Stravinsky discovered the eighteenth century—too late. Perhaps the twentieth century has discovered Stravinsky and acclaimed him as an immortal too soon. This suspicion rises in the mind as one considers Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, recently unfolded to us by the gallant Koussevitzky, Jesús Sanromá and the gentlemen of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is cheap and bad music, and no amount of Stravinskian technic can cover up the fact.

Fortunately, the "Capriccio" is not the only work Stravinsky has composed. The electrifying appearance of the author of "Oiseau de feu," "Petrouchka," "Sacre du printemps," works composed in a period of less than five years, and his meteoric rise to the position of the foremost composer of his day, are events within the memory of the middle-aged. Stravinsky's descent from the pinnacles of "Petrouchka" and the "Sacre"—pinnacles which would not be mountain-peaks in a more creative period—is symptomatic, apparently, of these times in music. Composers of conspicuous talent today run brief and feverish courses. They receive a degree of publicity that would have astonished Beethoven and terrified poor Schubert. Then they blow up. Publicity, success, may be cruel to genius. Certain of the late scores of Stravinsky may well remain a bone of contention for years to come. Their final evaluation, consequently, must be left to that oft-quoted reviewer whose name is Time. His verdict is commonly believed to be just and conclusive. Music critics are as glad to lay their responsibilities on his shoulders as moralists are willing to lay theirs upon God. We feel certain that Time's processes will not involve the glorification of the "Capriccio," the "Symphony for Wind Instruments," the "Octet." No, no. Like the sundry things mentioned in "The Mikado," they never will be missed.

* * *

Also, the question of Mr. Stravinsky's discoveries of past masters. He has discovered, or rediscovered, not only Tchaikovsky but Richard Strauss and jazz in his unlamented "Capriccio." He discovered Bach as the father of his piano concerto and Handel as the primal spring of the choral style of "Oedipus Rex." In this work he may, as some authorities aver, have projected a masterpiece. Personally speaking, the remark recorded at the beginning of this article impresses us as applying with eminent fitness to the latter score: that Stravinsky discovered the eighteenth century, Handel included, too late.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

ert Montgomery in "Inspiration" at heeler, Dorothy Lee, Robert Woolsey Byrd starting today; center, left, G. Robinson in "Little Caesar" at Frederic March, Ina Claire, Mary The Royal Family of Broadway" at George O'Brien in "Fair Warning" at Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor at the Mosque Monday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 1 8 1931

STYLE, 18TH CENTURY

Stravinsky's "Discovery" of That Epoch—ony Players The Operatic Handel of "Julius Caesar"—oncert Tuesday

Beethoven, Stravinsky and Wagner on Program to Be Led by Dr. Koussevitzky.—Jesus Maria Sanroma, Piano Soloist, in Work by Russian Composer

Beethoven, Stravinsky and Wagner, in the order named, will be heard at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert Tuesday night at 8:15 o'clock in the Albee Theatre, under Dr. Koussevitsky's direction. The Stravinsky number, Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, was originally scheduled for its Providence debut at the orchestra's previous concert but had to be omitted because of the conductor's illness.

One of the latest scores by the Russian composer, it was first performed in Paris in December, 1929. Dr. Koussevitsky introduced it to Boston last December and in New York on Jan. 8. Jesus Maria Sanroma, who has played the solo part on those occasions, will do so here. The symphony is Beethoven's First, in C-major, written when he was under the influence of his predecessors, Mozart and Haydn, but revealing the unmistakable and individual stamp of its creator. Three favorite excerpts from Wagner's music dramas will close the program—the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure;" Prelude and "Love-Death" from Tristam and Isolde" and the overture to "Rienzi."

This afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library Dr. W. Louis Chapman will give his customary lecture, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club, on the music to be played by the orchestra. Other aids to the keener enjoyment and appreciation of the program are the library's music scores and books.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

Boston Offers Gotham Taste of New Music

Novel and Dissonant Has Large Following.

By Joan King.

[Chicago Tribune Press Service.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 17.—[Special.]—Visitors from Boston have provided the two keynotes which have set the pitch for recent musical activities in Gotham—that of novelty and that of the ultra-modern. First came Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra, in his regular subscription concert at Carnegie hall, with the first offering, hereabouts, of Igor Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for orchestra with piano solo.

This work was first performed by the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris, Dec. 6, 1929, with the composer at the keyboard and Ernest Answermet at the baton. Dr. Koussevitzky, himself, brought it to its first American audience, in Boston, Dec. 19, 1930, with Jesus Maria Sanroma playing the solo. Mr. Sanroma was again at the piano for the New York hearing and gave a fine reading, perfectly coordinated with the orchestral performance. The audience, which was, as always for the Bostonians, a capacity one, seemed pleased with the new work and rendered it an enthusiastic response.

* *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE
JAN 2 1 1931

-:- MUSIC -:-

GLORIOUS WAGNER

Possibly Dr. Koussevitzky has played Wagner's "Prelude and Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde better than he played it last night, at the Boston Symphony's third concert of the season in the Albee Theatre, but this chronicler who has heard him play it many times does not think so. Indeed, the conviction grows on one that in nothing else has this magisterial conductor made more progress in recent years than in his interpretations of Wagnerian heroism in all its aspects. Possibly when we first used to hear him, we were still too much under the compelling spell of Muck, and the growth may be in us rather than in Dr. Koussevitzky. Against that may be set the fact that only very recently we heard Arturo Toscanini in the Tristan excerpt, and it is a definite conviction that of the two renderings Koussevitzky's was the greater because it was by far the more dramatic. We are not going to compare the technical achievements - twin-tops beyond our powers of survey. In tone, balance and splendor of phrasing there was no choice. But it seems to us that while Toscanini tries to get the last vestige of lyric loveliness out of the score, the great Russian seeks and finds dramatic glory of the deepest and most significant kind. His tempo was noticeably faster than Toscanini's; he played until the whole volume of his orchestra became one mass of flame racing to the heart of life. We have set aside 20, 1931 among the red letter days in our musical calendar.

Beside the glory and magnificence of this Tristan performance, all else last night was, necessarily, made pallid. In the shadow of the greatest music ever written, even very great music must pale. Beethoven's First Symphony, fruit of the plan that [illegible] twenty-five years to complete, is very lovely in its lyrical moments of Mozart and Haydn woven in new patterns by the still young genius that was to produce the Fifth, Seventh and the Ninth. Stravinsky's "Capriccio," the novelty on the programme, was in part dull, in parts amazingly brilliant. It is not the Stravinsky of "Petrouchka" or "The Consecration of Spring," but a Stravinsky harking back to the Eighteenth century, clever, resourceful but [illegible] nistic. We prefer him when he is undilutedly modern. A word of great praise is, nevertheless, due to Jesus Maria Sanroma who played the piano part; his name goes on the list of artists we have sworn to hear again. The "Ride of the Valkyrie" and the overture to "Rienzi," which completed a programme which made us more grateful than ever for the beneficence of whatever [illegible] framed the mind and personality of Serge Koussevitzky.

JAN 1 8 1931

14

Music in New York

H. B.

This week the engagement of Arturo Toscanini as conductor of the Philharmonic ends for the season. As usual there has been the most extraordinary enthusiasm for the work of this electrifying little man from Italy—some of the enthusiasm is genuine. I mean that there are enough really discriminating listeners in New York to understand and appreciate the delicate and beautiful art of the man who is one of the most extraordinary musicians alive. But not everyone who takes the name of Toscanini with hyperbolic praise knows what it is all about. There are always many in such a public who follow the lead of a few and shout themselves blue about the gills about each new thing. It is a kind of artistic snobbery that is hard to bear and that very often moves the honest musician and appreciator to an unwarrant disagreement.

Toscanini is not the only great conductor in the world. There have been others in New York within the last few years who excel him in some particulars as he excels them in others. But it is difficult for an untrained audience to preserve any balance or sense of proportion. If one man is great then forsooth all others must be of less stature. There were, for example, many things which the doughty little Mengelberg played better than anyone else. There were many, many things in Furtwangler's repertoire that could not be improved on. And there are many things played by Toscanini that do not call for the maximum of enthusiasm.

It is possible for a conductor to draw things a bit too fine at times, and this is precisely Toscanini's outstanding fault. For my taste it happens too often that the German classics under the suave and ultra-refined direction of Toscanini sound miniaturized. One misses sweep and epic grandeur and what is often necessary, a sort of boisterous, healthy, ruggedness. Everything with Toscanini is disciplined and pared down to a precision and delicacy that more than occasionally becomes too small.

In his choice of novelties he leans naturally to contemporary Italians, and he lavishes a quality of work on them that actually obscures their unworthiness.

* * * * *

This week I listened carefully to Toscanini's revival of the old Third Symphony of Raff. It is a tiresome and sleepy old piece, hopelessly out of date, bearing all the boring features of a diluted romanticism. Toscanini played it with superlative care and certainly presented it in the best possible light, and even then it was not easy to stay awake through it. The excessive refinement, the over graduated delicacy of dynamics only had the effect of further detracting from whatever interest the music might have had. The general effect of a repressed orchestra one blamed for the moment on the soporific score. But when there followed a performance of Vincent d'Indy's glittering and picturesque score of the Istar Variations, there was again a loss of color, of warmth, of climax—a general toning down of the very qualities which the work must have in order to come through to complete expression.

One of the maddening things about this excessive hero worship, this hysterical lack of critical perspective, is that no one is permitted even to set Toscanini's fine and great qualities in higher relief by mentioning those which are not so fine or so great. One is met by incredulous indignation as though the holiness of Deity had been assailed.

The very worst feature of all of this is that the public's fickle favor wears itself out through very excess. There is wild enthusiasm, uncritical acclaim for the new conductor who is a favorite for a little while, and then not even his good qualities are any longer recognized. He is then on the way out.

* * * * *

It is interesting to know that Segovia, the Spanish guitar virtuoso, is back again for what will doubtless be a highly successful season.

Who would think that a guitar player could pack houses in America year after year with guitar recitals? And audiences of discrimination and taste. The secret is simple enough. Segovia is a superlative artist, and if he played the ocarina he would probably do it so well that the world would wear a pathway to his concerts.

All of the attributes of great playing are in his art.

There have been three such phenomenal and unexpected successes in the concert world the last few years. Segovia, the guitarist; Harold Samuels, the Bach specialist; and the English singers who devote themselves to the exploitation of old English music. Each of these, one would think, could have but a small public, appealing, apparently to a small and special audience. But they have had distinct popular success, because of superior artistry.

The formula is simple enough. All one has to do is to play or sing something better than anyone else does.

Nevertheless, no one can ever accuse us of being a really unmusical nation when we so generously and continuously support such outstanding examples of fine music. One is less impressed even with the crowded houses that greet the series of symphony concerts, because there is always in these orchestral affairs the presence of a much press agented prima donna conductor. Opera is another matter. It will always survive where there is money and a seeking after fashion. Opera being the most expensive variety of musical entertainment there is not and never will be a shortage of audience. This will of course depend upon it remaining expensive. Popular priced opera has never gone well here.

* * * * *

Popular interest is engaged for the moment with a new little prima donna at the Metropolitan Opera House. Lily Pons, a French girl, young and winsome and appealing, a coloratura, made her debut last week in "Lucia" and was heard again to better advantage in "Rigoletto." According to all reports (I have not yet heard her) she was over press agented. That is always a misfortune because it antagonizes critics and public alike.

It is said that she is charming and that she really sings well.

* * * * *

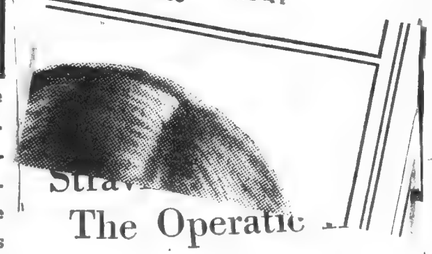
The Boston Symphony came to town this week on one of its regular pilgrimages and under the direction of the always glamorous Sergei Kussevitsky, gave a fine concert. The novelty of the evening was the first hearing in this country of Strawinsky's new "Cappriccio." This work was first heard last year in Paris with the assistance of the composer as pianist. (The work has a piano obbligato part.) It was a rather dismal failure as a composition although the performance was all that the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra could make it. The performance introduced a new Spanish pianist who will doubtless be heard to better advantage later in recital or concert with music that affords him opportunity.

Strawinsky has evidently finished with himself as a composer. He has now for a long time contented himself with trivial and cheap and uninspired thematic material treated in a variety of fashions that derive from many epochs of the past.

Extraordinary how much Strawinsky was in the musical news a few years ago when his arresting "Sacre du Printemps," "Petrouschka" and other works seemed to single him out as the hope of the age.

Unless he unexpectedly strikes some new vein there seems to be nothing more to expect from him. Apparently he ended his carer in this country whn he came over to conduct his own works three or four years ago. Since then interest in him has been on a steady decline. Certainly his compositions of the past few years exhibit an astounding poverty of invention.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
[illegible] Theatres 9 1931



Stravinsky and The Operatic [illegible]

By OLIN DOWNES.

IT has been said that Stravinsky discovered the eighteenth century—too late. Perhaps the twentieth century has discovered Stravinsky and acclaimed him as an immortal too soon. This suspicion rises in the mind as one considers Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, recently unfolded to us by the gallant Koussevitzky, Jesús Sanromá and the gentlemen of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is cheap and bad music, and no amount of Stravinskian technic can cover up the fact.

Fortunately, the "Capriccio" is not the only work Stravinsky has composed. The electrifying appearance of the author of "Oiseau de feu," "Petrouchka," "Sacre du printemps," works composed in a period of less than five years, and his meteoric rise to the position of the foremost composer of his day, are events within the memory of the middle-aged. Stravinsky's descent from the pinnacles of "Petrouchka" and the "Sacre"—pinnacles which would not be mountain-peaks in a more creative period—is symptomatic, apparently, of these times in music. Composers of conspicuous talent today run brief and feverish courses. They receive a degree of publicity that would have astonished Beethoven and terrified poor Schubert. Then they blow up. Publicity, success, may be cruel to genius. Certain of the late scores of Stravinsky may well remain a bone of contention for years to come. Their final evaluation, consequently, must be left to that oft-quoted reviewer whose name is Time. His verdict is commonly believed to be just and conclusive. Music critics are as glad to lay their responsibilities on his shoulders as moralists are willing to lay theirs upon God. We feel certain that Time's processes will not involve the glorification of the "Capriccio," the "Symphony for Wind Instruments," the "Octet." No, no. Like the sundry things mentioned in "The Mikado," they never will be missed.

* * *

Also, the question of Mr. Stravinsky's discoveries of past masters. He has discovered, or rediscovered, not only Tchaikovsky but Richard Strauss and jazz in his unlamented "Capriccio." He discovered Bach as the father of his piano concerto and Handel as the primal spring of the choral style of "Oedipus Rex." In this work he may, as some authorities aver, have projected a masterpiece. Personally speaking, the remark recorded at the beginning of this article impresses us as applying with eminent fitness to the latter score: that Stravinsky discovered the eighteenth century, Handel included, too late.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

ert Montgomery in "Inspiration" at heeler, Dorothy Lee, Robert Woolsey Byrd starting today; center, left, G. Robinson in "Little Caesar" at Frederic March, Ina Claire, Mary "The Royal Family of Broadway" at George O'Brien in "Fair Warning" at Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor at the Mosque Monday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 1 8 1931

Boston Symphony Players in Third Concert Tuesday

Beethoven, Stravinsky and Wagner on Program to Be Led by Dr. Koussevitzky.—Jesus Maria Sanroma, Piano Soloist, in Work by Russian Composer

Beethoven, Stravinsky and Wagner, in the order named, will be heard at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert Tuesday night at 8:15 o'clock in the Albee Theatre, under Dr. Koussevitsky's direction. The Stravinsky number, Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, was originally scheduled for its Providence debut at the orchestra's previous concert but had to be omitted because of the conductor's illness.

One of the latest scores by the Russian composer, it was first performed in Paris in December, 1929. Dr. Koussevitsky introduced it to Boston last December and in New York on Jan. 8. Jesus Maria Sanroma, who has played the solo part on those occasions, will do so here. The symphony is Beethoven's First, in C-major, written when he was under the influence of his predecessors, Mozart and Haydn, but revealing the unmistakable and individual stamp of its creator. Three favorite excerpts from Wagner's music dramas will close the program—the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure;" Prelude and "Love-Death" from Tristam and Isolde" and the overture to "Rienzi."

This afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library Dr. W. Louis Chapman will give his customary lecture, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club, on the music to be played by the orchestra. Other aids to the keener enjoyment and appreciation of the program are the library's music scores and books.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
JAN 1 8 1931

Boston Offers Gotham Taste of New Music

Novel and Dissonant Has Large Following.

By Joan King.

[Chicago Tribune Press Service.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 17.—[Special.]—Visitors from Boston have provided the two keynotes which have set the pitch for recent musical activities in Gotham—that of novelty and that of the ultra-modern. First came Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra, in his regular subscription concert at Carnegie hall, with the first offering, hereabouts, of Igor Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for orchestra with piano solo.

This work was first performed by the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris, Dec. 6, 1929, with the composer at the keyboard and Ernest Answermet at the baton. Dr. Koussevitzky, himself, brought it to its first American audience, in Boston, Dec. 19, 1930, with Jesus Maria Sanroma playing the solo. Mr. Sanroma was again at the piano for the New York hearing and gave a fine reading, perfectly coordinated with the orchestral performance. The audience, which was, as always for the Bostonians, a capacity one, seemed pleased with the new work and rendered it an enthusiastic response.

* *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE
JAN 2 1 1931

-:- MUSIC -:-

GLORIOUS WAGNER

Possibly Dr. Koussevitzky has played Wagner's "Prelude and Liebestod" from Tristan and Isolde better than he played it last night, at the Boston Symphony's third concert of the season in the Albee Theatre, but this chronicler who has heard him play it many times does not think so. Indeed, the conviction grows on one that in nothing else has this magisterial conductor made more progress in recent years than in his interpretations of Wagnerian heroism in all its aspects. Possibly when we first used to hear him, we were still too much under the compelling spell of Muck, and the growth may be in us rather than in Dr. Koussevitzky. Against that may be set the fact that only very recently we heard Arturo Toscanini in the Tristan excerpt, and it is our definite conviction that of the two renderings Koussevitzky's was the greater because it was by far the more dramatic. We are not going to compare the technical achievements - twin-tops beyond our powers of survey. In tone, balance and splendor of phrasing there was no choice. But it seems to us that while Toscanini tries to get the last vestige of lyric loveliness out of the score, the great Russian seeks out and finds dramatic glory of the deepest and most significant kind. His tempo was noticeably faster than Toscanini's; he played until the whole volume of his orchestra became one mass of flame coming from the heart of life. We have set Jan. 20, 1931 among the red letter days in our musical calendar.

Beside the glory and magnificence of this Tristan performance, all else last night was, necessarily, a trifle pallid. In the shadow of the greatest music ever written, even very great music must pale. [illegible] Beethoven's First Symphony [illegible] fruit of the plan that [illegible] twenty-five years to complete, [illegible] very lovely in its lyrical mo[illegible] of Mozart and Haydn woven [illegible] new patterns by the still [illegible] genius that was to produce the Fifth, Seventh and the Ninth. Stravinsky's "Capriccio," the novelty on the programme, was in parts dull, in parts amazingly brilliant. It is not the Stravinsky of the "Petrouchka" or "The Consecration of Spring," but a Stravinsky harking back to the Eighteenth Century, clever, resourceful but [illegible] nistic. We prefer him when he is undilutedly modern. A word of great praise is, nevertheless, due to Jesus Maria Sanroma who played the piano part; his name goes on the list of artists we have sworn to hear again. The "Ride of the Valkyries" and the overture to "Rienzi" completed a programme which makes us more grateful than ever for the beneficence of whatever [illegible] framed the mind and personality of Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 27 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Before Capacity House

Dr. Koussevitzky and His Musicians Praised for Presenting One of Their Finest Concerts.—Crowd Extremely Cordial to Stravinsky's New "Capriccio" With Sanroma at Piano.

The third of our series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given to a capacity house in the Albee Theatre last evening. The program varied from the light and beautifully melodious to the scintillating, but meaningless and then to the most elaborate and glorious in the entire literature of orchestral music.

The audience was extremely cordial to Stravinsky's new "Capriccio" with Jesus Maria Sanroma at the piano. Dr. Koussevitzky gave Mr. Sanroma the lion's share of the applause at the end of the young Porto Rican's difficult and sympathetic performance. He played surely, although the technical demands were not slight—as is the way with modern writing so often. But most of all he showed a full comprehension of the spirit of the piece, giving the piano passages a loyal, musicianly touch. He and the Boston Symphony are so far the only American performers of this new pleasantry.

It is many seasons since the Boston Symphony has brought us a soloist, and the crowded house seemed to approve of the innovation. Without an occasional visitor of this sort we will never keep alive for ourselves a rich province in music. We look forward to hearing Mr. Sanroma again when he comes as soloist in May with the University Glee Club.

It is a long time since Beethoven's First Symphony has been played at a symphony concert. It also is a long time since the Fourth and Sixth Symphonies have been played, as well as the symphonies of Mendelssohn and numerous other standard, classical and meritorious works of the near past. Just how these good things have been crowded out cannot be learned, but programs seem to go in cycles and we still have hopes of hearing the concertos of Beethoven, Chopin, Saint Saens and—now that the habit, almost the custom, has been broken—soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The First Symphony undoubtedly belongs to the immature period of Beethoven, but it readily is seen that it is of far more musical worth than many compositions that are vouchsafed us. We rejoice in its revival. Although more Mozartian than any other of Beethoven's symphonies the similarities are not obvious. But would it matter if they were? Suggestive of works to come, particularly of the Fifth and Seventh Symphonies, the First Symphony offers grace and beauty of violin figures, contrasts of wood-wind and brass and at times a firmness of line and shadow that add distinction to the entire work. An understanding of this First Symphony insures better appreciation not only of the later symphonies of Beethoven, but also the works of many other later composers.

It is quite prophetic in its beauty and significance. Dr. Koussevitzky unfolded this exquisite symphony with his customary skill in the treatment of the classics. He allowed the music to speak for itself. As the allegretto of the Seventh Symphony still lingers in the happy recollections of an earlier concert—so will the beauties of the andante of this First Symphony remain, subtle and pliant in their matchless simplicities.

It is to be expected that interest in the "caprice" would be of the keenest and that upon it would be ventured more critical discussion than upon older and far better known works.

It is difficult to imagine a more complete change of musical mood than that from the graceful and lovely Beethoven to Stravinsky—music to which we are as yet unaccustomed. No matter how steeped we may be in the modern idiom, or how willing we are to learn from it or accept its freedom of expression and the strange things it offers to our ears, we find ourselves trying to liken it to something we have heard and associate it with something with which we are familiar.

This we cannot do with the "Caprice" nor can it be considered similar to other compositions of the same composer. No fairyland opens at his command, no graceful beauty is revealed in his meaningless floritura. Did varied ideas come to us in quick succession, were any of the thematic material developed in any way or were there any message offered for one's information or instruction, the attentive ear would soon grasp it. But here there is no continuity of line or rational figure of musical speech to capture although we strive ever so earnestly.

It is not necessary that music be obvious, but it is highly desirable that a work be obviously musical. We did not arrive at these conclusions from this hearing alone, but from an earnest and painstaking study of the score, without which any opinion necessarily must be immature and cursory.

If this work is to be taken as an example of the musical thought of our day, if this meaningless display of orchestral and pianistic technique is to be taken seriously, then is the sublime art fallen upon evil times and the muse become a rebuke unto the foolish. Many of the works of Stravinsky have been bad enough, but this is the worst ever, for although it has avoided the grotesqueries and ugliness of the past it has substituted nothing therefor, and we are left poor, indeed.

Almost any music following close upon the noble and beautiful Beethoven is at once at a disadvantage. If the symphony has been taken seriously, if its multiform beauties have found their ways into one's heart, then surely any such angular and precise dictation as the Stravinsky piece offers an opposite contrast which is, in a measure, saved by their complete dissimilarity.

There is, therefore, no comparison. The Caprice is in a class by itself and there is no standard for estimation. Were there more musical merit to such compositions it might be claimed that another "school" has been founded, that is, the establishment of new lines of musical thought around which, in time, other works of a similar nature might be assembled and a new chapter in musical history begun. But in such an event there must be some kind of unit, some dominant thought, some particular characteristic, which would furnish a basis for argument if not for establishment, and in this work there is none.

No folk song, no lively cantilena, no beautifully turned episode is there to relieve the impression of the mechanical, the eccentric and the meaningless. Individuality implies some measure of character, music usually some element of the esthetic; virtuosity should have something to say and in all musical forms there should be some meaning and coherence.

When it is known that this "Caprice" is the most normal, the least erratic and artificial of all the Stravinsky works, that it continues in one key throughout a movement and that the composer has invoked fewer ultra-modernistic idioms than in any of his former works, the peculiarities of his style can be appreciated.

But these weirdnesses of caprice are soon forgotten in the superb magnificences which came as a delight. It is not long ago, indeed it is within the writer's memory, that the works of Richard Wagner were slow of acceptance by musicians and the musical public. We doubt, however, if today any unfavorable comment can be heard of either the compositions or their matchless presentation. Both conductor and orchestra seemed to share in the beauties of Wagner's genius in the "Rienzi," and the "Valkyries," and in the unparalleled tone colorings of the "Tristan."

Although this concert number now is an old story it ever is welcome, its beauties are far from exhausted and any work placed near it must suffer from comparison with it. If one revels in technique it is to be noted that only virtuoso orchestras can play it well; if it is the esthetic in music in which one takes the greatest delight, the spiritual elements of the composition cannot be denied; if one seeks thrill and emotional reactions from its grandeurs, behold they are there also.

In the splendid presentation of these colossal works Dr. Koussevitzsky and his men quite outdid themselves in one of the finest concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it has been our good fortune to hear. And we are under great obligations to them for presenting a work which has provoked more analytical criticism than any composition since the "Sacre du Printemps" and which will enjoy a torrent of journalistic discussion for some time to come. Dr. Koussevitzsky, the soloist and the orchestra were repeatedly recalled during the performance.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Beethoven—Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21.
- I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante cantabile con moto.
- III. Menuetto; Allegro Molto e vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale; Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.

Stravinsky—Capriccio for piano and orchestra.
- I. Presto.
- II. Andante rapsodico.
- III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.

Wagner—Ride of the Valkyries, from "Die Walkure."
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde."
Wagner—Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

For its third concert of the season in the Providence Albee Theatre last evening the Boston symphony orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky presented the following programme:

Beethoven, "Symphony No. 1" in C major, Op. 21. Stravinsky, "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra. Wagner, "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure." Wagner, prelude and love-death from "Tristan und Isolde." Wagner, overture to "Rienzi."

The evening's novelty was the Stravinsky "Capriccio," played by orchestra with piano, and here came a departure from the rule of Providence symphony concerts in recent years. Formerly the soloist was an expected and accepted attraction, but there have been none for a long time. Last evening Jesus Maria Sanroma appeared in this role, playing the solo part in the Stravinsky number, and he was received with tumultuous approval.

It may be said in all justice that the tribute was to him and to the orchestra rather than to the work they played. The "Capriccio," intensely modern in type, is not of a musical structure to excite the hearer's emotions. It can and did evoke admiration for the performers. It presents difficulties which none but a first class orchestra ably directed, could overcome and the piano part imposes extraordinary demands which the soloist last evening met with the finest ability. It made one desire to hear Sanroma in another style of work, for unquestionably he is an artist of a high order of merit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

Boston Symphony Program

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will be held Friday evening, February 6, and Saturday afternoon, February 7. The Friday program will be Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, Sibelius's Seventh Symphony and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." The Saturday program will be the Pick-Mangiagalli arrangement for strings of two Bach Preludes, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Answer, Echo—

MOST OF THE world's great pianists were members of the audience that listened to Josef Hofmann play at Carnegie Hall a week or so ago. * * * Following the ultimate encore, a number of them repaired to the green room to offer their congratulations. * * * Rachmaninoff's contribution: "You have twenty fingers and each one of them is clever." * * * Hofmann's reply: "If I could play like Horowits! If I had Lhevinne's technique!" * * * Or something of the sort. * * * Pianists are a bit more broadminded about their colleagues than violinists or singers. * * * And speaking of pianists, there is the story of the very famous virtuoso who recently gave a recital at the X— School in Y—, a small Connecticut town. The pupils were ravished, and one of their number begged a lock of the artist's mane. * * * May she never learn that her tawny souvenir was snipped from a toupe.

* * *

Excerpts from the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, edited by the estimable Philip Hale: "The parents of Samuel Gardner, the violinist, were obliged to flee from Russia on account of the pogroms that occasionally occurred. . . . * * * Something like Mr. Toscanini's, maybe, * * * And speaking of Toscanini, here's one that Alexander Smallens tells: During Arturo's recent visit to Philadelphia, he and Mr. Smallens were discussing Strawinsky, the mere mention of whose name causes the eminent maestro to lose his temper. * * * "But," ingenuously interposed the assistant conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, "if that is what you think of Strawinsky, please tell me your opinion of Respighi." * * * "Sola mente una volta" replied Arturo, shrugging. * * * Granting the authenticity of the anecdote, the conclusion is that Toscanini does not practice as he preaches. * * * And continuing on the subject of conductors, rumor has it (the Lord bless her!) that Signor Molinari will not be with us again next year. * * * The author of the report that neither Dr. Koussewitsky nor Dr. Stokowski can read a score, was in town recently, doing a little conducting of his own. * * * He is, as it happens, as excellent score reader, whatever he may be as a conductor. * * * But it is interesting to know that he has in the past received his cachet from the orchestras of both Boston and Philadelphia.

* * *

Anecdote about Prima Donna Maria Jeritza (advt.): After a recent performance in Brooklyn, the diva was returning home in the car of a friend. Seized with a characteristic desire for food, she commanded the driver to draw up to a drug store and fetch her a glass of milk and a sandwich. * * * Just then a policeman happened along to advise the party that parking at that spot was forbidden. "But this is Mme. Jeritza," protested the friend "Mme. Jeritza, the opera singer!" * * * "An opera singer is it!" replied the copper, eyeing the diva's 250-lb. maid-in-waiting. "Move along! She'll be better off without the milk." * * * Mme. Jeritza is suddenly active these days in the interests of Tenor Walther Kirchhoff, her partner in "Boccaccio." * * * Too late, Maria, too late! Walther leaves us at the end of this season.

SUETONIUS Jr.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, will give its third Brooklyn concert of the season at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening of next week, instead of on Friday, as is its usual custom. The program for this concert has not yet been announced.

* * *

Under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Budapest String Quartet, which this season is making its first American tour, will give a matinee recital at the Academy of Music next Sunday, Feb. 1. The program will include Quartets by Smetana (in E minor), Dittersdorf and Tschaikowsky (in F major, Op. 22).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

ORCHESTRA PLANS JUBILEE PROGRAM

Boston Symphony, Coming to Richmond, Is 50 Years Old.

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to appear at the Mosquet on the evening of February 2 under the auspices of the Richmond Civic Musical Association, is to include Mozart's G Minor symphony, Stravinski's cappriccio for piano and orchestra and Tchaikowskis Fourth Symphony, it was announced today by T. Michaux Moody, manager of the association.

An important feature of the concert will be program notes by Philip Hale, one of the most famous American music critics. The notes will cover analyses of the great compositions to be offered, and historical sketches of their composers.

The Boston Symphony is observing its fiftieth anniversary this year, and its appearance in Richmond is a major event in the anniversary celebration of the noted organization. The orchestra is such a favorite among Richmond people that it has become a Richmond orchestra as well as a Boston orchestra. Every member of the big organization has become a tie between Richmond and the New England metropolis.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky is conductor of the Boston Symphony now, building a greater musical tradition on the foundations laid by his predecessors, Dr. Karl Muck, Arthur Nikish and Wilhelm Gericke, and by the founder, Henry L. Higginson.

The Boston Symphony presents the fifth feature of the Richmond civic concert series of 1930-31, not a single unit of which has been a disappointment.

The series opened with the Don Cossack chorus Nov. 11 and there followed recitals by Mme Claire Clairbert, Ignace Jan Paderewski, and a dance recital Jan 19 by Kreutzberg and Georgi. The sixth and cluding number of the series is to be a concert by Paul Kochanski, violinist, on March 16.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

The Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, Strauss' Symphonia Domestica and the Strawinsky Capriccio for piano and orchestra appear on the programs to be given by the Boston Orchestra, under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction, at Carnegie Hall on Friday and Saturday next week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is returning to the Capital for a final performance at Constitution Hall Tuesday afternoon, February 3, at 4:30 o'clock. This will be the third attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's philharmonic course of afternoon concert attractions at Constitution Hall.

In this connection it is announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is already planning a festival of Bach music to be given in Boston next March in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, the man who, 50 years ago, gave Boston the first and only American orchestra of European symphonic standards and who for many years supported this orchestra without aid. The program Mr. Koussevitzky has selected for his Washington concert has not yet been announced.

MARIAN ANDERSON, Negro contralto, who has attained much fame by her contralto in recital at the Belasco ...ruary 8, at 4:30 ...her

110

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 25 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Play At Mosque February 2

Famous Organization Is Feted Throughout Tour of Country; Koussevitzky to Direct Orchestra on Presentation Here

Midway in its fiftieth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be presented at the Mosque February 2 by the Richmond Civic Music Association, is being honored from all sides as one of the finest musical organizations in the present world, and as the oldest orchestra of high and permanent standing in this country. The half-century season began with the reception of Sir George Henschel as guest conductor. The noted English musician led the program with which he had inaugurated the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as its first conductor, in 1881.

Last month the orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave a Beethoven festival of national import in Washington, lasting a week. A Bach festival is to be presented in Boston in March in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for many years; presenting also a number of new scores written especially for the orchestra in its fiftieth season by the foremost living composers of Europe—Stravinsky, Ravel, Hindemith, Sibelius, Roussel, Dukas, Prokofieff, Honegger, Respighi; also the American composers—Copland, Carpenter, Hill and Hanson.

Just how and why the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to be one of the greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate, it is said. The simple facts of its history are self-explanatory. In 1881 the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. In contradistinction to current usage, he exacted of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave full artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his ability to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881 to 1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through twelve years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony Hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 25 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 25 1931

PARIS AND BRUSSELS

Recent Symphonies by Stravinsky and Prokofieff—Honegger's Operetta Bouffe

By HENRY PRUNIERES.

PARIS, Jan. 3, 1931.

AFTER a period of colorless stagnation, during which we have had few occasions to hear any new compositions of worth, we have just had the opportunity of welcoming several works, one after the other, of genuine importance. I have already written of the "Concerto Grosso" by the young Igor Markevitch, which was a real surprise. A few days after its presentation we had the privilege of hearing in Brussels the European première of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms." It was played the very evening before for the first time anywhere by the Boston Symphony, which had commissioned it for its fiftieth anniversary.

I feel somewhat diffident in speaking about this work, which no doubt will already have been brought to THE TIMES readers after its Boston presentation. This magnificent work impresses me as being the culminating point of the art of the Stravinsky who wrote "Petrouchka," "Le Sacre du Printemps" and "Noces." We feel a deep satisfaction in seeing him compose something once more which does not have to do with Bach, Handel or Tchaikovsky. From the start to the finish of this splendid work he remains himself.

For some time Brussels appears to be the citadel in the van of the new in art. Wagnerian opera was welcomed there in former days before it was tolerated on French stages. It was at Brussels that the operas by Chabrier and d'Indy were produced, and more recently, the latest musical novelties have received most cordial encouragement in that city.

* * *

Since last year the capital of Belgium has possessed a magnificent temple dedicated to all the arts. Le Palais des Beaux-Arts, erected through the initiative of the great Belgian Maecenas and moving spirit, M. Henry Le Boeuf, contains, in addition to immense exposition halls, a large concert hall also—if not the largest, it is at least the most perfect acoustically that I know of in Europe. Since its opening, orchestral concerts of the greatest interest have been held there with the best soloists. Many premières are heard there, and the most celebrated traveling orchestras achieve their triumphs within its walls. So it was last year with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini. One is now forced, therefore, to betake himself to Brussels several times each season to hear there the important novelties of which Paris is deprived.

Prokofieff's Fourth symphony, another work commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been played at the concerts of the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris under Pierre Monteux, who has succeeded in making this organization one of the best in Europe. In general, I like Prokofieff's music very much, but I must confess that in this work he has cheated. With the exception of the scherzo, which is a stroke of esprit, finesse and of inventiveness, it recalls the best pages of "Chout ou le Bouffon" and of "The Love of the Three Oranges." All the rest of the symphony impressed me as being of hurried and careless workmanship. The general impression left by the work was that a brilliant student had taken advantage of his facility to get through with a set task.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCRANTON, PA.
Times
JAN 27 1931

LESSON IN CONDUCTING.

Berlin, Jan. 27.—Miss Antonio Brico, of San Francisco has been taking instruction in conducting from Karl Muck, formerly director of the Boston symphony orchestra. She sat in the broadcasting room at his radio debut, when he conducted the Hamburg Philharmonic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
JAN 27 1931

H. T. P. himself is short and affable. His hair has begun to recede from his high forehead and his short clipped mustache is graying, but he is almost boyishly sprightly. His clothes are notable and slightly rakish. He affects bright tweeds and dislikes overcoats. His reading glasses are on a black ribbon and he smokes a pipe or cigarettes incessantly. When H. T. P. appears in the evening in an opera cloak of ancient and elegant vintage and chapeau claque it is a sign to Bostonians either that the opera season is at hand or that some momentous opening is toward. He usually dines in state at the window table at Winter Place Tavern, his meal served by Charlie and supervised by Nick Stuhl, and bobs his way into his seat as the lights of the house go down. You can see that H. T. P. is a Boston institution.

"I was never in a theater at all until I was nineteen and a freshman at Harvard," he told an interviewer while perched atop the radiator in his living room. "I was brought up remote from it and rather austerely, and possibly because I first saw it with semi-adult eyes I have missed the glamor that some find in it at first and even later. On the other hand the theater has never struck me as something inferior or debased. My inclination is to take whatever it offers for its quality in each variety of production. Possibly this point of view derives from the fact that I had no boyhood associations with the stage."

It is at his rooms at the Vendome that Mr. Parker fashions his reviews for the next afternoon's Transcript late at night. Preparing his copy at leisure and in longhand on old fashioned yellow copy paper, he deposits the completed notice with the night clerk at 4 or 5 in the morning and then sleeps till noon. During the morning one of the Trascript's gentlemanly copy boys transports the copy to the office, where Mr. Parker's favorite compositor sets it directly from his holograph in time for the first edition of the paper.

"The legend that I write reviews of extraordinary length is rather overdone," he says. "With something unusual in hand I may have touched three columns at times, but hardly in recent years. My usual length is a Transcript column and a quarter, or 1250 words. Only very rarely these days do I reach two columns, and then only when there is notable acting as well as a notable play. I really believe that my lengths are neither repetitions nor windy I watch for both."

One of the most prominent features of Mr. Parker's reviews is his prose stylism, and that a certain

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR EAGLE

years and mutations.

Your Bostonian of tradition lives on the right side of Commonwealth avenue and walks to his office every morning at 8.30 o'clock, carrying a green cloth bag of books and papers, despite the fact that a costly motor of foreign manufacture stands outside his door. He belongs to the Union and the Somerset Clubs, votes for Irish-American mayors because he likes them, and when he is buried (from Trinity Church) is found to have been astoundingly rich and to have left a fund to provide roast pig for the students of Groton or St. Mark's School on Founders' Day, or something of the sort.

But more essential to the peace of mind, nay, to the very existence of your true Bostonian, is that institution and tradition, "The Boston Evening Transcript." Last summer the Transcript celebrated its 100th anniversary, but as the city itself was simultaneously signalizing its tercentenary, the happy newspaper longevity did not appear to Bostonians to be helf so amazing as the realization that for two centuries previous to its foundation the city had managed to get along without any Transcript at all.

And among readers of the Transcript, no feature, not even the Saturday list, neatly boxed and top-columned on the front page, of marriages and engagements, is so eagerly awaited and closely scanned as the music and dramatic notices signed with the initials "H. T. P." Inescapably associated in the minds of thousands of readers with the Transcript, famous for a generation as the ranking dramatic critic of the American provinces, emphatic bachelor, familiar figure of Paris and Munich, genial commentator of unimpeached integrity, Bostonian to the tips of his polished fingernails, Henry Taylor Parker would seem to have been designed by a highly competent Providence to climb the Washington street stairs (Editors 2 flights, Reporters 3 flights) of the Transcript office and report in two and a half columns of scholarly and reflective criticism the Friday afternoon doings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This year will mark a quarter of a century on the staff of the Transcript, for H. T. P., and during that time there is little of the world of drama and music with which he has not become intimately familiar. He does not wish to be called a dean of critics. The word has to him a terrifying implication of senility, but he is certainly a distinguished figure in the ranks of dramatic commentators and reviewers in general.

"I have been associated with the theater and concert hall a long time now, and these have been my life, but I won't be called a dean," he declares. "I shall retire while I am still able to do my best work and end my days in one of the cities I love, Munich or Vienna. I will not grow stale and feeble in harness."

H. T. P. received the interviewer in his rooms at the Vendome Hotel. If you know Boston you will know the Vendome. It was built sixty years ago on the corner of Dartmouth street, at Commonwealth avenue. The Webster house, with its conservatory gay with flowers even in midwinter, faces it. On the other corner (stand and uncover) is the Chilton Club. In the mail of the Avenue under its windows is a heroic statue of William Lloyd Garrison. The Vendome is all that its surroundings imply.

PLANE CARRIED HIM TO CONCERT IN BOSTON

Because time was too short for him to travel by rail to Boston hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, I. A. Hirschmann, dire tor of sales and publicity for L. Bamberger & Co., attired in eveni clothes, left the Newark Airport at 4:45 last night and arrived in the N England city in time for dinner with Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Hutchison the Juilliard School before the musical program. Today he was back his desk.

110

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 25 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Play At Mosque February 2

Famous Organization Is Feted Throughout Tour of Country; Koussevitzky to Direct Orchestra on Presentation Here

Midway in its fiftieth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be presented at the Mosque February 2 by the Richmond Civic Music Association, is being honored from all sides as one of the finest musical organizations in the present world, and as the oldest orchestra of high and permanent standing in this country. The half-century season began with the reception of Sir George Henschel as guest conductor. The noted English musician led the program with which he had inaugurated the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as its first conductor, in 1881.

Last month the orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave a Beethoven festival of national import in Washington, lasting a week. A Bach festival is to be presented in Boston in March in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for many years; presenting also a number of new scores written especially for the orchestra in its fiftieth season by the foremost living composers of Europe—Stravinsky, Ravel, Hindemith, Sibelius, Roussel, Dukas, Prokofieff, Honegger, Respighi; also the American composers—Copland, Carpenter, Hill and Hanson.

Just how and why the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to be one of the greatest in the world leaves little room for speculation or debate, it is said. The simple facts of its history are self-explanatory. In 1881 the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. In contradistinction to current usage, he exacted of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave full artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his ability to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881 to 1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through twelve years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony Hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 25 1931

I feel somewhat diffident in speaking about this work, which no doubt will already have been brought to THE TIMES readers after its Boston presentation. This magnificent work impresses me as being the culminating point of the art of the Stravinsky who wrote "Petrouchka," "Le Sacre du Printemps" and "Noces." We feel a deep satisfaction in seeing him compose something once more which does not have to do with Bach, Handel or Tchaikovsky. From the start to the finish of this splendid work he remains himself.

For some time Brussels appears to be the citadel in the van of the new in art. Wagnerian opera was welcomed there in former days before it was tolerated on French stages. It was at Brussels that the operas by Chabrier and d'Indy were produced, and more recently, the latest musical novelties have received most cordial encouragement in that city.

* * *

Since last year the capital of Belgium has possessed a magnificent temple dedicated to all the arts. Le Palais des Beaux-Arts, erected through the initiative of the great Belgian Maecenas and moving spirit, M. Henry Le Boeuf, contains, in addition to immense exposition halls, a large concert hall also—if not the largest, it is at least the most perfect acoustically that I know of in Europe. Since its opening, orchestral concerts of the greatest interest have been held there with the best soloists. Many premières are heard there, and the most celebrated traveling orchestras achieve their triumphs within its walls. So it was last year with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini. One is now forced, therefore, to betake himself to Brussels several times each season to hear there the important novelties of which Paris is deprived.

Prokofieff's Fourth symphony, another work commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been played at the concerts of the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris under Pierre Monteux, who has succeeded

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SCRANTON, PA.
JAN 27 1931

LESSON IN CONDUCTING.

Berlin, Jan. 27.—Miss Antonio Brico, of San Francisco has been taking instruction in conducting from Karl Muck, formerly director of the Boston symphony orchestra. She sat in the broadcasting room at his radio debut, when he conducted the Hamburg Philharmonic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
JAN 27 1931

Bostonese

Did you ever hear of the Boston newspaper man who is credited with first inviting his reviews of things theatrical in Latin and then translating them into English? If you have not, and care to get a delightful viewpoint of Boston and certain Boston institutions, by all means read Lucius Beebe's article on "Boston's H. T. P." on Drama and Critics in the New York Sunday Herald-Tribune, in which Mr. Beebe says in part:

Boston, like the New England in whose midst it is set, is a city of traditions. There are traditions of Lowells and of Codfish, of the Common and Public Garden, of a pervading spirit of liberalism and individuality latent beneath overtones of a conventional austerity, traditions of personalities and qualities and institutions which survive the tides of time and change and are inevitably characteristic and Bostonian despite all years and mutations.

Your Bostonian of tradition lives on the right side of Commonwealth avenue and walks to his office every morning at 8.30 o'clock, carrying a green cloth bag of books and papers, despite the fact that a costly motor of foreign manufacture stands outside his door. He belongs to the Union and the Somerset Clubs, votes for Irish-American mayors because he likes them, and when he is buried (from Trinity Church), is found to have been astoundingly rich and to have left a fund to provide roast pig for the students of Groton or St. Mark's School on Founders' Day, or something of the sort.

But more essential to the peace of mind, nay, to the very existence of your true Bostonian, is that institution and tradition, "The Boston Evening Transcript." Last summer the Transcript celebrated its 100th anniversary, but as the city itself was simultaneously signalizing its tercentenary, the happy newspaper longevity did not appear to Bostonians to be helf so amazing as the realization that for two centuries previous to its foundation the city had managed to get along without any Transcript at all.

And among readers of the Transcript, no feature, not even the Saturday list, neatly boxed, and top-columned on the front page, of marriages and engagements, is so eagerly awaited and closely scanned as the music and dramatic notices signed with the initials "H. T. P." Inescapably associated in the minds of thousands of readers with the Transcript, famous for a generation as the ranking dramatic critic of the American provinces, emphatic bachelor, familiar figure of Paris and Munich, genial commentator of unimpeached integrity, Bostonian to the tips of his polished fingernails, Henry Taylor Parker would seem to have been designed by a highly competent Providence to climb the Washington street stairs (Editors 2 flights, Reporters 3 flights) of the Transcript office and report in two and a half columns of scholarly and reflective criticism the Friday afternoon doings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This year will mark a quarter of a century on the staff of the Transcript, for H. T. P., and during that time there is little of the world of drama and music with which he has not become intimately familiar. He does not wish to be called a dean of critics. The word has to him a terrifying implication of senility, but he is certainly a distinguished figure in the ranks of dramatic commentators and reviewers in general.

"I have been associated with the theater and concert hall a long time now, and these have been my life, but I won't be called a dean," he declares. "I shall retire while I am still able to do my best work and end my days in one of the cities I love, Munich or Vienna. I will not grow stale and feeble in harness."

H. T. P. received the interviewer in his rooms at the Vendome Hotel. If you know Boston you will know the Vendome. It was built sixty years ago on the corner of Dartmouth street, at Commonwealth avenue. The Webster house, with its conservatory gay with flowers even in midwinter, faces it. On the other corner (stand and uncover) is the Chilton Club. In the mall of the Avenue under its windows is a heroic statue of William Lloyd Garrison. The Vendome is all that its surroundings imply.

H. T. P. himself is short and affable. His hair has begun to recede from his high forehead and his short clipped mustache is graying, but he is almost boyishly sprightly. His clothes are notable and slightly rakish. He affects bright tweeds and dislikes overcoats. His reading glasses are on a black ribbon and he smokes a pipe or cigarettes incessantly. When H. T. P. appears in the evening in an opera cloak of ancient and elegant vintage and chapeau claque it is a sign to Bostonians either that the opera season is at hand or that some momentous opening is toward. He usually dines in state at the window table at Winter Place Tavern, his meal served by Charlie and supervised by Nick Stuhl, and bobs his way into his seat as the lights of the house go down. You can see that H. T. P. is a Boston institution.

"I was never in a theater at all until I was nineteen and a freshman at Harvard," he told an interviewer while perched atop the radiator in his living room. "I was brought up remote from it and rather austerely, and possibly because I first saw it with semi-adult eyes I have missed the glamor that some find in it at first and even later. On the other hand the theater has never struck me as something inferior or debased. My inclination is to take whatever it offers for its quality in each variety of production. Possibly this point of view derives from the fact that I had no boyhood associations with the stage."

It is at his rooms at the Vendome that Mr. Parker fashions his reviews for the next afternoon's Transcript late at night. Preparing his copy at leisure and in longhand on old fashioned yellow copy paper, he deposits the completed notice with the night clerk at 4 or 5 in the morning and then sleeps till noon. During the morning one of the Trascript's gentlemanly copy boys transports the copy to the office, where Mr. Parker's favorite compositor sets it directly from his holograph in time for the first edition of the paper.

"The legend that I write reviews of extraordinary length is rather overdone," he says. "With something unusual in hand I may have touched three columns at times, but hardly in recent years. My usual length is a Transcript column and a quarter, or 1250 words. Only very rarely these days do I reach two columns, and then only when there is notable acting as well as a notable play. I really believe that my lengths are neither repetitions nor windy I watch for both."

One of the most prominent features of Mr. Parker's reviews is his prose stylism, and that a certain amount of impressiveness derives from the polished phrases in which his obiter dicta are couched is undeniable to those familiar with the contrapuntal prose he affects and his litotes, balanced antitheses, subjunctives, periphrastics and cognate accusatives. He denies, however, the humorous suggestion of one reader that perhaps he first writes his reviews in Latin and then translates them into English. Nor has he ever been a too enthusiastic admirer of Henry James.

Toonerville Folks

Because time was too short for him to travel by rail to Boston hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, I. A. Hirschmann, dire tor of sales and publicity for L. Bamberger & Co., attired in eveni clothes, left the Newark Airport at 4:45 last night and arrived in the N England city in time for dinner with Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Hutchison the Juillard School before the musical program. Today he was back his desk.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW MERGER UNITES 3 ARTISTS' BUREAUS

N. B. C. Service Takes Over R. C. A. Victor Record Bookings and Civic Concert Group.

ANNUAL INCOME $10,000,000

Entertainment Now Controlled by Two Huge Units—Major Figures of Music World Involved.

Negotiations were completed yesterday for uniting artist booking organizations whose annual business totals $10,000,000. Under the arrangement, NBC Artists Service assumes charge of booking all artists and organizations making records for the RCA Victor Company and acquires an extensive interest in Civic Concert Service, Inc., which operates concert courses in 182 cities.

George Engles, vice president of the National Broadcasting Company and managing director of the NBC Artists Service, made the announcement.

The new alignment also brings many additional artists under NBC Service direction, making a total of 105 major concert and opera stars and 250 radio artists. The merger becomes effective today.

The new organization is as yet unnamed, and its officers have not been announced. The artists involved become available immediately for broadcasting purposes over the networks of WEAF and WJZ exclusively, according to the announcement.

Is Second Recent Merger.

The new alignment is the second announced in as many months. Seven large concert bureaus merged with the Columbia Broadcasting System several weeks ago, forming the Columbia Concerts Corporation. This first merger, announced on Dec. 10, became effective the first of the year. The two huge booking bureaus, it was pointed out, now control practically all musical talent in this country and abroad for concert, broadcasting and recording purposes.

The two mergers bring to a head the movement for consolidation that has taken hold of the musical business recently. Mergers also have taken place or are contemplated among the music publishing houses, leaving practically no phase of the field untouched by the current trend.

It is estimated by persons close to the radio enterprises that two national broadcasting contracts would pay for the expense of a merged concert bureau for one year and that six or eight such contracts would mean a profit for the parent concern running high in six figures.

Among the musicians and entertainers affiliated with the new service, including those who have been added by new contracts, are:

Ignace Jan Paderewski, Florence Austral, John Charles Thomas, Efrem Zimbalist, Walter Damrosch, Dusolina Giannini, Anna Case, Mischa Levitzki, Victor Chenkin, Reinald Werrenrath, Josef Lhévinne, Schumann-Heink, Beniamino Gigli, Floyd Gibbons, Rudy Vallee, Amos 'n' Andy, Grantland Rice, Phil Cook and the Revelers.

The Victor artists include John McCormack, Chaliapin, Rachmaninoff, Sirr Harry Lauder, Gigli, Bori, Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Galli Curci, Lawrence Tibbett, Mischa Elman, Walter Damrosch, Maurice Chevalier and the Metropolitan Opera Company.

"The NBC Artists Service," said Mr. Engles, "may be said to be coordinating the entire amusement field. Its diffused booking activities are enormously widening the opportunities of artists of every variety. Concert and operatic stars particularly are benefiting by this new development in the managerial field."

Miss Dema Harshbarger, founder of the Civic Concert Service, will remain as its president. The service has as its purpose the creating of new concert audiences in cities which otherwise have few or no musical events. New audiences totaling 250,000 have been added to the country's regular concertgoers through the activities of the organization cooperating with State and City Government officials, it has been announced.

Mr. Engles said he would relinquish his duties as head of the program division of the National Broadcasting Company to devote his time to the new bureau.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
1931

Boston Orchestra In Final Concert February 3.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, which was recently heard here in a four-day festival of Beethoven music, will make its final concert appearance of the current season at Constitution Hall next Tuesday afternoon, February 3, at 4:30 o'clock as the third attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's philharmonic series of afternoon concerts at that auditorium.

For his final appearance in the Capital this season Dr. Koussevitsky has chosen a splendid program that will offer Tschaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony in F Minor, Opus 36," as well as Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Opus 47"; the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

YOUNG AMERICAN COMPOSER

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, has returned to this country after a successful year in Berlin, to accept an invitation as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra for two concerts.

In February the League Composers will play his composition for viola and clarinet at one of their concerts. In March Serge Koussevitzky has invited Berezowsky to conduct his own symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Not yet thirty, Mr. Berezowsky has had a busy and colorful career. He was born in Russia, but most of his musical education has been obtained in this country, and he is an American citizen. He held a double Fellowship at the Juilliard Graduate School for four years, studying composition with Rubin Goldmark and violin with Paul Kochanski. While studying he supported himself as a member of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in New York City, and the year before his departure for Europe he was made concertmaster of the second violin section.

Last April, while in Germany, Mr. Berezowsky was invited by Fritz Busch to conduct the Dresden Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. At this concert Carl Flesch was soloist and played Berezowsky's Violin Concerto, with the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Concert Will Feature Russian Composer

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Here Monday

Iger Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra will be a feature of the concert to be given in the Mosque auditorium by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday evening at 8:30 o'clock. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has introduced this score to America this season, playing it in Boston, New York and other cities. It is one of the Russian composer's latest works, having been first performed in Paris last year.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, brilliant young Spanish-American pianist, will appear as soloist in the "Capriccio." Koussevitzky will open the program with Mozart's symphony in G minor.

The last part of the program will consist of Tchaikovsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4. This symphony of Koussevitzky's fellow Russian composer has been considered as one of this conductor's most moving and striking interpretations during his seven years in America.

The concert will be under the auspices of the Richmond Civic Music Association.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 31 1931

* * *

Masquerades," the well known composition by Carl Mckinley, formerly this city, was on the program last we at a concert of the Boston Symph orchestra given in that city under direction of Serge Koussevitzky. work was enthusiastically recei "Masquerades" has been played by Philadelphia and Chicago orchest the latter presenting it under the rection of the composer himself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
1931

Berezowsky to Conduct in Cincinnati

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, has returned to this country after a successful year in Berlin, to accept an invitation as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra in Cincinnati, Ohio, for two concerts. In February the League of Composers will play his composition for viola and clarinet at one of their concerts. In March he will conduct his own symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on invitation of Koussevitsky. Born in Russia, he came to this country as a lad and is a naturalized citizen. He held a double fellowship at the Juilliard Graduate School of Music for four years, studying composition with Rubin Goldmark and the violin with Paul Kochanski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
JAN 30 1931

The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit of the season to Brooklyn to give a concert in the Academy of Music next Thursday evening instead of the usual Friday evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with Sir Edward Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro" for String Orchestra, Op. 47. He will introduce to Brooklyn Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra which, first performed in Paris last year has had its first American performance under his direction in Boston, New York and other cities. The soloist in this score will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, the brilliant young Spanish-American pianist.

The latter part of the programme will be occupied by Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." This set of pianoforte pieces has been arranged for a large orchestra by Maurice Ravel, who made the arrangement especially for Koussevitzky and it was by him that the suite was first played in Europe and America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Boston Symphony Body to Appear Here Monday

Orchestra Will Present Its Fourth Concert in City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, comprising 110 musicians under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and a managing staff, will leave Boston for Richmond by special train tomorrow night, arriving here early Monday for the concert to be given that night at the Mosque under the auspices of the Richmond Civic Music Association. The event, it was stated, is expected to prove the most brilliant artistic and social occasion of Richmond's season.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct in Richmond his fourth concert since returning to the orchestra from a vacation. The celebrated orchestra this season is observing its fiftieth anniversary and a particularly interesting program, including Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, will be presented here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD
1931

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall for its third pair of concerts of the season Friday instead of the usual Thursday evening, and Saturday afternoon. At the first concert the program will consist of Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra; the Seventh and latest symphony of Sibelius, and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." At the matinee concert the Stravinsky Capriccio for piano and orchestra played on the last visit will be repeated, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist, and two preludes of Bach and the Strauss work will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JAN 31 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO CLIMAX SEASON

Interesting Program in Richmond Monday Night Announced by Leader.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

On Monday night the great climax of the musical season will occur with the presentation of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Mosque. An interesting program has been announced by Mr. Koussevitsky, which will include the Mozart G minor symphony, Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for orchestra, with piano solo, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4, in F minor.

The Mozart Symphony is one of three which were his last essays in this form of music. Nothing in his career is more remarkable than the production of these three masterpieces, so utterly different from one another in spirit, within the space of three months, not to speak of their coming at a time when he was deeply harrassed by debt and the constant illness of his wife. This one in G minor is the final expression in "absolute" music of Mozart's characteristic melancholy, which is entirely free from morbidity or the more introspective struggle with fate which is the leading motive of so much of the nineteenth century music.

No Self-Dramatization.

He does not indulge in self-dramatization; all is reflective, contemplative and lyrical, even when the mood is one of restlessness. Schumann has spoken of its "swaying Grecian grace," while Wagner says: "Compared with Haydn's, Mozart's symphonies are of significance almost solely through the extraordinary feeling, singing nature of their instrumental themes . . . and while he brought to Italian opera the richer development of the German mode of instrumental composition, he imparted in turn to the orchestral melody the full euphony of the Italian mode of song."

The qualities of Mozart's music, the absolute sense of proportion and gratefully disciplined expression are being more than ever sought by those who are feeling the unrest of our time. It has, as Warde Fowler says: "First, a joyousness, a sense of fragrance of life' never boisterous,

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

derness, s natur- of 'the at feel- es in a ts come f span nd be- ent of finally booms, add- scor- night on of it to now ments "An- Ass- will rnism e. left Paris Lak ncipl musi ppea erar s or and in nts. cus- om- with This we dical ced nd- ging ow- is, our of us ism ave ny, hat best ron om rm ing

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
JAN 31 1931

Among th

KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Players Return Tuesday

Koussevitzky to Lead Orchestra in Afternoon Concert

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Washington for a concert Tuesday afternoon in Constitution Hall. The concert will begin promptly at 4:30. Late comers will be admitted at the close of each number.

It is just two months since Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought his men here for the Beethoven Festival and he now returns with a varied program, for his last concert here this year.

It is the jubilee year and after its present tour, the famed orchestra will return to Boston and give another festival—a Bach one—in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and supported it in its early days.

Modern Scores

A number of modern scores have been written especially for the orchestra in honor of this anniversary, by well known European composers, such as Ravel, Stravinsky, Hindemith, Sibelius, Dukas, Prokofieff, Respighi and Honegger. These compositions are being played this spring also.

It is a great year for Dr. Koussevitzky who has led the orchestra since 1924, and he promises to go down in the orchestra's history along with such great conductors as Karl

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

orge

y is , in pro- ges the y's ved ol-gar mer avel sky

FAMED BOSTON SYMPHONY TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will make its final Washington appearance of this, its fiftieth anniversary season, with a concert at Constitution Hall on Tuesday afternoon, February 3, at 4:30 o'clock, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. This concert will constitute the third attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic series of afternoon musical events at Constitution Hall.

Just two months have passed since the Boston Symphony, under Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliant and inspired leadership, celebrated its fiftieth anniversary season—1930-31—with a four-performance festival of Beethoven music at Constitution Hall that completely eclipsed any festival of orchestral music ever before given in this city. Already a Bach festival, even more pretentious than the Washington Beethoven event, is planned by the Boston Symphony for next month (March) in Boston in memory of Major Henry L. Higginson, who founded the Boston Symphony 50 years ago and who, single handed, supported it for many seasons.

For his final 1930-31 Washington concert Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen a program of great distinction and charm. It offers the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony in F minor (opus 36) in four movements: (1) Andante sostenuto, moderto con anima (in movemento di valse); (2) Andantino in modo do canzona; (3) Scherzo, pizzicato ostinato; (4) Finale: Allegro con fuoco. Elgar's introduction and illegro for string orchestra (Opus 47) will open the program, which will also include the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the Ravel choreographic poem, "La Valse."

Church Auxiliary To Conduct Drive

March is Woman's Auxiliary month at St. James Methodist church, during this period special efforts will be made to increase the membership and build up the usefulness of this organization. At the morning service Sunday, Mrs. James Richardson, of Barton Heights Methodist church, will make a short address on "Woman's Work." An inspiring song service will feature the evening services and the pastor, Rev. R. Orman Bryant, will speak on "The Tragedy of Spiritual Dullness."

Stephen A. Haboush Will Be Speaker

Stephen A. Haboush, known as "The Shepherd Boy of Galilee," will speak at the 8 o'clock service at the Barton Heights Methodist church on "My Shepherd Life in Galilee." Mr. Haboush was born and reared on the Western shores of the Sea of Galilee and was a shepherd in his youth.

Bible Association Will Meet Monday

The Bible Conference Association of Richmond will meet Monday night at 6 o'clock at the Central Y. M. C. A. where supper will be served. Mrs. T. A. Cary will speak on "My Experiences in Palestine."

---

school; 11 A. M., "The Millenium"; 7 P. M., prayer and testimony meeting; 7:45 P. M., revival service; special music and sermon by Rev. Helen Leh-

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW MERGER UNITES 3 ARTISTS' BUREAUS

N. B. C. Service Takes Over R. C. A. Victor Record Bookings and Civic Concert Group.

ANNUAL INCOME $10,000,000

Entertainment Now Controlled by Two Huge Units—Major Figures of Music World Involved.

Negotiations were completed yesterday for uniting artist booking organizations whose annual business totals $10,000,000. Under the arrangement, NBC Artists Service assumes charge of booking all artists and organizations making records for the RCA Victor Company and acquires an extensive interest in Civic Concert Service, Inc., which operates concert courses in 182 cities.

George Engles, vice president of the National Broadcasting Company and managing director of the NBC Artists Service, made the announcement.

The new alignment also brings many additional artists under NBC Service direction, making a total of 105 major concert and opera stars and 250 radio artists. The merger becomes effective today.

The new organization is as yet unnamed, and its officers have not been announced. The artists involved become available immediately for broadcasting purposes over the networks of WEAF and WJZ exclusively, according to the announcement.

Is Second Recent Merger.

The new alignment is the second announced in as many months. Seven large concert bureaus merged with the Columbia Broadcasting System several weeks ago, forming the Columbia Concerts Corporation. This first merger, announced on Dec. 10, became effective the first of the year. The two huge booking bureaus, it was pointed out, now control practically all musical talent in this country and abroad for concert, broadcasting and recording purposes.

The two mergers bring to a head the movement for consolidation that has taken hold of the musical business recently. Mergers also have taken place or are contemplated among the music publishing houses, leaving practically no phase of the field untouched by the current trend.

It is estimated by persons close to the radio enterprises that two national broadcasting contracts would pay for the expense of a merged concert bureau for one year and that six or eight such contracts would mean a profit for the parent concern running high in six figures.

Among the musicians and entertainers affiliated with the new service, including those who have been added by new contracts, are:

Ignace Jan Paderewski, Florence Austral, John Charles Thomas, Efrem Zimbalist, Walter Damrosch, Dusolina Giannini, Anna Case, Mischa Levitzki, Victor Chenkin, Reinald Werrenrath, Josef Lhévinne, Schumann-Heink, Beniamino Gigli, Floyd Gibbons, Rudy Vallee, Amos 'n' Andy, Grantland Rice, Phil Cook and the Revelers.

The Victor artists include John McCormack, Chaliapin, Rachmaninoff, Sirr Harry Lauder, Gigli, Bori, Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Galli Curci, Lawrence Tibbett, Mischa Elman, Walter Damrosch, Maurice Chevalier and the Metropolitan Opera Company.

"The NBC Artists Service," said Mr. Engles, "may be said to be coordinating the entire amusement field. Its diffused booking activities are enormously widening the opportunities of artists of every variety. Concert and operatic stars particularly are benefiting by this new development in the managerial field."

Miss Dema Harshbarger, founder of the Civic Concert Service, will remain as its president. The service has as its purpose the creating of new concert audiences in cities which otherwise have few or no musical events. New audiences totaling 250,000 have been added to the country's regular concertgoers through the activities of the organization cooperating with State and City Government officials, it has been announced.

Mr. Engles said he would relinquish his duties as head of the program division of the National Broadcasting Company to devote his time to the new bureau.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JAN 31 1931

Boston Orchestra In Final Concert February 3.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, which was recently heard here in a four-day festival of Beethoven music, will make its final concert appearance of the current season at Constitution Hall next Tuesday afternoon, February 3, at 4:30 o'clock as the third attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's philharmonic series of afternoon concerts at that auditorium.

For his final appearance in the Capital this season Dr. Koussevitsky has chosen a splendid program that will offer Tschaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony in F Minor, Opus 36," as well as Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Opus 47"; the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

YOUNG AMERICAN COMPOSER

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, has returned to this country after a successful year in Berlin, to accept an invitation as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra for two concerts.

In February the League Composers will play his composition for viola and clarinet at one of their concerts. In March Serge Koussevitzky has invited Berezowsky to conduct his own symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Not yet thirty, Mr. Berezowsky has had a busy and colorful career. He was born in Russia, but most of his musical education has been obtained in this country, and he is an American citizen. He held a double Fellowship at the Juilliard Graduate School for four years, studying composition with Rubin Goldmark and violin with Paul Kochanski. While studying he supported himself as a member of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in New York City, and the year before his departure for Europe he was made concertmaster of the second violin section.

Last April, while in Germany, Mr. Berezowsky was invited by Fritz Busch to conduct the Dresden Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. At this concert Carl Flesch was soloist and played Berezowsky's Violin Concerto, with the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Concert Will Feature Russian Composer

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Here Monday

Iger Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra will be a feature of the concert to be given in the Mosque auditorium by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday evening at 8:30 o'clock. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has introduced this score to America this season, playing it in Boston, New York and other cities. It is one of the Russian composer's latest works, having been first performed in Paris last year.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, brilliant young Spanish-American pianist, will appear as soloist in the "Capriccio." Koussevitzky will open the program with Mozart's symphony in G minor.

The last part of the program will consist of Tchaikovsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4. This symphony of Koussevitzky's fellow Russian composer has been considered as one of this conductor's most moving and striking interpretations during his seven years in America.

The concert will be under the auspices of the Richmond Civic Music Association.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 31 1931

* * * *

Masquerades," the well known composition by Carl Mckinley, formerly this city, was on the program last we at a concert of the Boston Symph orchestra given in that city under direction of Serge Koussevitzky. work was enthusiastically receiv "Masquerades" has been played by Philadelphia and Chicago orchest the latter presenting it under the rection of the composer himself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

JAN 29 1931

Berezowsky to Conduct in Cincinnati

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, has returned to this country after a successful year in Berlin, to accept an invitation as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra in Cincinnati, Ohio, for two concerts. In February the League of Composers will play his composition for viola and clarinet at one of their concerts. In March he will conduct his own symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on invitation of Koussevitzky. Born in Russia, he came to this country as a lad and is a naturalized citizen. He held a double fellowship at the Juilliard Graduate School of Music for four years, studying composition with Rubin Goldmark and the violin with Paul Kochanski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JAN 30 1931

The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit of the season to Brooklyn to give a concert in the Academy of Music next Thursday evening instead of the usual Friday evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with Sir Edward Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro" for String Orchestra, Op. 47. He will introduce to Brooklyn Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra which, first performed in Paris last year has had its first American performance under his direction in Boston, New York and other cities. The soloist in this score will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, the brilliant young Spanish-American pianist.

The latter part of the programme will be occupied by Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." This set of pianoforte pieces has been arranged for a large orchestra by Maurice Ravel, who made the arrangement especially for Koussevitzky and it was by him that the suite was first played in Europe and America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

JAN 31 1931

Boston Symphony Body to Appear Here Monday

Orchestra Will Present Its Fourth Concert in City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, comprising 110 musicians under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and a managing staff, will leave Boston for Richmond by special train tomorrow night, arriving here early Monday for the concert to be given that night at the Mosque under the auspices of the Richmond Civic Music Association. The event, it was stated, is expected to prove the most brilliant artistic and social occasion of Richmond's season.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct in Richmond his fourth concert since returning to the orchestra from a vacation. The celebrated orchestra this season is observing its fiftieth anniversary and a particularly interesting program, including Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, will be presented here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

JAN 31 1931

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall for its third pair of concerts of the season Friday instead of the usual Thursday evening, and Saturday afternoon. At the first concert the program will consist of Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra; the Seventh and latest symphony of Sibelius, and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." At the matinee concert the Stravinsky Capriccio for piano and orchestra played on the last visit will be repeated, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist, and two preludes of Bach and the Strauss work will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

JAN 31 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO CLIMAX SEASON

Interesting Program in Richmond Monday Night Announced by Leader.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

On Monday night the great climax of the musical season will occur with the presentation of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Mosque. An interesting program has been announced by Mr. Koussevitsky, which will include the Mozart G minor symphony, Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for orchestra, with piano solo, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4, in F minor.

The Mozart Symphony is one of three which were his last essays in this form of music. Nothing in his career is more remarkable than the production of these three masterpieces, so utterly different from one another in spirit, within the space of three months, not to speak of their coming at a time when he was deeply harrassed by debt and the constant illness of his wife. This one in G minor is the final expression in "absolute" music of Mozart's characteristic melancholy, which is entirely free from morbidity or the more introspective struggle with fate which is the leading motive of so much of the nineteenth century music.

No Self-Dramatization.

He does not indulge in self-dramatization; all is reflective, contemplative and lyrical, even when the mood is one of restlessness. Schumann has spoken of its "swaying Grecian grace," while Wagner says: "Compared with Haydn's, Mozart's symphonies are of significance almost solely through the extraordinary feeling, singing nature of their instrumental themes . . . and while he brought to Italian opera the richer development of the German mode of instrumental composition, he imparted in turn to the orchestral melody the full euphony of the Italian mode of song."

The qualities of Mozart's music, the absolute sense of proportion and gratefully disciplined expression are being more than ever sought by those who are feeling the unrest of our time. It has, as Warde Fowler says: "First, a joyousness, a sense of fragrance of life; never boisterous, but always buoyant and fresh.

Secondly, a gentle tenderness, never sentimental, but always natural and inevitable,—a sense of 'the tears that are in things'—that feeling he so poignantly expresses in a letter to Da Ponte, when he has come nearly to the close of his brief span of life—"I have come to an end before having had the enjoyment of my talent." It was scored originally for flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns and strings. He later added two clarinet parts and new scoring for the the oboes.

The score to be used Monday night was for years in the possession of Brahms, who would not allow it to go out of his hands, but it has now been published. The four movements are denoted "Allegro Molto," "Andante, Menuetto" and "Allegro Assai."

The Stravinsky "Capriccio" will plunge us at once into modernism of a radical sort, by this Russian composer, who, at an early age, left his country, and has lived in Paris and at various places around Lake Geneva. The dominating principle of his art is his belief that music should make a purely physical appeal and should be free from any literary or pictorial associations. His orchestral scores are full of color and brilliance, with great originality in the employment of the instruments. This follows Mr. Koussevitsky's custom of giving us one modern composition—even ultra-modern—with each program he plays here. This is an excellent idea.

Whether we like them or not, we must keep abreast of the musical tides, and in this case he has placed it between two readily understandable symphonies, rather than placing it chronologically at the last, showing what a keen psychologist he is, allowing us ten minutes to get our breath after the physical shock of the "Capriccio," then sending us home with the brilliant romanticism of Tschaikowsky in our ears.

It is delightful that we are to have Tschaikowsky's Fourth Sympthony, since it is the one of all others that he loved best and considered his best work. It is dedicated to Nadejda von Meck, his great benefactress, whom he never saw but whose letters form so large a part of his fascinating biography.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

JAN 31 1931

Among th

KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Players Return Tuesday

Koussevitzky to Lead Orchestra in Afternoon Concert

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Washington for a concert Tuesday afternoon in Constitution Hall. The concert will begin promptly at 4:30. Late comers will be admitted at the close of each number.

It is just two months since Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought his men here for the Beethoven Festival and he now returns with a varied program, for his last concert here this year.

It is the jubilee year and after its present tour, the famed orchestra will return to Boston and give another festival—a Bach one—in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and supported it in its early days.

Modern Scores

A number of modern scores have been written especially for the orchestra in honor of this anniversary by well known European composers, such as Ravel, Stravinsky, Hindemith, Sibelius, Dukas, Prokofieff, Respighi and Honegger. These compositions are being played this spring also.

It is a great year for Dr. Koussevitzky who has led the orchestra since 1924, and he promises to go down in the orchestra's history along with such great conductors as Karl [illegible] orge

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

[illegible]y is [illegible], in pro[illegible]ges
the

FOURTH SYMPHONY TO BE PRESENTED

Boston Orchestra Will Play Tchaikovsky Number; Romance Told.

The fourth symphony of Tchaikovsky, which is to be played at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Mosque Feb. 2 is closely connected with the one great romance and intellectual relationship of the Russian composer's life.

Tchaikovsky dedicated his fourth symphony, "To My Best Friend," referring to Madame Von Meck, a widow of large fortune with whom the composer had a remarkable relationship. As a patroness of music she corresponded with him, and, learning of his financial straits, arranged to send him a yearly sum of six thousand roubles, tactfully insisting that they should never meet.

Through thirteen years of friendship they never spoke. Once they encountered accidentally in a grove of her estate, whereupon Tchaikovsky lifted his hat and fled. By letter he became her intimate confidant.

He wrote to her continually of the progress of his fifth symphony, and freely confided his alternate hopes and fears concerning its success. About this particular symphony he had more than one moment of discouragement.

But time has more than confirmed the poignent beauty of this mighty score. Of the fourth, fifth and sixth (or "Pathetic") symphonies, many musicians consider this the greatest, and indeed Tchaikovsky's masterpiece.

Unfortunately, the Russian composer's ideal relationship with his dear friend and patron was destined to end in trouble and distress. Madame von Meck wrote in December, 1890, that she faced bankruptcy, and would have to discontinue the allowance. The letter caused a cruel misunderstanding. "Do you really think me incapable of remembering you, now that I no longer receive your money?" Tchaikovsky answered. For a while he was too wounded to make any further advance. When he did, there was no response. As fate had it this long friendship was terminated only three years before the composer's death. And she learned the news on her own deathbed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW MERGER UNITES 3 ARTISTS' BUREAUS

N. B. C. Service Takes Over R. C. A. Victor Record Bookings and Civic Concert Group.

ANNUAL INCOME $10,000,000

Entertainment Now Controlled by Two Huge Units—Major Figures of Music World Involved.

Negotiations were completed yesterday for uniting artist booking organizations whose annual business totals $10,000,000. Under the arrangement, NBC Artists Service assumes charge of booking all artists and organizations making records for the RCA Victor Company and acquires an extensive interest in Civic Concert Service, Inc., which operates concert courses in 182 cities.

George Engles, vice president of the National Broadcasting Company and managing director of the NBC Artists Service, made the announcement.

The new alignment also brings many additional artists under NBC Service direction, making a total of 105 major concert and opera stars and 250 radio artists. The merger becomes effective today.

The new organization is as yet unnamed, and its officers have not been announced. The artists involved become available immediately for broadcasting purposes over the networks of WEAF and WJZ exclusively, according to the announcement.

Is Second Recent Merger.

The new alignment is the second announced in as many months. Seven large concert bureaus merged with the Columbia Broadcasting System several weeks ago, forming the Columbia Concerts Corporation. This first merger, announced on Dec. 10, became effective the first of the year. The two huge booking bureaus, it was pointed out, now control practically all musical talent in this country and abroad for concert, broadcasting and recording purposes.

The two mergers bring to a head the movement for consolidation that has taken hold of the musical business recently. Mergers also have taken place or are contemplated among the music publishing houses, leaving practically no phase of the field untouched by the current trend.

It is estimated by persons close to the radio enterprises that two national broadcasting contracts would pay for the expense of a merged concert bureau for one year and that six or eight such contracts would mean a profit for the parent concern running high in six figures.

Among the musicians and entertainers affiliated with the new service, including those who have been added by new contracts, are:

Ignace Jan Paderewski, Florence Austral, John Charles Thomas, Efrem Zimbalist, Walter Damrosch, Dusolina Giannini, Anna Case, Mischa Levitzki, Victor Chenkin, Reinald Werrenrath, Josef Lhévinne, Schumann-Heink, Beniamino Gigli, Floyd Gibbons, Rudy Vallee, Amos 'n' Andy, Grantland Rice, Phil Cook and the Revelers.

The Victor artists include John McCormack, Chaliapin, Rachmaninoff, Sirr Harry Lauder, Gigli, Bori, Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Galli Curci, Lawrence Tibbett, Mischa Elman, Walter Damrosch, Maurice Chevalier and the Metropolitan Opera Company.

"The NBC Artists Service," said Mr. Engles, "may be said to be coordinating the entire amusement field. Its diffused booking activities are enormously widening the opportunities of artists of every variety. Concert and operatic stars particularly are benefiting by this new development in the managerial field."

Miss Dema Harshbarger, founder of the Civic Concert Service, will remain as its president. The service has as its purpose the creating of new concert audiences in cities which otherwise have few or no musical events. New audiences totaling 250,000 have been added to the country's regular concertgoers through the activities of the organization cooperating with State and City Government officials, it has been announced.

Mr. Engles said he would relinquish his duties as head of the program division of the National Broadcasting Company to devote his time to the new bureau.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JAN 31 1931

Boston Orchestra In Final Concert February 3.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, which was recently heard here in a four-day festival of Beethoven music, will make its final concert appearance of the current season at Constitution Hall next Tuesday afternoon, February 3, at 4:30 o'clock as the third attraction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's philharmonic series of afternoon concerts at that auditorium.

For his final appearance in the Capital this season Dr. Koussevitsky has chosen a splendid program that will offer Tschaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony in F Minor, Opus 36," as well as Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Opus 47"; the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JAN 29 1931

YOUNG AMERICAN COMPOSER

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, has returned to this country after a successful year in Berlin, to accept an invitation as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra for two concerts.

In February the League Composers will play his composition for viola and clarinet at one of their concerts. In March Serge Koussevitzky has invited Berezowsky to conduct his own symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Not yet thirty, Mr. Berezowsky has had a busy and colorful career. He was born in Russia, but most of his musical education has been obtained in this country, and he is an American citizen. He held a double Fellowship at the Juilliard Graduate School for four years, studying composition with Rubin Goldmark and violin with Paul Kochanski. While studying he supported himself as a member of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in New York City, and the year before his departure for Europe he was made concertmaster of the second violin section.

Last April, while in Germany, Mr. Berezowsky was invited by Fritz Busch to conduct the Dresden Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. At this concert Carl Flesch was soloist and played Berezowsky's Violin Concerto, with the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Concert Will Feature Russian Composer

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Here Monday

Igor Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra will be a feature of the concert to be given in the Mosque auditorium by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday evening at 8:30 o'clock. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has introduced this score to America this season, playing it in Boston, New York and other cities. It is one of the Russian composer's latest works, having been first performed in Paris last year.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, brilliant young Spanish-American pianist, will appear as soloist in the "Capriccio." Koussevitzky will open the program with Mozart's symphony in G minor.

The last part of the program will consist of Tchaikovsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4. This symphony of Koussevitzky's fellow Russian composer has been considered as one of this conductor's most moving and striking interpretations during his seven years in America.

The concert will be under the auspices of the Richmond Civic Music Association.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 31 1931

* * *

Masquerades," the well known co position by Carl Mekinley, formerly this city, was on the program last we at a concert of the Boston Symph orchestra given in that city under direction of Serge Koussevitzky.
work was enthusiastically receiv
"Masquerades" has been played by Philadelphia and Chicago orchest the latter presenting it under the rection of the composer himself.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall for its third pair of concerts of the season Friday instead of the usual Thursday evening, and Saturday afternoon. At the first concert the program will consist of Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra; the Seventh and latest symphony of Sibelius, and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." At the matinee concert the Stravinsky Capriccio for piano and orchestra played on the last visit will be repeated, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist, and two preludes of Bach and the Strauss work will complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

JAN 29 1931

Berezowsky to Conduct in Cincinnati

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, has returned to this country after a successful year in Berlin, to accept an invitation as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra in Cincinnati, Ohio, for two concerts. In February the League of Composers will play his composition for viola and clarinet at one of their concerts. In March he will conduct his own symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on invitation of Koussevitzky. Born in Russia, he came to this country as a lad and is a naturalized citizen. He held a double fellowship at the Juilliard Graduate School of Music for four years, studying composition with Rubin Goldmark and the violin with Paul Kochanski.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JAN 6 1931

The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit of the season to Brooklyn to give a concert in the Academy of Music next Thursday evening instead of the usual Friday evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with Sir Edward Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro" for String Orchestra, Op. 47. He will introduce to Brooklyn Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra which, first performed in Paris last year has had its first American performance under his direction in Boston, New York and other cities. The soloist in this score will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, the brilliant young Spanish-American pianist.

The latter part of the programme will be occupied by Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." This set of pianoforte pieces has been arranged for a large orchestra by Maurice Ravel, who made the arrangement especially for Koussevitzky and it was by him that the suite was first played in Europe and America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Boston Symphony Body to Appear Here Monday

Orchestra Will Present Its Fourth Concert in City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, comprising 110 musicians under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, and a managing staff, will leave Boston for Richmond by special train tomorrow night, arriving here early Monday for the concert to be given that night at the Mosque under the auspices of the Richmond Civic Music Association. The event, it was stated, is expected to prove the most brilliant artistic and social occasion of Richmond's season.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct in Richmond his fourth concert since returning to the orchestra from a vacation. The celebrated orchestra this season is observing its fiftieth anniversary and a particularly interesting program, including Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, will be presented here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

JAN 31 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO CLIMAX SEASON

Interesting Program in Richmond Monday Night Announced by Leader.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

On Monday night the great climax of the musical season will occur with the presentation of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Mosque. An interesting program has been announced by Mr. Koussevitsky, which will include the Mozart G minor symphony, Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for orchestra, with piano solo, and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4, in F minor.

The Mozart Symphony is one of three which were his last essays in this form of music. Nothing in his career is more remarkable than the production of these three masterpieces, so utterly different from one another in spirit, within the space of three months, not to speak of their coming at a time when he was deeply harrassed by debt and the constant illness of his wife. This one in G minor is the final expression in "absolute" music of Mozart's characteristic melancholy, which is entirely free from morbidity or the more introspective struggle with fate which is the leading motive of so much of the nineteenth century music.

No Self-Dramatization.

He does not indulge in self-dramatization; all is reflective, contemplative and lyrical, even when the mood is one of restlessness. Schumann has spoken of its "swaying Grecian grace," while Wagner says: "Compared with Haydn's, Mozart's symphonies are of significance almost solely through the extraordinary feeling, singing nature of their instrumental themes . . . and while he brought to Italian opera the richer development of the German mode of instrumental composition, he imparted in turn to the orchestral melody the full euphony of the Italian mode of song."

The qualities of Mozart's music, the absolute sense of proportion and gratefully disciplined expression are being more than ever sought by those who are feeling the unrest of our time. It has, as Warde Fowler says: "First, a joyousness, a sense of fragrance of life; never boisterous, but always buoyant and fresh.

Secondly, a gentle tenderness, never sentimental, but always natural and inevitable,—a sense of 'the tears that are in things'—that feeling he so poignantly expresses in a letter to Da Ponte, when he has come nearly to the close of his brief span of life—"I have come to an end before having had the enjoyment of my talent." It was scored originally for flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns and strings. He later added two clarinet parts and new scoring for the the oboes.

The score to be used Monday night was for years in the possession of Brahms, who would not allow it to go out of his hands, but it has now been published. The four movements are denoted "Allegro Molto," "Andante, Menuetto" and "Allegro Assai."

The Stravinsky "Capriccio" will plunge us at once into modernism of a radical sort, by this Russian composer, who, at an early age, left his country, and has lived in Paris and at various places around Lake Geneva. The dominating principle of his art is his belief that music should make a purely physical appeal and should be free from any literary or pictorial associations. His orchestral scores are full of color and brilliance, with great originality in the employment of the instruments. This follows Mr. Koussevitsky's custom of giving us one modern composition—even ultra-modern—with each program he plays here. This is an excellent idea.

Whether we like them or not, we must keep abreast of the musical tides, and in this case he has placed it between two readily understandable symphonies, rather than placing it chronologically at the last, showing what a keen psychologist he is, allowing us ten minutes to get our breath after the physical shock of the "Capriccio," then sending us home with the brilliant romanticism of Tschaikowsky in our ears.

It is delightful that we are to have Tschaikowsky's Fourth Sympthony, since it is the one of all others that he loved best and considered his best work. It is dedicated to Nadejda von Meck, his great benefactress, whom he never saw but whose letters form so large a part of his fascinating biography.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

JAN 31 1931

Among th

KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Players Return Tuesday

Koussevitzky to Lead Orchestra in Afternoon Concert

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Washington for a concert Tuesday afternoon in Constitution Hall. The concert will begin promptly at 4:30. Late comers will be admitted at the close of each number.

It is just two months since Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought his men here for the Beethoven Festival and he now returns with a varied program, for his last concert here this year.

It is the jubilee year and after its present tour, the famed orchestra will return to Boston and give another festival—a Bach one—in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and supported it in its early days.

Modern Scores

A number of modern scores have been written especially for the orchestra in honor of this anniversary, by well known European composers, such as Ravel, Stravinsky, Hindemith, Sibelius, Dukas, Prokofieff, Respighi and Honegger. These compositions are being played this spring also.

It is a great year for Dr. Koussevitzky who has led the orchestra since 1924, and he promises to go down in the orchestra's history along with such great conductors as Karl Muck, Arthur Nikisch, Sir George Henschel and Pierre Monteux.

Great Symphony

The program for next Tuesday is very varied and very interesting, in great contrast to the Beethoven programs of last December. It ranges from Wagner to Ravel, and the piece de resistance is Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, not often played here. The order of the program follows:

Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra ..... Elgar
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
"La Valse" (choreographic poem) .... Ravel
Intermission
Symphony No. 4 in F minor ... Tchaikowsky

HEARING DEVICES

Church Auxiliary To Conduct Drive

March is Women's Auxiliary month at St. James Methodist church, during this period special efforts will be made to increase the membership and build up the weekness of this organization. Services Sunday, Mrs.

Unfortunately, the Russian composer's ideal relationship with his dear friend and patron was destined to end in trouble and distress. Madame von Meck wrote in December, 1890, that she faced bankruptcy, and would have to discontinue the allowance. The letter caused a cruel misunderstanding. "Do you really think me incapable of remembering you, now that I no longer receive your money?" Tchaikovsky answered. For a while he was too wounded to make any further advance. When he did, there was no response. As fate had it, this long friendship was terminated only three years before the composer's death. And she learned the news on her own deathbed.

THOSE THAT GO TO SYMPHONY

by FLORENCE COWLES

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary this year, and at almost every concert a new composition is played, dedicated by the composer to the orchestra. The artists so honoring the orchestra are of all nations.

Every one knows of the excellence of the orchestra, of its conception, growth and now its maturity, but who ever stops to think about the people who have listened to the concerts for fifty consecutive years?

At the reception in the early autumn, given for Sir George Henschel, the first conductor, it was found that there were only four members of the original orchestra able to attend but there were quantities of patrons!

One has only to go to a Friday afternoon concert to see the ladies and gentlemen in their seventies, eighties and nineties who form the background of these concerts.

So instilled in them is the idea of attending the concerts and such pride do they take in the fact that they are "original subscribers," that they literally go until they die!

They continue to attend after they are too deaf to hear, or too blind to see. They go when they are lame and sick and sorrowful. They go aided by attendants.

It is not an unusual thing to see a white-haired lady come into the hall on the arm of her maid. The maid helps her remove her wrap and her hat, slips a little footstool under her feet, finds her her place in the program and then, patting her affectionately, says, "Well, I guess you will be all right now," and departs to the outer corridor to wait. After the concert the maid returns to her mistress, dresses her, picks up her footstool, and takes her out to her waiting limousine.

Even many of the attendants date from the old Boston Museum days when symphony concerts were held in that edifice, torn down many many years ago.

The matron of the ladies' reception room is one of these long-time attendants. I went to the first Friday afternoon concert of the season. There in the reception room an old old lady was greeting the attendant, who knows all the old patrons by name.

"Has Mrs. Brown been in yet this afternoon?" the white-haired black-bonneted lady asked.

"No, Mrs. Jones, or at least I haven't seen her," replied the attendant as she shook the proffered hand.

"Well, she didn't know whether she could come or not. She isn't feeling very well, but she thought she might just come in and see every one, although she didn't expect to attend the concert. It's nice to see old friends again," and the old lady turned to talk to another "Symphony friend."

Because lifelong friendships are formed at Symphony concerts.

When the concerts first started, fifty years ago, there was one a week. Then, such a demand was created, that it was decided to admit the public to the Friday afternoon rehearsals, and the hall was thrown open at twenty-five cents a seat.

WIDOW OF SYMPHONY FOUNDER
Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, though 92 years old, is reputed to attend every afternoon Symphony Concert. She is here shown with her great granddaughter, Cecile Agassiz Higginson.
BACHRACH PHOTO

The Friday afternoon rehearsals, however, soon proved even more popular than the Saturday evening concerts; so the seats, with the exception of those in the second balcony which remained at twenty-five cents, were sold at auction.

But to attend the Friday afternoon concerts had become "the thing," and soon the auction proved to be a farce. People wanted their same seats each year and, in order to get them, commissioned ticket brokers to go and bid them in, regardless of what they cost.

When the powers-that-be of the concerts saw the trend that the auction was taking, they decided to rate all the seats. Then season-ticket holders were given the chance of taking up the tickets at the beginning of the season at a stated sum. If they didn't want them, the public had a chance—or, at least, that was the theory. But it is an almost unheard-of thing for Friday afternoon season tickets to go on sale.

Once a family gets hold of seats they hang on to them and even bequeath them to their nearest and dearest in their wills! That's what Boston thinks of its Symphonies.

After the war, there was such a demand for Friday season tickets that the first two rows of the second balcony were taken out of the twenty-five-cent class and were sold as season tickets, leaving 251 seats to be rushed for, but at fifty cents instead of twenty-five cents.

And no story of the Symphony is complete without the story of these rush-seat patrons.

Recently I was talking with a charming woman who makes her home in Milton. She and her husband make an annual trip to Europe. They have a delightful summer home, automobiles, all the things that go for comfort and ease, with the exception of Friday afternoon Symphony seats.

"I wouldn't think of going any way but on a rush seat," and after looking at her searchingly I knew she meant it. "I have done it for sixteen years. No one can appreciate a concert without that prelude.

"I have made some very dear friends on the front steps of Symphony Hall, and there is one whom I now meet regularly. If there is no soloist we get to Symphony Hall at one o'clock; if there is a soloist, or if we decide that the program is going to be especially interesting to the public, we go at twelve o'clock.

WAITING TO GET FIFTY-CENT "RUSH" TICKETS
Part of the crowd which stands in line for two hours every Friday afternoon on the steps of Symphony Hall. Only 251 people are admitted.

"We take books and sit on the steps and read. (The steps, by the way, face Huntington avenue, with its scorching sun when it is hot and its icy winds when it is cold.)

"The doors open at half past one. Every one has his money ready and, once by the gate man, we all run. When we reach the second balcony, we choose our seats. I invariably get the same seat.

"Each person leaves something in the chair he has chosen, a book, coat, or even a pocketbook, if he feels inclined. No one ever touches the things; that is the etiquette of the second balcony.

"Then we go down to the second floor and have lunch."

In other words, these people, who have sat on the steps or who have stood for an hour or an hour and a half, run up two long flights of stairs and then run down one, and get in line preparatory to going by the counter of food. There they pick out sandwiches, cake, choose coffee or tea or milk, and then go over to a little table and eat the spoils. And it is a good half hour before the line passes the food counter.

In the rush-seat crowd extremes meet. Many old ladies go; then there are women like my friend, who go because they love the informality of it all. There are cripples, men and women on crutches, and there are frail people to whom you would like to give an orchestra seat.

There are the music students; the boys and girls, serious-eyed and blasé, who drink black coffee and smoke cigarettes and wish they were in Paris.

There are groups of foreigners who take their music seriously and who, while they eat their sandwiches, study the scores and discuss the pros and cons of the program.

The last person finishes his luncheon just about the time the first gong rings. The concert will begin in five minutes.

Downstairs the great auditorium is filled. The ushers stand by the door to aid those who are the recipients of season tickets "just for the afternoon."

The regular people find their own way about. Every one knows every one else. If a person is absent, it causes comment by every one within two or three rows, and you realize that an explanation will be demanded by half a dozen as soon as they get home and find a telephone handy.

Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson is in her seat on the center of the middle aisle. Mrs. Higginson is ninety-two years old and is the widow of the founder of the orchestra. Her snow-white hair is covered by a black lace cap. Sometimes her grandson, Henry Lee Higginson 2nd, accompanies her, sometimes a friend.

One of the prettiest tributes seen within those famous red-and-gold walls took place at the opening of the fiftieth season last October. At the conclusion of the concert, Sir George Henschel was the recipient of floral tribute, and to Mrs. Higginson, in her seat on the center aisle, an usher brought a gorgeous basket of deep red roses. The audience stood and applauded.

The concert begins. The audience is very well behaved, beautifully trained. Probably not fifty people are late. They come in when the doors are hastily opened for a minute or two after the first number.

Another number, and then comes the long intermission.

All the young people (every one under sixty) flock out into the corridors.

Tea is served upstairs, but not many know about it. Cigarettes are smoked. The old people complain vigorously to the management. The whiff of tobacco which reaches them they find distracting. It wasn't done in their day. The management doesn't encourage the tea idea as, owing to close cooperation with the police, the concerts are out before half past four o'clock.

As it is, Symphony Hall, situated at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues, one of the busiest traffic corners in the United States, works havoc with the best-laid plans of experts when it lets out its limousine-owning patrons.

The police say it just couldn't be untangled if the hall should disgorge its tremendous audience at five o'clock.

So the management of the Symphony concerts and the police department work together, and afternoon tea is frowned upon. But it is served to the knowing few, anyway.

The Breeze is 15 cents a copy at news stands. Six months' subscription $1.50 (26 issues); three months' $1.00 (13 issues); year-round subscription $3.00 (52 issues).

The program for the Tuesday Symphony concert Feb 10 will, for the first time in the Tuesday series, offer a soloist. Myra Hess is announced to give her admirable interpretation of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for piano. The other numbers are by Beethoven, the "Eroica" Symphony, and the "Egmont" overture. One regrets the substitution of the last-named overture for the very superior "Coriolanus" overture, now twice announced and twice withdrawn this season by Dr Koussevitzky.

For the next pair of Symphony concerts in the regular series Dr Koussevitzky proposes a program including Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and his "Pagan Poem" in honor of the recent 70th birthday of the composer, long a distinguished figure in Boston. Honegger's new symphony, written for the orchestra's anniversary, and a suite for piano and strings by an unknown young Italian, Pilati, are the other numbers now announced, subject, of course, to change.

Koussevitzky, Two Audiences, Then Heifetz

TRANS. — FEB. 2

Two Symphonies and Hearers Overtaxed — The Violinist Outdoing Himself

LITTLE applause followed Sibelius's Seventh Symphony when it was played at the Symphony Concerts last Friday afternoon. A persistent few rather than an ardent many, recalled the conductor. At the end of Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," superlatively delivered, the plaudits were as scanty. As usual, everyone was making speed homeward—or elsewhere. The old hands nodded knowing heads: "They're sure to do better on Saturday." Yet when that evening came, the applause for Sibelius was hardly heartier or more general; while again it was a persistent minority that brought back the conductor and set the orchestra on its feet. Worse still, this "Saturday audience," usually in no haste, departed after little enough clapping for the "Domestica."

Possibly, the underlying cause of these cool responses is not far to seek; nor has it aught to do with the merits of pieces or performance. Sibelius's Symphony is as yet little known at Symphony Hall. It runs through twenty-five minutes without pause. All the way it asks close, concentrated listening. Strauss's "Domestica" is more familiar. Since Dr. Muck's time, it has been played intermittently. Twice before, Dr. Koussevitzky had set it on a program. But it also proceeds without pause, and through a full forty minutes. Now the habit of attention, in any of the contacts of life, is not highly developed at the present hour. There is a deal of gabble about "concentration," but much too little in habitual practice. Ask the average listener, even in a picked audience, like that at Symphony Hall on Saturday evening, to apply himself through twenty-five minutes to a Symphony by Sibelius or through forty to a tone-poem by Strauss, and he either "relaxes" along the way or comes out of either experience too taxed to burst into plaudits. Probably in retrospect, he thought better of Sibelius and Strauss, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, than he signified by any clapping in the concert-room. The conductor, and a few listeners with him, are accustomed to attend closely to music. Most others are unaccustomed to attend long and closely to anything.

Those who could and did listen—without losing the place—had their reward from both pieces. Again there was reason to thrill to the incisive strokes and the deep texture of Sibelius's Symphony; at the sudden whirr of his strings, the impact of his drum-beats, the pungent voices of his wood-winds; at those same strings when they flailed the air, at the brass when it upswelled with proclamation. Every composer writes for his instruments according to his abilities and imagination. It is Sibelius's part in this Seventh Symphony to write for them with exceeding intensity, to release them with graphic power. Indeed the whole music suggests an extraordinary concentration of emotion and creation within narrow limits. . . . The tone-poem of Strauss, on the other hand, is of ample dimensions; but the wide spread of the canvas and the multitude of musical ideas tapestried upon it, no less tax and tire hearers. All the households in half the world are stamping, singing, storming through the final fugue of the "Domestica." But by that time a goodly part of the audience is too weary to feel, care or respond. As whoever sets up a sign knows well, we are an attentionless folk.

GREEK-AMERICANS RAP KOUSSEVITZKY

Allege Importation of Foreign Musicians

GLOBE — FEB 2

Progressive Association Criticises Symphony Orchestra Conductor

A resolution criticising Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for importing, it is alleged, foreign musicians to play in the orchestra, was adopted yesterday at a convention of the New England delegates of the Greek-American Progressive Association, held at the Hotel Minerva on Huntington av.

The passage of the resolution, it was said, was occasioned particularly by the separation from the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Demetrios Demetriades, an American citizen of Greek birth, a bass viol player. According to Capt George Demeter, grand governor of the district of New England of the association, Demetriades has been a member of the symphony orchestra for the last 10 consecutive seasons.

Text of Resolution

The resolution follows:

"Whereas, The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, has been importing aliens to replace American citizens in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and, whereas, in the past several months alien musicians have been imported from Belgium, Austria, Czechoslovakia and other foreign countries, and, whereas, this importation of foreign labor throws American citizens out of work, thus adding to the numbers of the city's unemployed; and, whereas, one of those thus thrown out of work by such importation is a citizen of the United States of Greek descent who played in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 10 consecutive years;

"Resolved, That this convention of the New England delegates of the order of G. A. P. A. expresses its disapproval of such practice by the esteemed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and regards the importation of alien musicians as unjust, unfair and unwarranted, particularly when American citizens are ousted from positions;

"Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Dr Serge Koussevitzky, to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to the Grand Lodge of the G. A. P. A."

Venizelos Praised

About 300 men and women were present at the convention, which passed a resolution commending Premier Venizelos of Greece for his success in forming a peace pact with Turkey. Venizelos was declared to be the "greatest diplomat since the time of Pericles."

The convention voted to establish a fund of $100,000 for the creation of a Greek chair for instruction in the modern Greek language. The organization is a national Greek-American fraternal order of men and women, whose purpose "is to instil loyalty and allegiance to the United States and preserve the Greek language."

Capt Demeter presided at the convention.

'Far Afield,' Judge Cabot Says

Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was not in Boston yesterday to answer the resolution of criticism adopted by the G. A. P. A., but Judge Frederick P. Cabot, head of the board of directors of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, said he thought the critics were "going rather far afield."

"No one has been dismissed from the orchestra," he said, "although it is a fact that two or three contracts were not renewed last Fall. There are usually one or two changes in the personnel of the organization each year, but rarely more. There is no mention of nationalities of musicians to be engaged in the rules of the organization, and everything is now being done just as it always has been since the orchestra was established, 50 years ago.

"The trustees hold the musical director responsible for the quality of the artists, and they accept his musical judgments, although technically the trustees do employ the musicians.

"Last Autumn a Greek player of the double bass was not given a new contract, I do remember. But that was not a criticism of him in any sense nor an implication that he is not an excellent musician. It is simply a question whether his particular talents will fit into the musical organization on a sufficient basis. And, since the double bass is Dr Koussevitzky's own instrument, the trustees had no hesitation in accepting his judgment about it."

Charges Hit Director of Symphony Orchestra

GRECIAN-AMERICAN CONFERENCE

Members of the Greek-American Progressive Association of New England, at a conference yesterday in Hotel Minerva. Standing, left to right, Miss Mary Demeter of Brookline, Mrs. K. Leimopoulos of Haverhill, Miss Mary Vergados of Lowell. Seated, Mrs. Olga D. Callimachos of New York, Captain George Demeter of Boston, and Miss Betty Demeter of Brookline.

Charges that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been discharging musicians in the orchestra who are American citizens and has been replacing them with imported foreign musicians were contained in a resolution adopted yesterday by more than 300 delegates to a convention of the New England district of the Greek-American Progressive Association. The resolution also provided that copies be sent to Dr. Koussevitzky and to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Captain George Demeter, grand governor of the New England district of the Greek-American order, cited a specific instance of an American citizen of Greek descent, who, he said, had played in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 10 consecutive years, was discharged a few months ago and is now numbered among Boston's unemployed.

This former member of the famous orchestra, Captain Demeter charged, has a wife and family to support, is a citizen of this country, and despite the fact that he played in the orchestra 10 years, was discharged and a musician was imported from a foreign country to take his place.

The resolution charges that in the past several months aliens have been imported from Belgium, Austria, Czechoslovakia and other foreign countries, thus throwing American musicians out of work.

"These are brought into this country giving their profession as concert masters," Captain Demeter stated, declaring that he had investigated the matter and had found that under this guise their original seven months' authorized stay in this country became later extended. He averred that whether or not they are concert masters, they have in several cases been employed by Dr. Koussevitzky as musicians and so are keeping Americans out of work.

The convention lasted all day yesterday at the Hotel Minerva on Huntington avenue. More than 185 men, presidents of New England lodges of the order, and over 100 women, presidents of the auxiliary lodges, attended. Captain George Demeter, a well known Boston attorney and officer in the Massachusetts National Guard, presided as grand governor for New England.

Plans were completed at the convention yesterday to endow some large Eastern university with $100,000 for a course of instruction in modern Greek. Where the chair will be established is not known yet but it was said that it will be Harvard, Yale, Princeton or Columbia.

RLES ORGAN RD ONCE MORE

nstrument Bought ts Music Shrine

FORMER BOSTON MUSIC HALL ORGAN AS IT APPEARS IN SERLO HALL

METHUEN, Feb 4—The famous old Boston Music Hall organ, which was once part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but which was discarded because it was pitched too high to blend with the other orchestral instruments, is destined again to take its place as one of the greatest organs in the world.

This great instrument, built in 1854 and purchased with the contributions of Boston music lovers, and which is now in Methuen, as been purchased by Ernest M. Skinner of West Newton, vice president of the Skinner Organ Company. Mr Skinner has also purchased Serlo Hall, which houses it, the Searles Organ factory and a nearby cottage house, all located here.

The deed transferring the property from Mrs Lillian W. Andrew of this town to Mr Skinner was recorded at the Lawrence Registry of Deeds office today. No price was made public, but it is understood that the purchase price was in excess of $200,000.

Once Owned by Searles

The property was formerly that of the late Edward F. Searles, multi-millionaire, and later of the late Arthur T. Walker, his heir. During Mr Searles' life many noted organists played on it, but in recent years it has not been used much.

It has always been maintained in first-class condition, though, and, after he has made some additions and improvements, Mr Skinner hopes to made it "a shrine for the lover of organ music, a meeting place for the American Guild of Organists, and for the National Association of Organists, and perhaps other musical organizations."

The late Mr Searles purchased the organ at an auction sale and moved it to Methuen, in pieces, of course, before he had any place to house it.

Meanwhile, he was building Serlo Hall, a hall that was destined to have almost perfect acoustic properties, as a permanent home for it. It required the best part of five years for the hall to be built and the organ to be rebuilt in it.

Its black walnut case is a wonderful example of woodcarving and the instrument has 6000 pipes, only nine of which are mute. Organists from all parts of America and Europe have played on it and are said to have been most enthusiastic about it.

Frank M. Andrew of Lawrence and Methuen, who announced the sale, gave out the statement prepared by Mr Skinner. The statement, in part, follows:

"The combination of the organ, the hall and its marvelous acoustical conditions represent, in my opinion, the finest expression of an ideal, with respect to the organ and organ music, to be found anywhere in the world. Serlo Hall with its perfect acoustics and the unique and amazing organ case makes a spectacle that is nothing short of magnificent—one in which every element making for perfection is present in its best sense.

"I entered Serlo Hall for the first time less than two years ago. It made an unforgetable impression on me. There were rumors that the organ was to be sold or destroyed. This seemed to me nothing short of vandalism, almost sacrilege.

Plans to Arrange Concerts

"It was only through a miracle of unforeseen circumstances that I became the owner of it. Now that it is mine I want to make some additions to the organ to bring it up to date, and then make it a shrine for the lovers of organ music, a meeting place, if possible, for the American Guild of Organists, for the National Association of Organists, and perhaps other musical organizations. This will be carrying out Mr Searles' original idea and at the same time save this great monument from destruction.

"I also have in mind some concerts in which music for organ and piano may be given. The opportunity for doing something that is based upon the ideal and not upon financial considerations seems to find a fitting setting in Serlo Hall."

The program for the Tuesday Symphony concert Feb 10 will, for the first time in the Tuesday series, offer a soloist. Myra Hess is announced to give her admirable interpretation of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto for piano. The other numbers are by Beethoven, the "Eroica" Symphony, and the "Egmont" overture. One regrets the substitution of the last-named overture for the very superior "Coriolanus" overture, now twice announced and twice withdrawn this season by Dr Koussevitzky.

For the next pair of Symphony concerts in the regular series Dr Koussevitzky proposes a program including Charles Martin Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and his "Pagan Poem" in honor of the recent 70th birthday of the composer, long a distinguished figure in Boston. Honegger's new symphony, written for the orchestra's anniversary, and a suite for piano and strings by an unknown young Italian, Pilati, are the other numbers now announced, subject, of course, to change.

Koussevitzky, Two Audiences, Then Heifetz

TRANS. — FEB. 2

Two Symphonies and Hearers Overtaxed — The Violinist Outdoing Himself

LITTLE applause followed Sibelius's Seventh Symphony when it was played at the Symphony Concerts last Friday afternoon. A persistent few rather than an ardent many, recalled the conductor. At the end of Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," superlatively delivered, the plaudits were as scanty. As usual, everyone was making speed homeward—or elsewhere. The old hands nodded knowing heads: "They're sure to do better on Saturday." Yet when that evening came, the applause for Sibelius was hardly heartier or more general; while again it was a persistent minority that brought back the conductor and set the orchestra on its feet. Worse still, this "Saturday audience," usually in no haste, departed after little enough clapping for the "Domestica."

Possibly, the underlying cause of these cool responses is not far to seek; nor has it aught to do with the merits of pieces or performance. Sibelius's Symphony is as yet little known at Symphony Hall. It runs through twenty-five minutes without pause. All the way it asks close, concentrated listening. Strauss's "Domestica" is more familiar. Since Dr. Muck's time, it has been played intermittently. Twice before, Dr. Koussevitzky had set it on a program. But it also proceeds without pause, and through a full forty minutes. Now the habit of attention, in any of the contacts of life, is not highly developed at the present hour. There is a deal of gabble about "concentration," but much too little in habitual practice. Ask the average listener, even in a picked audience, like that at Symphony Hall on Saturday evening, to apply himself through twenty-five minutes to a Symphony by Sibelius or through forty to a tone-poem by Strauss, and he either "relaxes" along the way or comes out of either experience too taxed to burst into plaudits. Probably in retrospect, he thought better of Sibelius and Strauss, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, than he signified by any clapping in the concert-room. The conductor, and a few listeners with him, are accustomed to attend closely to music. Most others are unaccustomed to attend long and closely to anything.

Those who could and did listen—without losing the place—had their reward from both pieces. Again there was reason to thrill to the incisive strokes and the deep texture of Sibelius's Symphony; at the sudden whirr of his strings, the impact of his drum-beats, the pungent voices of his wood-winds; at those same strings when they flailed the air, at the brass when it upswelled with proclamation. Every composer writes for his instruments according to his abilities and imagination. It is Sibelius's part in this Seventh Symphony to write for them with exceeding intensity, to release them with graphic power. Indeed the whole music suggests an extraordinary concentration of emotion and creation within narrow limits. . . . The tone-poem of Strauss, on the other hand, is of ample dimensions; but the wide spread of the canvas and the multitude of musical ideas tapestried upon it, no less tax and tire hearers. All the households in half the world are stamping, singing, storming through the final fugue of the "Domestica." But by that time a goodly part of the audience is too weary to feel, care or respond. As whoever sets up a sign knows well, we are an attentionless folk.

GREEK-AMERICANS RAP KOUSSEVITZKY

Allege Importation of Foreign Musicians

GLOBE — FEB 2

Progressive Association Criticises Symphony Orchestra Conductor

A resolution criticising Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for importing, it is alleged, foreign musicians to play in the orchestra, was adopted yesterday at a convention of the New England delegates of the Greek-American Progressive Association, held at the Hotel Minerva on Huntington av.

The passage of the resolution, it was said, was occasioned particularly by the separation from the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Demetrios Demetriades, an American citizen of Greek birth, a bass viol player. According to Capt George Demeter, grand governor of the district of New England of the association, Demetriades has been a member of the symphony orchestra for the last 10 consecutive seasons.

Text of Resolution

The resolution follows:

"Whereas, The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, has been importing aliens to replace American citizens in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and, whereas, in the past several months alien musicians have been imported from Belgium, Austria, Czechoslovakia and other foreign countries, and, whereas, this importation of foreign labor throws American citizens out of work, thus adding to the numbers of the city's unemployed; and, whereas, one of those thus thrown out of work by such importation is a citizen of the United States of Greek descent who played in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 10 consecutive years;

"Resolved, That this convention of the New England delegates of the order of G. A. P. A. expresses its disapproval of such practice by the esteemed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and regards the importation of alien musicians as unjust, unfair and unwarranted, particularly when American citizens are ousted from positions;

"Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Dr Serge Koussevitzky, to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to the Grand Lodge of the G. A. P. A."

Venizelos Praised

About 300 men and women were present at the convention, which passed a resolution commending Premier Venizelos of Greece for his success in forming a peace pact with Turkey. Venizelos was declared to be the "greatest diplomat since the time of Pericles."

The convention voted to establish a fund of $100,000 for the creation of a Greek chair for instruction in the modern Greek language. The organization is a national Greek-American fraternal order of men and women, whose purpose "is to instil loyalty and allegiance to the United States and preserve the Greek language."

Capt Demeter presided at the convention.

'Far Afield,' Judge Cabot Says

Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was not in Boston yesterday to answer the resolution of criticism adopted by the G. A. P. A., but Judge Frederick P. Cabot, head of the board of directors of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, said he thought the critics were "going rather far afield."

"No one has been dismissed from the orchestra," he said, "although it is a fact that two or three contracts were not renewed last Fall. There are usually one or two changes in the personnel of the organization each year, but rarely more. There is no mention of nationalities of musicians to be engaged in the rules of the organization, and everything is now being done just as it always has been since the orchestra was established, 50 years ago.

"The trustees hold the musical director responsible for the quality of the artists, and they accept his musical judgments, although technically the trustees do employ the musicians.

"Last Autumn a Greek player of the double bass was not given a new contract, I do remember. But that was not a criticism of him in any sense nor an implication that he is not an excellent musician. It is simply a question whether his particular talents will fit into the musical organization on a sufficient basis. And, since the double bass is Dr Koussevitzky's own instrument, the trustees had no hesitation in accepting his judgment about it."

Charges that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been discharging musicians in the orchestra who are American citizens and has been replacing them with imported foreign musicians were contained in a resolution adopted yesterday by more than 300 delegates to a convention of the New England district of the Greek-American Progressive Association. The resolution also provided that copies be sent to Dr. Koussevitzky and to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Captain George Demeter, grand governor of the New England district of the Greek-American order, cited a specific instance of an American citizen of Greek descent, who, he said, had played in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 10 consecutive years, was discharged a few months ago and is now numbered among Boston's unemployed.

This former member of the famous orchestra, Captain Demeter charged, has a wife and family to support, is a citizen of this country, and despite the fact that he played in the orchestra 10 years, was discharged and a musician was imported from a foreign country to take his place.

The resolution charges that in the past several months aliens have been imported from Belgium, Austria, Czechoslovakia and other foreign countries, thus throwing American musicians out of work.

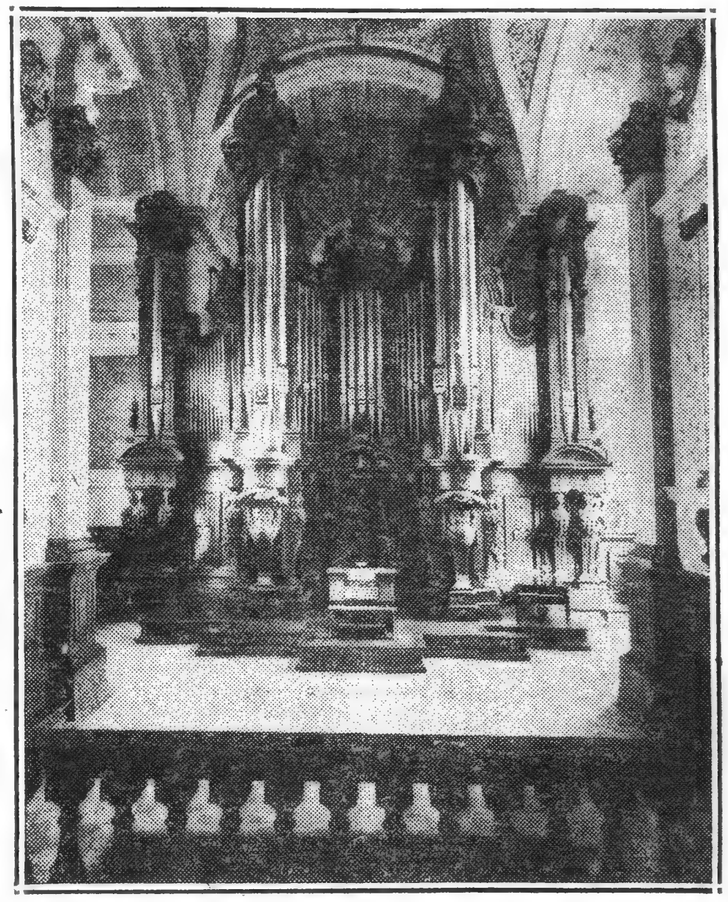
"These are brought into this country giving their profession as concert masters," Captain Demeter stated, declaring that he had investigated the matter and had found that under this guise their original seven months' authorized stay in this country became later extended. He averred that whether or not they are concert masters, they have in several cases been employed by Dr. Koussevitzky as musicians and so are keeping Americans out of work.

The convention lasted all day yesterday at the Hotel Minerva on Huntington avenue. More than 185 men, presidents of New England lodges of the order, and over 100 women, presidents of the auxiliary lodges, attended. Captain George Demeter, a well known Boston attorney and officer in the Massachusetts National Guard, presided as grand governor for New England.

Plans were completed at the convention yesterday to endow some large Eastern university with $100,000 for a course of instruction in modern Greek. Where the chair will be established is not known yet but it was said that it will be Harvard, Yale, Princeton or Columbia.

FAMOUS SEARLES ORGAN TO BE HEARD ONCE MORE

Serlo Hall and Instrument Bought By Skinner as Music Shrine



FORMER BOSTON MUSIC HALL ORGAN AS IT APPEARS IN SERLO HALL

METHUEN, Feb 4—The famous old Boston Music Hall organ, which was once part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but which was discarded because it was pitched too high to blend with the other orchestral instruments, is destined again to take its place as one of the greatest organs in the world.

This great instrument, built in 1854 and purchased with the contributions of Boston music lovers, and which is now in Methuen, as been purchased by Ernest M. Skinner of West Newton, vice president of the Skinner Organ Company. Mr Skinner has also purchased Serlo Hall, which houses it, the Searles Organ factory and a nearby cottage house, all located here.

The deed transferring the property from Mrs Lillian W. Andrew of this town to Mr Skinner was recorded at the Lawrence Registry of Deeds office today. No price was made public, but it is understood that the purchase price was in excess of $200,000.

Once Owned by Searles

The property was formerly that of the late Edward F. Searles, multi-millionaire, and later of the late Arthur T. Walker, his heir. During Mr Searles' life many noted organists played on it, but in recent years it has not been used much.

It has always been maintained in first-class condition, though, and, after he has made some additions and improvements, Mr Skinner hopes to make it "a shrine for the lover of organ music, a meeting place for the American Guild of Organists, and for the National Association of Organists, and perhaps other musical organizations."

The late Mr Searles purchased the organ at an auction sale and moved it to Methuen, in pieces, of course, before he had any place to house it.

Meanwhile, he was building Serlo Hall, a hall that was destined to have almost perfect acoustic properties, as a permanent home for it. It required the best part of five years for the hall to be built and the organ to be rebuilt in it.

Its black walnut case is a wonderful example of woodcarving and the instrument has 6000 pipes, only nine of which are mute. Organists from all parts of America and Europe have played on it and are said to have been most enthusiastic about it.

Frank M. Andrew of Lawrence and Methuen, who announced the sale, gave out the statement prepared by Mr Skinner. The statement, in part, follows:

"The combination of the organ, the hall and its marvelous acoustical conditions represent, in my opinion, the finest expression of an ideal, with respect to the organ and organ music, to be found anywhere in the world. Serlo Hall with its perfect acoustics and the unique and amazing organ case makes a spectacle that is nothing short of magnificent—one in which every element making for perfection is present in its best sense.

"I entered Serlo Hall for the first time less than two years ago. It made an unforgetable impression on me. There were rumors that the organ was to be sold or destroyed. This seemed to me nothing short of vandalism, almost sacrilege.

Plans to Arrange Concerts

"It was only through a miracle of unforeseen circumstances that I became the owner of it. Now that it is mine I want to make some additions to the organ to bring it up to date, and then make it a shrine for the lovers of organ music, a meeting place, if possible, for the American Guild of Organists, for the National Association of Organists, and perhaps other musical organizations. This will be carrying out Mr Searles' original idea and at the same time save this great monument from destruction.

"I also have in mind some concerts in which music for organ and piano may be given. The opportunity for doing something that is based upon the ideal and not upon financial considerations seems to find a fitting setting in Serlo Hall."

EBRUARY 8, 1931

Bostonians May H
Season Series---In

Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not from Symphony Hall or from Dr. Koussevitzky but from a bulletin of the Juilliard School of Music of New York comes the announcement that Nicolai Berezowsky, who received his training in that institution, has been invited to conduct the Boston orchestra in his own symphony, in the course of this present season. Apparently no date has yet been set for the event.

• • • •

Directly from Symphony Hall comes word of more imminent happenings. On Tuesday afternoon Myra Hess will be the pianist, as previously announced, in the G major Concerto, when Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra set an all-Beethoven programme before the audience of the Tuesday series of concerts, and a week from tomorrow evening, on Feb. 16, Misczyslaw Muenz, pianist, will be the soloist at the fourth concert of the Monday series. At the regular Friday and Saturday concerts of this week, as elsewhere announced, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will pay honors to Charles Martin Loeffler, who has just passed his 70th birthday.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE FEB 8

Charles Martin Loeffler's 70th birthday will be honored, two weeks later, at this week's Boston Symphony concerts in the regular series by the performance of two of his works. Honegger's new, and eagerly awaited symphony, composed for the orchestra's anniversary, will be performed for the first times. Another novelty will be a suite by an Italian composer named Pilati, hitherto unknown here.

Myra Hess will play Beethoven's Fourth concerto, a work in which she excels, as soloist at the Tuesday Symphony concert this week.

Henry Prunieres, managing editor of the French "Revue musicale," heard the Boston Symphony here last Fall. Here is a translation of what he had to tell the French musical intelligentsia about it when he returned to Paris, in the January number of his magazine: "This marvelous orchestra is composed of 124 musicians (there are really 110) chosen from among the best in the world, and rehearsing daily under the rigorous discipline of their great chief, Serge Koussevitzky. Nothing can give an idea of the great power, without harshness, of the amplitude and purity of tone, of the precision of the attacks, of the sweetness and the finesse of the pianissimi of this orchestra, which is without doubt the best to be found in the world today."

MUSIC

HERALD FEB 11

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

For the third concert of the Tuesday afternoon series Dr. Koussevitsky turned to Beethoven. From this source he drew the following program: Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, otherwise known as the "Eroica"; overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and the concerto for pianoforte in G major, Myra Hess, soloist. None of these compositions can be called unfamiliar; of the first two one might say that frequent repetition had bred contempt, but such is not the case when Dr. Koussevitsky is master of the situation. At each reading he suffuses them with a new life. The hearer comes again in contact with an old acquaintance—better, an intimate friend—to discover that what he thought he knew is infinite—endless in resource, not so quickly grasped and understood as once he in his tyro-mood conjectured.

Miss Hess played the concerto with beautiful simplicity. Her far reaching intelligence grasps a movement as a whole; from this she works out the details, coloring them as her impecable taste dictates, but never losing sight of the general contour. Hence the wonderful unity of her interpretation. There is no excess; everything is in its place perfectly proportioned. With the first chord she played she seemed to feel the last, and so comprehended every part. Her interpretation convinced because of its clarity, because of the logical sequence of beginning, middle and end which she not only knows but feels. One might say that the tranquility with which she filled the andante and calmed the belligerent strings made this movement more beautiful than the others. But to say this would be to forget the burst of sunshine one felt at the opening of the rondo.

Dr. Koussevitsky wove a beautiful background for Miss Hess. The impression was much the same as an exquisite tapetry gives with the orchestra the setting, the pianist the predominate figure, both skillfully interwoven. As a result of this too perfect creation the overture which followed it seemed a little pale.

Both Miss Hess and Dr. Koussevitsky were welcomed and applauded by a large and enthusiastic audience.

The next concert of the series will be on Feb. 24.

L. B. D.

MYRA HESS HEARD A
SYMPHONY CONCE

GLOBE FEB 11

Soloist in Beethoven G Major Concerto

Myra Hess, the deservedly admir English pianist, appeared as soloist yesterday afternoon's concert in t Boston Symphony's Tuesday seri She was very heartily applauded f her fine performance of the solo pa in Beethoven's G major concerto. Th concert began with the "Eroica" Sym phony, and ended with the "Egmont overture.

This all-Beethoven program, follow ing an all-Wagner program, made on wonder whether the next Tuesday con cert would be devoted to music b Brahms or by Tchaikovsky. Th audience seemed greatly pleased with yesterday's choice of numbers, i chance comments overheard may serve as an indication.

Miss Hess has played this concerto with the Boston Symphony in Boston in a former season. Her performance this year with the orchestra in Washington and in New York won her high praise. Yesterday there was no flaws to pick. One could only admire and enjoy the rare combination of refinement and imaginative intensity in her playing. Of all the pianists heard in the past 20 years in this concerto only Winifred Christie years ago has equalled Miss Hess's remarkable performance.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an admirable performance of the "Eroica," save for the unduly slow pace of the adagio. There was more precision, more euphony, in the first allegro than on some former occasions It is in such familiar classics as this that one can best measure the remarkable progress made by conductor and orchestra in the past few years toward regaining the old perfection of style of the pre-war orchestra under Dr Muck.

The next concert in this series will be given Feb 24, with a program not yet announced.

P. R.

3D TUESDAY SYMPHONY

Herald Feb 11

The third of the Tuesday afternoon series of Symphony concerts, which took place yesterday afternoon, offered as departure from precedent a soloist, and a notable soloist to boot, Myra Hess, who was heard in the G major Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven. A few seasons ago Miss Hess played this concerto at a Monday evening concert and won all hearers by the extreme felicity of her performance. This season Miss Hess has been repeating that performance with the orchestra in various cities, in Washington and in New York, and everywhere to great acclaim.

Yesterday, as before, Miss Hess' playing of the Concerto was noteworthy for tonal beauty, an ideal which in this particular work is not always easy to achieve. In other hands this Concerto has, indeed, seemed unsympathetically written for the pianoforte, with scant regard for the blended timbres of solo-instrument and orchestra. But such misgivings disappear entirely when the work is heard under the magical fingers of Miss Hess. Others perhaps, as Mr. Schnabel a year ago, have made more dramatic the dialogue between piano and orchestra that is the second movement, but Miss Hess conceives this celebrated episode most poetically and her playing of the first and third movements was an unmitigated delight. The audience, as was to be expected, received her warmly.

Already this season Dr. Koussevitzky had given the Tuesday subscribers an all-Wagner program.

(Copyright, 1931, by Associated Editors, Inc.)

Music

Monitor Feb 11

Tuesday Symphony—Gordon Quartet

Once more the subscribers to the Tuesday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have reason to be thankful. Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall they enjoyed an echo of the Beethoven Festival of last December in Washington, with Myra Hess as soloist in the G major Piano Concerto, and with the "Eroica" Symphony to open the program and the "Egmont" Overture to close it.

Once more conductor and players worked hard to give the Tuesday audience a superlative interpretation of these master works. Indeed, Dr. Koussevitzky worked perhaps a little too hard in the symphony. The first movement was superbly played, but thereafter, and particularly in the slow movement, he fell victim to that meticulosity which sometimes defeats his highest aspiration. Musical structure was lost sight of in a labyrinth of detail. The listener cannot appreciate musical values when his attention is continually distracted by the marvel of an orchestra holding together at so sluggish a pace. The interest becomes that of a slow motion picture. Yet in the opening of the Finale that same virtuosity permitted a flexibility that was placed at the service of musical beauty.

Miss Hess gave a performance of notable loveliness, using a finely graded dynamic range in lieu of the violent contrasts on which some pianists rely. Especially poetic was the dialogue of the Andante, in which her feminine tone was particularly appropriate against the gruffness of the orchestra.

Pla

Trans Feb 11

Afternoon of Beethoven and Of Myra Hess

Koussevitzky and the 'Eroica,' The Pianist Through the G-Major Concerto

NO SINFUL, perturbing modernist intruded. Beethoven filled the whole program — the thrice-familiar Beethoven of the "Eroica" symphony, the "Egmont" overture, the piano-concerto, numbered four and in the key of G major. The orchestra was at the top of its form; the conductor master of himself, his men, the music before him. The pianist for the concerto, Miss Hess, cherished in particular by the Bostonian public, once more raising expectation and fulfilling it; adding her own following to the usual audience at a Tuesday matinée in Symphony Hall. Close attention; no coughing even in these days of February damps; honest, general, hearty applause. Superlative performance of familiar and honored music; decorum and pleasure hand in hand. A perfect concert, departing dowagers said one to another. Certainly one at high point in the "best Bostonian tradition." Even to reviewers, skirmishing on the outskirts, notable in kind. If tickets were hard to come by—the theme of intermission-gossip—the more fortunate those who had procured them, and forgotten the digging in the pleasure of the reward.

In the morning Dr. Koussevitzky had plied his pains and loosed his enthusiasms upon Monsieur Honegger. For the conductor thinks highly of the Parisian's new Symphony, to be heard on Friday and Saturday. Yet in the afternoon, he came, possibly for the hundredth time, to Beethoven's "Eroica," as though for him and for the while there were no other music in the world. With none of the great Ludwig's greater symphonies does he more excel. Writers about the theater discourse of "the illusion of the first time." By it they mean the ability of the actor to make the speech that he nightly repeats sound as though but now it had sprung to his lips; to wing the action that he regularly accomplishes and long since calculated, with what seems the impulse of the instant.

Playing the "Eroica," Dr. Koussevitzky conjures up this "illusion of the first time." The practised, and learned, concert-goer believes that he is hearing it with something like the emotion that may have traversed the first audience in Vienna a century and a quarter ago. The student of details searches the performance and finds not one perfunctory or overlooked. The searcher for sensation feels each measure vitalized; hears the whole swirling around him, hitting him between the eyes, or—should it be—the ears. The imaginative listener takes the pleasure of his fantasy; decks the creative Beethoven in the glamour of romance—he wore anything but that in his struggles with composition—sits by at the miracle of a symphony, out of itself and of performance perennially renewed. The "Eroica" as repertory piece! Out upon the notion when Dr. Koussevitzky sets to it! Thanks to a temperament, every repetition is for him a first time; every audience an assemblage to be impressed.

Not only this but more. The conductor gives to the "Eroica" a voice that bears out a title of tradition. So generated, the symphony moves in heroic atmosphere. The rushing of the darker strings through the Scherzo, the golden-toned, broad-phrasing horns, seem each the complement of the other. In thrilling progress the Finale ascends from suspense to suspense—deeper-textured, ampler of curve and period; firmer and firmer rhythmed. The slow movement—one of the few in which the symphonic Beethoven is neither moralizing nor sentimentalizing—speaks exaltedly of the soul of man, poignantly to the other souls that hear. The hero thus lamented has ridden the storm in the first movement, ridden it titanically. To the first audience in Vienna, the "Eroica" was no "Eroica"—only "a new grand symphony in D-sharp by Herr Ludwig van Beethoven." But the heroic spirit must have infused the music, the heroic voice spoken out. Did Beethoven, conducting, deliver the music to the full? Composer-conductors are not always fortunate with their own pieces. Or did it remain for Habeneck and Bülow, for Muck and Koussevitzky and Toscanini, to set free the heroic spirit, to release the heroic tones. Enough that they did and do; while the art of conducting, in them, and for this "Eroica" Symphony, goes justified.

The orchestra, when it plays as it played yesterday, shares these laurels. Perhaps the hearer must be listening to a familiar music, played in this concert-hall these twenty years, to discover the full merit of those now sounding it. Once more there is reason to marvel at the splendor and the power of the strings, their unanimity and flexibility, their range in sonorities over all the lights and all the shadows. The deeper Beethoven descends, the higher he mounts, with him they also go. Beethoven loved the upper voices of the woodwinds above and apart from the tonal mass. Mr. Laurent's flute lends him its brightness; Mr. Polatschek's clarinet its clear suavities. The horns of Beethoven, as they are played at Symphony Hall, foretell the magic of sound and illusion that a century of composers has since intensified. Our piercing modern brass has its place in the incisive measures of the "Eroica." Upon this sensitive orchestra, as upon a single instrument, Dr. Koussevitzky can inlay every detail that Beethoven fashioned. They stood clear yesterday—the momentary part of an up-swelling whole. And what is here written of conductor, orchestra and the "Eroica" is true equally with the lesser overture to "Egmont." After it the curtain should have risen white-hot upon Goethe's play.

Not to forget the event, for many, of the day—Miss Hess's playing of the piano-part in the Fourth Concerto. The cynics were as God made them and could not forbear to say that "the G-major was at best a woman's piece." Perhaps it is—in the slow movement. But Miss Hess flinging out the finale in scintillant phrases at high speed and in sharp rhythm, answering the orchestra, turn and turn about, was not exactly a feminine pianist. Rather she was clothed in the new power and brilliance, now finely measured, of her present noon. Nor was she feminine again in the close-woven energies of piano and orchestra through the first movement—both, the composer hidden, in the veritable act of creation.

The imagining poet, the sensitive technician, the mistress of euphony, joined hands with conductor and players in the middle movement of the plaint of the piano against the forbidding orchestra; the long pleading, the final exultation, the whisper into submissive silence. The books say that until Beethoven wrote, no such poetry of tones was known to the concerto-form. Perhaps none to excel it is to be found in a hundred more concertos, as far as this our

Parisian, Bostonian, And Italian

Trans Feb 12

A Symphony Concert to Honor Loeffler, Present Pilati, Set Forth Honegger

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT of Friday and Saturday will be notable on more than one count. First, it will do honor to one of the foremost of Boston musicians on the occasion of a milestone in his life. Second, it will bring to performance one of the most significant of the works written for the orchestral semi-centennial. Charles Martin Loeffler, as mentioned more than once in these columns, became a septuagenarian near the turn of last month. Of those seventy years, forty-nine were spent in Boston and its environs. Of this half century, the first two decades found Mr. Loeffler sharing with Franz Kneisel and his predecessor, Bernard Listemann, the first desk among the first violins of the Symphony Orchestra. It is fitting that one-half of the current program at Symphony Hall (the nearest available to his birthday) should go to works of Charles Martin Loeffler—the setting of St. Francis's "Canticle of The Sun"; the "Pagan Poem."

The other half of the program consists of two novelties. Arthur Honegger's Symphony dedicated "to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its chief, Serge Koussevitzky," joins hands with a "Suite for Strings and Pianoforte" by the youthful Italian composer, Mario Pilati, as yet unheard hereabouts.

Honegger's Symphony, by the evidence of the dates at the end of the score, "Paris — Mougins, Décembre 1929 — Mai 1930," was written in direct response to the invitation to contribute to the jubilee year. It runs in three movements, Allegro marcato, Adagio, Presto. The first movement is one of hard, unflinching power. The second is decidedly lyrical. The third is a scherzo developed to proportions to make it suitable for a finale. The symphony as a whole is rigorously atonal. He would be hardy indeed who dared ascribe to it a definite key. Yet it ends on a C-major chord, with a reasonably normal C-major cadence. The first few passages of the symphony are all aimed at and land on the note C. It is furthermore the last note of the first movement. We throw our hat into the ring, therefore, with the up-to-the-minute assertion that this Symphonie pour Orchestre "gravitates about C as its tonal centre."

day. Of late her audiences have been hailing Miss Hess as pianist of full-ripened power, far-ranging, wide-sweeping, penetrating large and deep. Yesterday came the reminder that for beauty and for poetry, she may still sensitize fineness.

H. T. P.

having major sevenths, emerges, above which strings, with violas and 'cellos in high registers, together with high violins, sing a sustained theme lustrously colored with unusual dissonances. A brass quartet repeats this theme to an obbligato evolved from the principal motiv of the first theme. This principal theme is again repeated with energy; while above and below it occur many melodies of charming contours, some of which are later repeated, some used for development. A lyrical section (the "second theme" section of the text-books) ensues, into which eventually horns, against violent chords in the strings, project an incisive, strongly marked theme, which soon flowers into a solo for muted trombone against a pizzicato bass.

The free fantasia follows, in which graceful melodic contours from the lyrical section are set off against the hard sevenths and other incisive motivs from the chief theme. The recapitulation ensues in reverse order. The lyrical sections come first, give way to a long crescendo which begins with a muttering bass and introduces the full principal theme at white heat. It is repeated in its entirety, carrying with it the sustained passage that first appeared in high strings—now in trumpets and woodwinds. The movement ends quietly with grumblings from the principal theme in low basses and violoncellos.

The Adagio proceeds over a chromatic ascending bass, one chromatic-scale degree to a measure. Twice it climbs the entire span of an octave. Above this bass 'cellos and violas sing a melody of truly romantic fervor, ornamented sparingly and discreetly by florid wood-wind figures. Honegger, for all his atonality, is not afraid to let his melodies sing, and sing ardently. Into a web of string melodies this leads, in which the various voices assume the individuality of the lines in a string quartet rather than weave the customary orchestral texture. A second theme (beginning with three repeated notes) is sung by muted trumpet against a graceful melody in 'cellos and violas and an even more sustained melody in bassoons. The dominating motiv in this trio is tossed about from trumpet to clarinet to oboe. After a moment of relaxation a crescendo made up of various figures previously introduced, all circling about a powerful horn theme, ushers in the climax. At its height, high strings with tremendous power and lyrical intensity enter with the principal theme of the movement. All of the material is then freely developed. Again there is a lull. The second theme, of the repeated notes, recurs together with its two associated melodies. The chromatic march of the bass is resumed. Now violins top it with a new melody; while woodwinds weave a web again suggestive of chamber music. Reminiscences of the first theme are once more heard as the movement comes to a quiet close.

The Presto, in form, is a rondo on a large scale, in style a scherzo. It begins with double-basses and double-bassoon in an introductory theme of diabolical or sinister humor. A low bassoon soon sounds the first vague suggestion of the principal theme. After a climax a trumpet enters with a slightly ampler form of this intriguingly rhythmed subject. It is repeated sufficiently for the hearer to become well acquinted with it. A group of subsidiary themes follows: an exceedingly energetic, slightly syncopated one in the horns; a brightly rhythmed, "popular" one for bassoon; another, vigorous in the horns against string accompaniment from the first sustained theme of the first movement; finally a gracefully rhythmed one presented in trumpets, partially imitated in other wind instruments. After some development, the principal theme in more complete form that at first and somewhat modified, enters in the low strings and is contrapuntally imitated and extensively developed in the higher strings and woodwinds. The entire group of subsidiary themes is then repeated, this time with the addition of lyrical obbligati in various instruments. At the height of this second development of subsidiary themes, the principal theme again breaks in, first in horns, then in woodwinds, while one of the subsidiary themes continues. This chief climax then calms into an Andante Tranquillo on a songful version of this same principal theme. There, quietly, the symphony ends.

Mario Pilati was born at Naples in 1903. He holds the diploma of the Conservatory of San Pietro a Majella of that city. He is active as a pianist, musical critic and composer. Part of his life has been spent in Cagliari on the southern coast of Sardinia. The present suite was written in that city in the winter of 1924-25. It combines a piano (Mr. Sanromá) with the usual string orchestra. It runs through Introduction, Saraband, Minuet, Finale. In the introduction (Allegro, grave, con energia), a plain theme for strings, a more melodic one, also first given to strings, are the material. Both themes are tossed back and forth between strings and piano. In the saraband, the violas begin with a theme typical of such a dance. The minuet, in graceful rhythm, is a rondo in which the principal theme appears three times, with two intervening contrasts. The piano at times becomes rather brilliant. The finale is an Allegro Burlesco. There is a bustling theme in sixteenth notes, another more songful in character. At the climax both are combined. A grotesque section follows. There is a grandiose conclusion upon the principal theme of the introduction.

The following paragraph may be quoted from a review of the Suite in the Revista Musicale Italiana: "Mario Pilati is a very young man, and it is perfectly logical that his music, following the courses of the advance-guard, should give voice to the neo-classicism now in vogue. Let us be thankful to him that he has adhered to this style with moderation; that not only in the expression which is almost always gentle and spontaneous, but also in the title, he has spared us the disagreeable shrillness of the false and much abused resuscitations that are as anachronistic as they are useless. The suite . . . exhibits qualities of seriousness and ability not to be disregarded. . . . The four movements are all developed well, but without any particularly striking factors. . . . We await Pilati in another attempt, in a composition in which, without æsthetic preoccupations, he may reveal his real ability. This first flight leads one to wait with great faith." (Translation by I. Pilla.)

A. H. M.

that message to his grandson.

Subscribers to the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday are grumbling over the recent appearance of Myra Hess, their cherished pianist, at a Tuesday matinée only. If they will possess their souls in patience, they will hear her in regular course at a pair of concerts next season.

EBRUARY 8, 1931

Bostonians May H
Season Series --- Ir

Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not from Symphony Hall or from Dr. Koussevitzky but from a bulletin of the Juilliard School of Music of New York comes the announcement that Nicolai Berezowsky, who received his training in that institution, has been invited to conduct the Boston orchestra in his own symphony, in the course of this present season. Apparently no date has yet been set for the event.

• • • •

Directly from Symphony Hall comes word of more imminent happenings. On Tuesday afternoon Myra Hess will be the pianist, as previously announced, in the G major Concerto, when Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra set an all-Beethoven programme before the audience of the Tuesday series of concerts, and a week from tomorrow evening, on Feb. 16, Misczyslaw Muenz, pianist, will be the soloist at the fourth concert of the Monday series. At the regular Friday and Saturday concerts of this week, as elsewhere announced, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will pay honors to Charles Martin Loeffler, who has just passed his 70th birthday.

• • • •

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE FEB 8

Charles Martin Loeffler's 70th birthday will be honored, two weeks later, at this week's Boston Symphony concerts in the regular series by the performance of two of his works. Honegger's new, and eagerly awaited symphony, composed for the orchestra's anniversary, will be performed for the first times. Another novelty will be a suite by an Italian composer named Pilati, hitherto unknown here.

Myra Hess will play Beethoven's Fourth concerto, a work in which she excels, as soloist at the Tuesday Symphony concert this week.

Henry Prunieres, managing editor of the French "Revue musicale," heard the Boston Symphony here last Fall. Here is a translation of what he had to tell the French musical intelligentsia about it when he returned to Paris, in the January number of his magazine: "This marvelous orchestra is composed of 124 musicians (there are really 110) chosen from among the best in the world, and rehearsing daily under the rigorous discipline of their great chief, Serge Koussevitzky. Nothing can give an idea of the great power, without harshness, of the amplitude and purity of tone, of the precision of the attacks, of the sweetness and the finesse of the pianissimi of this orchestra, which is without doubt the best to be found in the world today."

MUSIC

HERALD FEB 11

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

For the third concert of the Tuesday afternoon series Dr. Koussevitsky turned to Beethoven. From this source he drew the following program: Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, otherwise known as the "Eroica"; overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and the concerto for pianoforte in G major, Myra Hess, soloist. None of these compositions can be called unfamiliar; of the first two one might say that frequent repetition had bred contempt, but such is not the case when Dr. Koussevitsky is master of the situation. At each reading he suffuses them with a new life. The hearer comes again in contact with an old acquaintance—better, an intimate friend—to discover that what he thought he knew is infinite—endless in resource, not so quickly grasped and understood as once he in his tyro-mood conjectured.

Miss Hess played the concerto with beautiful simplicity. Her far reaching intelligence grasps a movement as a whole; from this she works out the details, coloring them as her impecable taste dictates, but never losing sight of the general contour. Hence the wonderful unity of her interpretation. There is no excess; everything is in its place perfectly proportioned. With the first chord she played she seemed to feel the last, and so comprehended every part. Her interpretation convinced because of its clarity, because of the logical sequence of beginning, middle and end which she not only knows but feels. One might say that the tranquility with which she filled the andante and calmed the belligerent strings made this movement more beautiful than the others. But to say this would be to forget the burst of sunshine one felt at the opening of the rondo.

Dr. Koussevitsky wove a beautiful background for Miss Hess. The impression was much the same as an exquisite tapetry gives with the orchestra the setting, the pianist the predominate figure, both skillfully interwoven. As a result of this too perfect creation the overture which followed it seemed a little pale.

Both Miss Hess and Dr. Koussevitsky were welcomed and applauded by a large and enthusiastic audience.

The next concert of the series will be on Feb. 24. L. B. D.

MYRA HESS HEARD A
SYMPHONY CONCE

GLOBE FEB 11

Soloist in Beethoven G Major Concerto

Myra Hess, the deservedly admir English pianist, appeared as soloist yesterday afternoon's concert in t Boston Symphony's Tuesday seri She was very heartily applauded f her fine performance of the solo pa in Beethoven's G major concerto. Tl concert began with the "Eroica" Syn phony, and ended with the "Egmont overture.

This all-Beethoven program, follow ing an all-Wagner program, made on wonder whether the next Tuesday con cert would be devoted to music b Brahms or by Tchaikovsky. Th audience seemed greatly pleased witl yesterday's choice of numbers, i chance comments overheard may serve as an indication.

Miss Hess has played this concerto with the Boston Symphony in Boston in a former season. Her performance this year with the orchestra in Washington and in New York won her high praise. Yesterday there was no flaws to pick. One could only admire and enjoy the rare combination of refinement and imaginative intensity in her playing. Of all the pianists heard in the past 20 years in this concerto only Winifred Christie years ago has equalled Miss Hess's remarkable performance.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an admirable performance of the "Eroica," save for the unduly slow pace of the adagio. There was more precision, more euphony, in the first allegro than on some former occasions It is in such familiar classics as this that one can best measure the remarkable progress made by conductor and orchestra in the past few years toward regaining the old perfection of style of the pre-war orchestra under Dr Muck.

The next concert in this series will be given Feb 24, with a program not yet announced. P. R.

3D TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The third of the Tuesday afternoon series of Symphony concerts, which took place yesterday afternoon, offered as departure from precedent a soloist, and a notable soloist to boot, Myra Hess, who was heard in the G major Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven. A few seasons ago Miss Hess played this concerto at a Monday evening concert and won all hearers by the extreme felicity of her performance. This season Miss Hess has been repeating that performance with the orchestra in various cities, in Washington and in New York, and everywhere to great acclaim.

Yesterday, as before, Miss Hess' playing of the Concerto was noteworthy for tonal beauty, an ideal which in this particular work is not always easy to achieve. In other hands this Concerto has, indeed, seemed unsympathetically written for the pianoforte, with scant regard for the blended timbres of solo-instrument and orchestra. But such misgivings disappear entirely when the work is heard under the magical fingers of Miss Hess. Others perhaps, as Mr. Schnabel a year ago, have made more dramatic the dialogue between piano and orchestra that is the second movement, but Miss Hess conceives this celebrated episode most poetically and her playing of the first and third movements was an unmitigated delight. The audience, as was to be expected, received her warmly.

Already this season Dr. Koussevitzky had given the Tuesday subscribers an all-Wagner programme; that of yesterday fell wholly to the music of Beethoven. Before the Concerto came the "Eroica" Symphony, in a performance truly heroic, a performance exalted in mood from first to last. And a stirringly dramatic reading of the "Egmont" Overture brought the concert to an end.

AN SCIENCE MONITOR BUREAU fact that there is dissatisfaction at the mint with the present design. The full-length figure of the "Goddess of Liberty" now adorning the obverse of the 25-cent coin is so detailed that officials of the mint say it wears badly. The features of the

...n on Quarter-Dollar

Trans Feb 11 Pla

Afternoon of Beethoven and Of Myra Hess

Koussevitzky and the 'Eroica,' The Pianist Through the G-Major Concerto

NO SINFUL, perturbing modernist intruded. Beethoven filled the whole program — the thrice-familiar Beethoven of the "Eroica" symphony, the "Egmont" overture, the piano-concerto, numbered four and in the key of G major. The orchestra was at the top of its form; the conductor master of himself, his men, the music before him. The pianist for the concerto, Miss Hess, cherished in particular by the Bostonian public, once more raising expectation and fulfilling it; adding her own following to the usual audience at a Tuesday matinée in Symphony Hall. Close attention; no coughing even in these days of February damps; honest, general, hearty applause. Superlative performance of familiar and honored music; decorum and pleasure hand in hand. A perfect concert, departing dowagers said one to another. Certainly one at high point in the "best Bostonian tradition." Even to reviewers, skirmishing on the outskirts, notable in kind. If tickets were hard to come by—the theme of intermission-gossip—the more fortunate those who had procured them, and forgotten the digging in the pleasure of the reward.

In the morning Dr. Koussevitzky had plied his pains and loosed his enthusiasms upon Monsieur Honegger. For the conductor thinks highly of the Parisian's new Symphony, to be heard on Friday and Saturday. Yet in the afternoon, he came, possibly for the hundredth time, to Beethoven's "Eroica," as though for him and for the while there were no other music in the world. With none of the great Ludwig's greater symphonies does he more excel. Writers about the theater discourse of "the illusion of the first time." By it they mean the ability of the actor to make the speech that he nightly repeats sound as though but now

...And Another G

Saving ½ on the purc

The stud... formance and finds not one ... or overlooked. The searcher for sensation feels each measure vitalized; hears the whole swirling around him, hitting him between the eyes, or—should it be—the ears. The imaginative listener takes the pleasure of his fantasy; decks the creative Beethoven in the glamour of romance—he wore anything but that in his struggles with composition—sits by at the miracle of a symphony, out of itself and of performance perennially renewed. The "Eroica" as repertory piece! Out upon the notion when Dr. Koussevitzky sets to it! Thanks to a temperament, every repetition is for him a first time; every audience an assemblage to be impressed.

Not only this but more. The conductor gives to the "Eroica" a voice that bears out a title of tradition. So generated, the symphony moves in heroic atmosphere. The rushing of the darker strings through the Scherzo, the golden-toned, broad-phrasing horns, seem each the complement of the other. In thrilling progress the Finale ascends from suspense to suspense—deeper-textured, ampler of curve and period; firmer and firmer rhythmed. The slow movement—one of the few in which the symphonic Beethoven is neither moralizing nor sentimentalizing—speaks exaltedly of the soul of man, poignantly to the other souls that hear. The hero thus lamented has ridden the storm in the first movement, ridden it titanically. To the first audience in Vienna, the "Eroica" was no "Eroica"—only "a new grand symphony in D-sharp by Herr Ludwig van Beethoven." But the heroic spirit must have infused the music, the heroic voice spoken out. Did Beethoven, conducting, deliver the music to the full? Composer-conductors are not always fortunate with their own pieces. Or did it remain for Habeneck and Bülow, for Muck and Koussevitzky and Toscanini, to set free the heroic spirit, to release the heroic tones. Enough that they did and do; while the art of conducting, in them, and for this "Eroica" Symphony, goes justified.

The orchestra, when it plays as it played yesterday, shares these laurels. Perhaps the hearer must be listening to a familiar music, played in this concert-hall these twenty years, to discover the full merit of those now sounding it. Once more there is reason to marvel at the splendor and the power of the strings, their unanimity and flexibility, their range in sonorities over all the lights and all the shadows. The deeper Beethoven descends, the higher he mounts, with him they also go. Beethoven loved the upper voices of the woodwinds above and apart from the tonal mass. Mr. Laurent's flute lends him its brightness; Mr. Polatschek's clarinet its clear suavities. The horns of Beethoven, as they are played at Symphony Hall, foretell the magic of sound and illusion that a century of composers has since intensified. Our piercing modern brass has its place in the incisive measures of the "Eroica." Upon this sensitive orchestra, as upon a single instrument, Dr. Koussevitzky can inlay every detail that Beethoven fashioned. They stood clear yesterday—the momentary part of an up-swelling whole. And what is here written of conductor, orchestra and the "Eroica" is true equally with the lesser overture to "Egmont." After it the curtain should have risen white-hot upon Goethe's play.

Not to forget the event, for many, of the day—Miss Hess's playing of the piano-part in the Fourth Concerto. The cynics were as God made them and could not forbear to say that "the G-major was at best a woman's piece." Perhaps it is—in the slow movement. But Miss Hess flinging out the finale in scintillant phrases at high speed and in sharp rhythm, answering the orchestra, turn and turn about, was not exactly a feminine pianist. Rather she was clothed in the new power and brilliance, now finely measured, of her present noon. Nor was she feminine again in the close-woven energies of piano and orchestra through the first movement—both, the composer hidden, in the veritable act of creation.

The imagining poet, the sensitive technician, the mistress of euphony, joined hands with conductor and players in the middle movement of the plaint of the piano against the forbidding orchestra; the long pleading, the final exultation, the whisper into submissive silence. The books say that until Beethoven wrote, no such poetry of tones was known to the concerto-form. Perhaps none to excel it is to be found in a hundred more concertos, as far as this our

Parisian, Bostonian, And Italian

Trans Feb 12

A Symphony Concert to Honor Loeffler, Present Pilati, Set Forth Honegger

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT of Friday and Saturday will be notable on more than one count. First, it will do honor to one of the foremost of Boston musicians on the occasion of a milestone in his life. Second, it will bring to performance one of the most significant of the works written for the orchestral semi-centennial. Charles Martin Loeffler, as mentioned more than once in these columns, became a septuagenarian near the turn of last month. Of those seventy years, forty-nine were spent in Boston and its environs. Of this half century, the first two decades found Mr. Loeffler sharing with Franz Kneisel and his predecessor, Bernard Listemann, the first desk among the first violins of the Symphony Orchestra. It is fitting that one-half of the current program at Symphony Hall (the nearest available to his birthday) should go to works of Charles Martin Loeffler—the setting of St. Francis's "Canticle of The Sun"; the "Pagan Poem."

The other half of the program consists of two novelties. Arthur Honegger's Symphony dedicated "to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its chief, Serge Koussevitzky," joins hands with a "Suite for Strings and Pianoforte" by the youthful Italian composer, Mario Pilati, as yet unheard hereabouts.

Honegger's Symphony, by the evidence of the dates at the end of the score, "Paris — Mougins, Décembre 1929 — Mai 1930," was written in direct response to the invitation to contribute to the jubilee year. It runs in three movements, Allegro marcato, Adagio, Presto. The first movement is one of hard, unflinching power. The second is decidedly lyrical. The third is a scherzo developed to proportions to make it suitable for a finale. The symphony as a whole is rigorously atonal. He would be hardy indeed who dared ascribe to it a definite key. Yet it ends on a C-major chord, with a reasonably normal C-major cadence. The first few passages of the symphony are all aimed at and land on the note C. It is furthermore the last note of the first movement. We throw our hat into the ring, therefore, with the up-to-the-minute assertion that this Symphonie pour Orchestre "gravitates about C as its tonal centre."

A vigorously, almost barbarously accented passage, principally for strings, begins the first movement. It is obviously the principal theme. In it the dissonant interval of the major seventh is used in several audacious ways. There is no pretense or suggestion of harmonization. A pair of granitic contrapuntal lines sharply chisel the theme and the transition which follows. From this transition a pizzicato bass, in two alternating major sevenths, emerges, above which strings, with violas and 'cellos in high registers, together with high violins, sing a sustained theme lustrously colored with unusual dissonances. A brass quartet repeats this theme to an obbligato evolved from the principal motiv of the first theme. This principal theme is again repeated with energy; while above and below it occur many melodies of charming contours, some of which are later repeated, some used for development. A lyrical section (the "second theme" section of the text-books) ensues, into which eventually horns, against violent chords in the strings, project an incisive, strongly marked theme, which soon flowers into a solo for muted trombone against a pizzicato bass.

The free fantasia follows, in which graceful melodic contours from the lyrical section are set off against the hard sevenths and other incisive motivs from the chief theme. The recapitulation ensues in reverse order. The lyrical sections come first, give way to a long crescendo which begins with a muttering bass and introduces the full principal theme at white heat. It is repeated in its entirety, carrying with it the sustained passage that first appeared in high strings—now in trumpets and woodwinds. The movement ends quietly with grumblings from the principal theme in low basses and violoncellos.

The Adagio proceeds over a chromatic ascending bass, one chromatic-scale degree to a measure. Twice it climbs the entire span of an octave. Above this bass 'cellos and violas sing a melody of truly romantic fervor, ornamented sparingly and discreetly by florid wood-wind figures. Honegger, for all his atonality, is not afraid to let his melodies sing, and sing ardently. Into a web of string melodies this leads, in which the various voices assume the individuality of the lines in a string quartet rather than weave the customary orchestral texture. A second theme (beginning with three repeated notes) is sung by muted trumpet against a graceful melody in 'cellos and violas and an even more sustained melody in bassoons. The dominating motiv in this trio is tossed about from trumpet to clarinet to oboe. After a moment of relaxation a crescendo made up of various figures previously introduced, all circling about a powerful horn theme, ushers in the climax. At its height, high strings with tremendous power and lyrical intensity enter with the principal theme of the movement. All of the material is then freely developed. Again there is a lull. The second theme, of the repeated notes, recurs together with its two associated melodies. The chromatic march of the bass is resumed. Now violins top it with a new melody; while woodwinds weave a web again suggestive of chamber music. Reminiscences of the first theme are once more heard as the movement comes to a quiet close.

The Presto, in form, is a rondo on a large scale, in style a scherzo. It begins with double-basses and double-bassoon in an introductory theme of diabolical or sinister humor. A low bassoon soon sounds the first vague suggestion of the principal theme. After a climax a trumpet enters with a slightly ampler form of this intriguingly rhythmed subject. It is repeated sufficiently for the hearer to become well acquinted with it. A group of subsidiary themes follows: an exceedingly energetic, slightly syncopated one in the horns; a brightly rhythmed, "popular" one for bassoon; another, vigorous in the horns against string accompaniment from the first sustained theme of the first movement; finally a gracefully rhythmed one presented in trumpets, partially imitated in other wind instruments. After some development, the principal theme in more complete form that at first and somewhat modified, enters in the low strings and is contrapuntally imitated and extensively developed in the higher strings and woodwinds. The entire group of subsidiary themes is then repeated, this time with the addition of lyrical obbligati in various instruments. At the height of this second development of subsidiary themes, the principal theme again breaks in, first in horns, then in woodwinds, while one of the subsidiary themes continues. This chief climax then calms into an Andante Tranquillo on a songful version of this same principal theme. There, quietly, the symphony ends.

Mario Pilati was born at Naples in 1903. He holds the diploma of the Conservatory of San Pietro a Majella of that city. He is active as a pianist, musical critic and composer. Part of his life has been spent in Cagliari on the southern coast of Sardinia. The present suite was written in that city in the winter of 1924-25. It combines a piano (Mr. Sanromá) with the usual string orchestra. It runs through Introduction, Saraband, Minuet, Finale. In the introduction (Allegro, grave, con energia), a plain theme for strings, a more melodic one, also first given to strings, are the material. Both themes are tossed back and forth between strings and piano. In the saraband, the violas begin with a theme typical of such a dance. The minuet, in graceful rhythm, is a rondo in which the principal theme appears three times, with two intervening contrasts. The piano at times becomes rather brilliant. The finale is an Allegro Burlesco. There is a bustling theme in sixteenth notes, another more songful in character. At the climax both are combined. A grotesque section follows. There is a grandiose conclusion upon the principal theme of the introduction.

The following paragraph may be quoted from a review of the Suite in the Revista Musicale Italiana: "Mario Pilati is a very young man, and it is perfectly logical that his music, following the courses of the advance-guard, should give voice to the neo-classicism now in vogue. Let us be thankful to him that he has adhered to this style with moderation; that not only in the expression which is almost always gentle and spontaneous, but also in the title, he has spared us the disagreeable shrillness of the false and much abused resuscitations that are as anachronistic as they are useless. The suite . . . exhibits qualities of seriousness and ability not to be disregarded. . . . The four movements are all developed well, but without any particularly striking factors. . . . We await Pilati in another attempt, in a composition in which, without æsthetic preoccupations, he may reveal his real ability. This first flight leads one to wait with great faith." (Translation by I. Pilla.)

A. H. M.

Subscribers to the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday are grumbling over the recent appearance of Myra Hess, their cherished pianist, at a Tuesday matinée only. If they will possess their souls in patience, they will hear her in regular course at a pair of concerts next season.

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1931

Spring Festival in Double Homage

To Johann Sebastian Bach, All-Father of Music As We Know It

To Henry Lee Higginson Who, in Boston Fifty Years Ago, Gave It Voice

THIS AFTERNOON, from Symphony Hall, comes the first complete announcement of the long-mooted Bach Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the first in its records, the first in this city. It will begin in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, March 24; continue through Wednesday and Thursday evenings, March 25 and 26; include the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon, March 27, and of Saturday evening, March 28; end on Sunday, March 29. It will comprise Bach's masterpiece, the Mass in B minor, for beginning and ending; the setting of the Magnificat and four Church Cantatas for further examples of his choral music; numbers for orchestra, for organ, for violins, for piano and harpsichord, drawn from the full range of his work. The festival is designed as climax to the current celebration of the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra; as homage not only to Bach, but to the "founder and sustainer" through thirty-seven years, Henry Lee Higginson.

On Tuesday, March 24, the Mass in B minor will fill two "sessions." The first will begin at 4.30 in the afternoon and end at 6.30 in the evening. The second will follow at 8.30 and continue till ten. The end of the setting of the Creed will be the dividing line in the Mass itself. On Wednesday evening, March 25, pieces for organ and harpsichord will be played, and Bliss Perry, Master of Arts, Doctor of Letters and the Laws, at Harvard University Higginson Professor of English Literature, Emeritus, will deliver the commemorative address—for the founder, not the composer.

On Thursday evening, March 26, the Second Brandenburg Concerto for orchestra, the Suite for orchestra in C major, the Concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor, the setting of the Magnificat for chorus and orchestra, will fill the concert. On Friday afternoon, March 27, the program will traverse the Suite for orchestra in D major; the Concerto for two violins with orchestra; the Church Cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt," and "O, Ewigkeit." The list for Saturday evening, March 28, assembles the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto; Preludes and Fugues for piano alone; the Church Cantatas, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein feste Burg." On Supday, March 29, the Mass in B minor will be repeated as on Tuesday—to increase the Pension Fund of the orchestra.

The forces to be deployed through these six concerts are, first, the Boston Symphony Orchestra; second, Dr. Davison's and Mr. Wallace Woodworth's chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, for the Mass and the Magnificat; Mr. Woodworth's Bach Cantata Club for the four Church Cantatas. In turn, the assisting artists are Amy Evans and Margarete Matzenauer, Richard Crooks and Fraser Gange, for the solo-parts in the Mass; Wallace Goodrich for the organ Prelude, and the organ Toccata; Regina Patorni-Casadesus for the harpsichord pieces; Alexander Borovsky for the piano numbers. Mme. Casadesus and Mr. Borovsky will come from Paris especially for the festival. Both excel in the music of Bach. From the first desk of the orchestra, Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz will play the Concerto for two violins. Finally, for author, arranger and animator of the whole, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Henry Lee Higginson, 1834-1931

Incidentally: the Mass in B minor has not been heard in Boston for a generation. The preparation has been thorough. A year ago the Cambridge choirs began work on their parts. . . . After much reflection Dr. Koussevitzky decided to use no orchestral transcriptions, however masterly and Bach-like were some of those available. Throughout the festival Bach will speak for himself alone. . . . Hence the Brandenburg Concertos, the orchestral Suites, the Concertos for piano or violins. The Brandenburg Concertos, Two and Five, were chosen in part for the solo-measures they contain, to be distributed among the virtuosi of the orchestra—violin, Mr. Burgin; flute, Mr. Laurent; oboe, Mr. Gillet; trumpet, Mr. Mager. . . . The Bach Cantata Club and Mr. Woodworth, its conductor, have these two years made the Church Cantatas their field. . . . After long search on the part of the trustees of the orchestra, no one seemed so fit to recall Mr. Higginson, as Professor Perry, his friend and biographer.

For bookings: (1) The concerts of Friday afternoon, March 27, and Saturday evening, March 28, are regular Symphony Concerts. They are not included in tickets for the festival, and only such seats will be available as subscribers to the Symphony Concerts may turn into the box-office. . . . (2) Subscribers to the festival may choose between the Tuesday and the Sunday performance of the Mass in B minor, but their tickets will admit them to only one. (3) The prices of tickets for the whole festival, with the exceptions just noted, are $5; $7.50; $10 and $12. The subscription board at Symphony Hall will be ready for the choosing of locations and the filing of subscription blanks from tomorrow, Saturday, Feb. 14. Payment must be made and tickets will be delivered at the box-office through Saturday, Feb. 28. Mail orders for the festival as a whole may be sent to Symphony Hall under the same terms.

REDUCTION

RATIO

17x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

A CITY UNDER ONE ROOF

A few desirable shops and offices now available

LITTLE Building

Boylston at Tremont St.

BOSTON

Collector Speaking

Continued from Preceding Page

that he might save up enough nickels—and the thing was played by a brass band at that! And how he used to gather up catalogues of all the companies, and devour them with his meals and memorize the golden marvels they heralded to his inflamed envy. And many a one can tell you of hungry dreams in which figured endless lists of Titta Ruffo, Amato, Journet, Kreisler, Bonci and Pol Plancon. And how in the old days he used feverishly to scan every announcement, hoping for a bit of Bach or something from "The Messiah." His outward seeming may be that of a perfectly rational citizen, a booster or solid professional man, but in his brain dance visions of glutted shelves, gleaming black disks, huge shipments of new albums from France and England. He needs neither opium nor the poet's soul to fill his waking hours with fantasy and passion.

The philistine world is sadly unaware of the terrific grip this madness takes on its victims. Once a man becomes bitten with the frenzy, there is no cure for it but in more and better records. Meeting one of his fellows—for their number is not yet legion—is for him a red-letter experience to be treasured. Then the talk runs to heated argument anent the merits or failings of the new Pastoral Symphony, loud boasting of owning a Brahms quartet that the other has strangely overlooked, exchange of rumors concerning certain works already recorded at Camden or London and not yet published to the world, serious gossip of the studios, and mutual advice how best to catalogue the mounting pile of disks now littering parlor, bedroom and bath.

In this country, notwithstanding our pretensions to culture and the somewhat mildly ludicrous attempts to create Ernest Newmans out of future movie patrons and jazz hounds, the gramophile is still lonesome enough to feel self-conscious and even a trifle absurd. In England and on the Continent, where the cult of the disk has won to comparative dignity, the phonograph is regarded as serious business, and its devotee harbors none of the misgivings that still beset the American native. He need not encounter the smirks of low-brows or the superior scorn of intelligentsia. To him the art of making records is fully as noble, as humanly essential, as the printing of books. Over here one must explain and apologize, for the term "canned" music is still abroad in the land.

Yet nothing can be more silly to the man with a taste and the necessary means and leisure to indulge it. He can have the world's delights as the whim of the moment dictates—and by a mere glance at his shelves. While at unbuttoned ease he smokes a fat after-breakfast cigar, there are Bach and Haydn and Schubert to glorify the clear morning, or a Mozart quartet, essence of youth, vigor and good cheer. Close by his shoulder stands a rack of miniature scores, and one of these he may con as the disks spin out their melodies for him. Nothing breaks the link between himself and the music, no scraping or creaking, no sight of perspiring flautist or gawky bull-fiddler. It is music undefiled; even the needle-rasp, bugaboo of older days, having gone the way of rumbling motors and wobbly, grating records. It is the true fashion in which melody should be enjoyed, informally, carelessly, with at most a friend or two by one's side.

But it's when he reaches home late at night from dusty and irritating contacts that he tastes to the depths the boon of his despised instrument. For in those quiet hours he will hear melodies the like of which was never heard on land or sea, and perhaps never will be heard—the collected quartets of Ludwig von Beethoven, sceptred emperor of Cecilia's realm. Puffing at his last pipeful he vouchsafes himself a lordly smile at all human frailty and cant, at all uncandors and vanities. Sitting by his side the master of Bonn would chuckle too, while there in the corner before him the Capets or Leners are discoursing the loveliest utterance of his life—the peerless, the unapproachable Op. 131 in C sharp Minor.

GARRY JOEL AUGUER

[Reprinted from The Musical Quarterly]

Here You Will Find

A complete stock of the OLIVER DITSON CO.'S publications and all Popular, Standard, and Classic Music

Charge accounts opened for your convenience

SPECIAL ATTENTION TO MAIL ORDERS

BOSTON MUSIC CO.

116 Boylston St.

NEAR TREMONT

Telephone HANcock 1561

The largest retail music store in New England

Symphony Concert --- Films --- Plays

For Loeffler, For Honegger, The Garlands

TRANS. FEB 14

The Parisian's New Symphony, The Bostonian Honored And Epitomized

TO a certainty, Honegger completed no half-finished manuscript; clapped upon the fly-leaf a dedication to the Boston Symphony Orchestra; so fulfilled a commission for its jubilee. Nor, having received the invitation, did he search his soul and cudgel his brains to write the desired piece of music. Whether his "Symphony for Orchestra"—played at the Symphony Concert yesterday for the first time anywhere—attracted or repelled the hearer, there was no doubting it as work of a composer possessed by what he would say; striking out, white-hot, the means to the saying. For Honegger—the chroniclers agree—composition is a rapid, absorbing process. He wrote, for example, the whole music to "King David" in an incredibly brief time. By the dates on the score the new Symphony occupied him through six months, for him a long incubation. To hear it, however, is to believe that he sketched it in a passion of creation; amplified, revised and rounded it with no chill upon the earlier heats. Never once does progress falter or texture sag. Like or dislike it, his Symphony is a design accomplished, a state of spirit expressed.

Honegger, now entering the prime of the forties, writes out of full mind, large resource, busy experience. His range of musical knowledge extends from Bach to the newest prodigy of Paris. Some who have scrutinized this first Symphony say they find in the score traces (as chemists call them) of this, that and the other composer. Likely enough; for to discover such, even of Monsieur Massenet, was a favorite process when "King David" was new. Hearing is another matter. Whatever Honegger may have assimilated into the new Symphony comes forth unmistakably stamped by his mind and hand. Throughout it is the full voice of a full man.

By the same token Honegger writes with every desired resource at command. Whatever he wills, that he may put to music-paper; for the most part send sounding from his orchestra. As it seemed yesterday, the unfolding Symphony was filled to the brim. One detail after another, of substance, facture, expression, pricked the ear only to be thrust away by the next. The listener heard, exhilarated and enriched. Two or three repetitions would not exhaust the surprises of this music. (It is to be hoped that in the remaining third of the season Dr. Koussevitzky will find room for one.)

Long since Honegger was fertile in the development of his musical ideas. In the 'Symphony for Orchestra," he sets forth the leading motivs unescapably. They are stripped, clarified, reiterated. From them he develops secondary motivs; weaves this development into a many-stranded web of counterpoint—linear counterpoint in the modernist sense of the words. (An applauding minority bore witness to ears already accustomed.) Once and again these lines are so many and close that ear and mind may hardly carry and differentiate them. Then, as with Strauss in kindred abundance, comes a moment of paper-music, written rather than heard.

Honegger writes atonally, not because atonality is the newest musical discovery or the current musical fashion—for it has ceased to be either—but because it is the idiom in which he best expresses himself. His is an honest, spontaneous atonality. So written, this keyless Symphony teems with dissonance, shrill and piercing, harsh and deep, unmitigated, driven home. All ears, unless they are deliberately closed to the voice of modernist music, are now well schooled to these barrages. (The intent listening of yesterday was the proof.) In the Symphony, as usual with Honegger, it is unforced and unflaunted dissonance—the natural turn, the particular emphasis, of the musical moment. But, admittedly, it is uncommonly acrid and astringent. Similarly with his instrumental voices as such. Often they are harsh, acidulous. They protrude, bear down, shout, hammer. Or, if they sing, the melodies turn bitter on their lips. Honegger is frank, honest, urgent composer. Having chosen his ways and means, he does not spare them upon an audience. He plies them—as the American vernacular puts it—"until they hurt." When his "Horace Victorieux" was played at Symphony Hall, some found him—to quote their very words—"the most repulsive of modernists." They will now count the "Symphony for Orchestra" as companion-piece.

Nevertheless, the Honegger of the first movement is unmistakably a composer of power. The contours are bold. Even in the songful measures they are little softened. The rhythms beat sharp or hard. The march of the linear counterpoint is inexorable. Progressions grind against each other, wrenching themselves free. The strings sound oftenest from the upper registers. The brass affirms its twentieth-century right to mutter or to shrill. The more melodic measures little alter the pervading semblance. Yet the design is spacious and ascendant; the tonal texture glows. In sum a music struck off at white heat, on many a page lustrous and incandescent; a music instinct with what this present hails as power.

With all his honest modernisms, Honegger has the eclectic temperament. Contrary to much current practice, his slow movement is as chromatic as though it were written in the Wagnerian heyday. It is also music of melody—not as the eighteenth-century "classics" or the nineteenth-century "romantics" invented and fashioned it. Instead, modernist melody, short-breathed, hard-edged, thin-clothed, sharp-voiced, unfolding in long line rather than vivid color, clear-cut as in a chamber-piece; none the less ardent and intensive. Unsentimentalized yet alight with stark emotion, shunning luxuriance that surface and underbody may go bare and clear, such a slow movement, vitalized throughout, is Honegger's counterpart to the first movement of power.

The finale is a welter of exuberance. Motivs, principal or subsidiary, jostle motivs; figures whirl about in a demonic rondo. All is rhythm; all is flux and dart; high tension and sharp voice—until at last the principal motiv calls for order; sets the others in their contrapuntal place; bids the whole Symphony end calmed—or as some will say breathless. After his first exercise in modernist power and his second in modernist ardor, Honegger "tops off" with this fine frenzy of modernist tension. . . . Here at last is a Symphony that, without a program, a foreword or any other verbal gloss, expresses in itself and of itself not a little of this immediate time; that deserved the week of rehearsals spent upon it; the understanding, sympathy, force and fullness with which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra proclaimed it. Once more, the Boston Orchestra, and he as conductor, are the spokesmen par excellence for the music of this immediate day.

Once more a considerable part of the audience heard and rewarded. Jubilee commissions that have added this Symphony of Honegger to Stravinsky's "Psalms," and both to Roussel's Symphony with which the series began, were not bestowed in vain.

The second half of the concert marked as nearly as might be the seventieth birthday of Charles Martin Loeffler who, as violinist and composer, has made Boston these forty years his workplace and his dwelling. The Symphony Orchestra had reason to honor the violinist who out of its ranks has become a distinguished composer in his time; who has handed it many a manuscript; who is witness to a fine, true and vital musical culture existent in Boston and in other concert-capitals of these United States. To end the afternoon came a truly domestic scene. At the call of Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Loeffler descended to the stage from his seat in the balcony; was hailed with united and hearty applause by the waiting audience; while the orchestra rose to salute him, adding its plaudits, and the conductor, as unobtrusively as might be, joined in the general homage. No one was lacking except Mme. Frijsh who had sung the singer's part in Mr. Loeffler's setting of St. Francis's "Canticle of the Sun." But from her place on the platform, by a gesture, she had already passed on to the composer her well-earned applause. Here in America, she is essential to the Hymn. From the outset it has known no other voice. Still she rpens in it

The "Canticle," and "Pagan Poem" which followed, were discerningly chosen to exemplify the symphonic Loeffler. Unless the Symphony ("Hora Mystica") which he still reserves for seemingly endless revision, shall ultimately excel it, this hymn of the holy and fraternal Francis is his most completely accomplished and most characteristic work. Heard anew yesterday, this music knows neither place nor period. It is self-contained, self-sufficient, timeless, living its own life. Out of the crucible of imagination, it is expression not only of Francis's verse but of Francis's spirit. It suffuses the Hymn, yet marks each detail as it mounts. It is no less expression of the devout, the mystical, the truly spiritual Loeffler—the sacred poet, as the old phrase ran—who may speak of these things only in tones; and speaking, lift up also the hearts of those that hear.

Over against the Canticle went "Pagan Poem" to embody the romantic, the dramatizing, the exorcising Loeffler, conjuring out of Vergil's ancient world the sorceress-girl, forsaken of her lover, spelling him back. The trumpets sound her refrain; the piano rhythms her magic; the whole orchestra speaks out her grief, longing, suspense, rejoicing. The very dog barks in the doorway. For Loeffler the spiritualizing, read Loeffler, the humanizing, tone-poet. Find in both the mating master of means to ends. "Pagan Poem" was first written a quarter of a century ago. Here and there it does not escape birthmarks. The technician, the stylist and the poet, audible in Mr. Loeffler from first piece to last, quickly efface them. . . . In Canticle and Poem the orchestra played as for a fête.

There was also a prelude to this full-freighted afternoon—a Suite for Piano and strings by young Maestro Mario Pilati of Naples and Cagliari, which is in Sardinia. It would pour a mild new wine of modernism into the old bottles of Prelude, Saraband, Minuet, Finale Burlesca. By no means did it crack them. Mr. Sanromá played expertly and sympathetically upon a percussive piano; the accompanying strings—for they were no more—did amiably what Pilati bade. Throughout, he forgot that an insistent avoidance of every cliché becomes as tedious as trite repetition. One expected cadence would have been tonic.

H. T. P.

Repairing an Error of Time

Charles Spencer Chaplin

As John Becker Believes El Greco Might Have Painted Him

Lonsdale Lightly, Colman to Match

With "The Devil to Pay" to Set Them Both Forth To Advantage

OUT of the eternal fitness of things arise such combinations as Ronald Colman in a Frederick Lonsdale play. "The Devil To Pay," now at the State Theater, is a film of just about solid delight for those who like Colman in anything, or anybody in English comedy. There is no sickly charm in his acting, no elaborate causualness. He is light, dashing, deft, and he seems as winning among the menfolk as he is with the swooning young ladies.

His casting in this piece, the merest trifle in substance, is one of the most fortuitous things that have happened, to him or to us. He swings no fists, outwits no crooks, wears no especially stunning clothes. He has only to toy with some charming people and some excellent lines in a two-day romance. Wit in the writing, if not brilliance, makes his task a grateful one. Those chosen to make the play with him were happily selected. There are on third and fourth thought, some illogicalities, but they are easily forgiven.

He is sort of the dark gray sheep of his family and comes home from Kenya Colony a bankrupt save for twenty pounds. He immediately spends fifteen on a wire-haired terrier that wags his tail from a shop window. His luggage arrives in Grosvenor square but he is not seen or heard from until the next morning. When he does show up, he says ruefully he has been in Liverpool where he missed his boat train. "Liverpool" is actually a charming young lady actress, his playmate. Once home and the interview with the grumbling, swearing, affectionate father over, he is off to the Derby with his sister and Miss Hope, whom he had that morning met for the first time. It is a picnic, on the coster side of the grounds; and the young people return to the city quite charmed with one another. The stranger is that evening announcing her engagement to a grand duke, and it is not hard to imagine that it is not going to come off. Just so. A little tiff is enough excuse for her to give back the ring, and then to find a lot of time for sport with Willie. But her father does not lose a grand duke gracefully and sets out to drop this young fortune-hunter in the Thames. He succeeds all right with the unconscious and very stupid connivance of his daughter. He wants to say a goodby to his old love and she petulantly denies him permission. By luck he does it, anyway, and father trots out the proof of his worthlessness. Willie's blithe acceptance of her jilt has the desired effect and soon she comes creeping to him.

George Fitzmaurice directed this and he engaged Lady Maureen Stanley and Lieutenant Colonel Something Something as technical advisers. He enlisted Frederick Kerr as the father, David Torrence as the menace, Loretta Young as the young lady, and some charmingly inconsequential people for the others. The result is every bit desirable and no amount of carping would make it less so. It makes the entrance into movie dialogue of the word "sycophantic." Mr. Colman uses it every bit as if he had encountered it before.

C. B. P.

BULLS

Ladysmith, Wis.—Assemblyman J. W. Carow has been asked by a delegation of Rusk county dairymen to introduce a bill in the Legislature the coming session to exempt pure bred bulls used as herd sires from taxation to encourage the use of blooded bulls in place of scrubs. [Milwaukee Journal

From France a New Fashion for Films

As "Sous les Toits de Paris" Attacks Ingeniously the Talkie Problem

THOUGH they may not have been aware of it—for they probably were more interested in the spontaneous good nature and the typically French gayety that bubbled on the surface—the invited audience that gathered at the Fine Arts Theater last evening for the first showing of René Clair's "Sous les Toits de Paris" were looking upon a method of treatment of the talkies that is more likely to be the accepted pattern for the future than the type of picture now in favor in Hollywood.

The problem that M. Clair has attacked is an important one. When the screen received the gift of tongues it found it had acquired a dubious benefit. Its audience which had been world-wide became limited to those who could understand the language. The first expedient that came to mind as a solution was the unsatisfactory one of inserting sub-titles for the spoken word in exportations to foreign-speaking countries. Hardly more successful was the laborious and expensive system of retaking a film in foreign dialogue. The difficulties and awkwardness of translation were apparent in one of the few of such efforts to reach Boston, "The Blue Angel."

M. Clair has tried a more fundamentally cinematic method of approach. He has kept his dialogue at a minimum; has told his story in terms of pantomime and action. Sounds have been inserted, cleverly cut and interpolated bits of music have been introduced, to please the ear or to heighten effect. It has been done so that without knowledge of the language, the film is easily understandable. Something of a trend in the same direction—more of visual narration and less of dialogue—has already been noted in Hollywood. But "Sous les Toits de Paris" carries the idea to a logical conclusion. To M. Clair must go the credit for creating the first genuinely international talkie.

That is not to say that it is a perfect piece of work. On the contrary it has a familiar and fairly simple type of story—something of romance, a bit of crime, some gangsters (or the Parisian equivalent for them), catchy but rather obvious music. It is somewhat longer than it should be (your Continental likes entertainment in bulk); sometimes it seems that the songs are repeated more than is advisable. But such defects should not conceal either the importance of the method of treatment or the intrinsic merit of the film itself. For Mr. Clair has a delicious sense of humor. He touches up his characterizations with sly bits of business, finds fun in humorous juxtapositions—the various types for instance that are humming one of the two songs that run through the film, the stout woman combing her hair, the discouraged fellow soaking his feet in a basin of hot water, the irritable gentleman who tries to shut his ears to it but canont. Beyond that there is observable a latin delight in noisy quarrels with first one and then another entering into the gesticulating argument; an equally Gallic gusto in bedroom scenes which though they may hardly be in keeping with Anglo-Saxon notions of propriety are nevertheless amusing.

It is not the Paris to which the screen is accustomed that Mr. Clair sets forth. His is the genuine article, with its gray houses, peaked roofs, chimney pots, its narrow streets, its couples talking interminably in doorways, its cheap cafes and dance halls, the crowds of the curious that can so easily be gathered. His camera takes it all in. It travels restlessly from gable to pavement, peers in at windows, glances down or up in angle shots. With the camera the sound keeps pace, now swelling, now diminishing, occasionally bringing to the ear noises of which the eye does not catch the origin. His actors, though they are of less importance than the director, are intelligent and capable.

Lastly a word of the theater. It has been redecorated in cheerful colors in a modernistic scheme of design. It has been equipped with new sound reproducing apparatus. It provides an attractive place for the showing of films of interest and importance but of more limited appeal than those on which the larger movie house are forced to rely for box office patronage.

E. F. M.

Concert-Crier

Next Week

Orchestral—Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, sixteenth pair of Symphony Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzy conductor; assisting chorus from The Cecilia (Handel's Concerto Grosso for Strings, Op. 6, No. 9. Stravinsky s "Psalms-Symphony;" Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony). . . . Monday evening in Symphony Hall, fourth supplementary concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; assisting pianist J. M. Sanromá (Elgar's introduction and Allegro for Strings; Stravinsky's Caprice for Piano and Orchestra; Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica"). . . . Monday evening in Alumnæ Hall at Wellesley (8 P. M.), concert by the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, Nicolai Sokolov conductor (Brahms's First Symphony; Prelude to "Khovantschina"; Dohnányi's "Ruralia Ungarica"). . . . Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; assisting pianist J. M. Sanromá (Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings; Stravinsky's Caprice for Piano and Orchestra; Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony). . . . Saturday morning in Jordan Hall, third concert for children with Ernest Schelling as guide, counsellor and friend. An assisting orchestra from Symphony Hall ("Wagner Program" from "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Die Meistersinger," "Die Walküre," "Gotterdämmerung").

In Ensemble—Sunday afternoon in the Art Club, fourth chamber-concert of the Flute-Players, with a string quartet and five virtuosi of wind instruments from Symphony Hall; pianist, J. M. Sanromá (Quartet for winds by Rossini; quartet for strings by Verdi; Bliss's quintet for oboe and strings; Piston's Sonata for flute and piano). . . . Sunday evening at the Repertory Theater, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison playing pieces for two pianos from a diversified repertory, taking leave of Boston as a pair (Numbers from Bach, Mozart, Chopin, Saint-Saëns, Casella, Bax).

Eminences—Sunday afternoon in the Repertory Theater, concert by Povla Frijsh, mistress of imaginative and expressive song (Numbers from Peri, Franz, Chausson, Chabrier, Arensky, Musorgsky, Grieg). . . . Wednesday morning at Hotel Statler, concert of operatic airs, songs and miscellaneous pieces, sung in a Morning Musicale by Maria Jeritza of the Metropolitan Opera House (Airs from Massenet's "Cid" and Giordano's "Andrea Chénier." French, German, American songs).

Singer—Tuesday evening in Jordan Hall, concert of airs and songs sung by Marion Kingsbury, soprano; assisting artists, Pauline Danforth, pianist, and Georges Laurent, violinist (Airs from Mozart, Bach and Donizetti's "Torquato Tasso"; songs to Persian poetry, pianopieces from Scarlatti and Debussy).

Further On

Week of Feb. 22—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall, concert of operatic pieces and songs sung by Florence Austral, of full voice and large style (Airs from "Fidelio" and "Aida," numbers from Marx, Strauss, Liszt, Hughes). . . . Sunday afternoon, Jordan Hall; seventh concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, Thompson Stone conductor. . . . Sunday evening, Public Library; concert of solo and ensemble numbers for flute, harp and viola di gamba, played by Messrs. Laurent, H. Zighera, A. Zighera, of the Symphony Orchestra as a Trio Instrumentale de Paris. Open to the public. . . . Tuesday afternoon, Symphony Hall; fourth supplementary matinée by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. . . . Tuesday evening, Jordan Hall; concert of old airs, German lieder and Negro Spirituals, sung by Edward Matthews, baritone (Three airs from seventeenth and eighteenth-century Italians; four songs of Brahms; four Spirituals). . . . Wednesday evening, Jordan Hall; concert of pianopieces played by Rudolph Ganz, rare visitor to Boston (Twelve Preludes of Debussy; Chopin's Sonata in B minor; numbers from Bach, Haydn, Liszt). . . . Wednesday evening, Brown Hall; concert of sonatas for violoncello and piano, played by Joseph Malkin and Jesus María Sanromá (Beethoven in A major; Converse; Brahms in F major, Op. 99). . . . Wednesday evening, Steinert Hall; concert of operatic airs and songs, sung by Carmen Reggio, contralto (Numbers from Handel, Verdi, Donizetti, Bizet, Thomas; Italian miscellany). . . . Thursday evening, Symphony Hall; concert of Russian airs and songs, French and Italian pieces, sung by Maxim Karolik, dramatic tenor (Numbers from Rimsky-Korsakov, Musorgsky, Balakirev, Dargomizhsky; Casella's "Thirteenth-Century Songs"; novel items from Pizzetti and Chausson). . . . Thursday evening, Jordan Hall; concert divided between Clarence Knudson, violinist and Maude Erickson, soprano, assisted by an orchestra of thirty-five from Symphony Hall; conductor Arthur Fiedler (Ballet-Suite and Violin-Concerto from Chaikovsky; miscellany for Violin; operatic airs and songs). . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; seventeenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. . . . Friday evening, Jordan Hall; concert of trios for piano, violin and violoncello, played by Manfred, Jacques and Joseph Malkin (Chaikovsky, Brahms, Smetana). . . . Saturday morning in the Repertory Theater, concert of folk-songs for children sung in costume by Dorothy Gordon. . . . Saturday afternoon, Jordan Hall; concert of airs and songs sung by Gertrude Ehrhart, accomplished and adventurous singer (Airs from Mozart's "Figaro" and Massenet's "Chérubin"; German lieder; Parisian pieces; English numbers from Bax, Goossens, Walton).

Week of March 1—Wednesday morning, Hotel Statler; last concert in the current series of Morning Musicales with Lauri-Volpi, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House, making a first appearance in Boston. . . . Wednesday evening, Jordan Hall; concert of airs and songs sung by Gertrude Wieder, contralto, newcomer to Boston. . . . Thursday evening, Symphony Hall; concert of pianopieces played by the high-spirited, warm-toned Percy Grainger, infrequent visitor to Boston. New pieces of his own included. . . . Thursday evening in Paine Hall at Cambridge; concert by the student orchestra of Harvard University, Wallace Woodworth conductor; assisting violinist Malcolm Holmes; assisting at the harpsichord Ralph Kirkpatrick (Concertos of Bach and Corelli; Hindemith).

Week of March 8—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; concert of violin-pieces played by Albert Spalding in the prime of his powers as virtuoso and musician. A sensitive mind guides a sensitive hand. . . . Sunday afternoon, Jordan Hall; eighth concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, Thompson Stone conductor. . . . Tuesday afternoon, Symphony Hall; fifth supplementary matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. . . . Tuesday evening, Symphony Hall; concert of Negro and other pieces sung by the choir of the Hampton Institute, Nathanael Dett conductor and composer. . . . Wednesday evening, Brown Hall; concert of sonatas for violin and piano, played by Harrison Keller and J. M. Sanromá (Beethoven in C minor, Op. 30, No. 2; Debussy, Fauré in A major). . . . Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, eighteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. . . . Saturday morning, Jordan Hall; last of the concerts for children with Ernest Schelling as guide, counsellor and friend. An orchestra from Symphony Hall.

PLAN PRIVATE FOREST

Plans are being started for the growing of 160 acres of forest crops in Marathon county by Alva and E. B. Eighmy, Madison, Wis., who have petitioned the State conservation commission to enter the land under the forest crop program. The land is in the town of Hewitt. A hearing on the matter is to be held here Jan. 14 by the commission. [Milwaukee Journal

"HAVE ANOTHER BURNED BISCUIT"

You would never think of offering improperly cooked food to your guests . . . Are you equally fastidious about coffee?

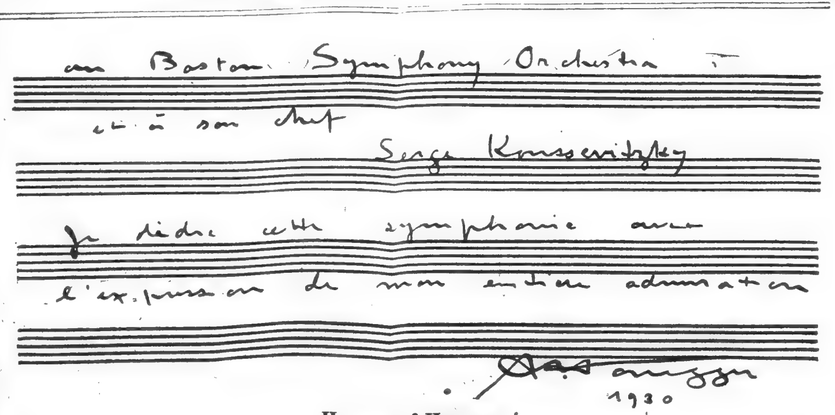
Coffee sets the tone for the whole dinner. Good coffee accents the flavor of your favorite dishes. But not even the most careful cooking can survive poor coffee. It has ruined many a dinner that was otherwise irreproachable.

Why risk offending the good taste of your guests when it is so easy to make sure of their approval? Serve La Touraine, the fragrant, satisfying blend. Your guests expect it.

BE PROUD OF YOUR COFFEE

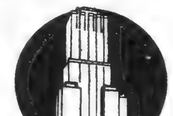
SERVE

La Touraine



Homage of Honegger

Dedication from the Manuscript of His New Symphony



Home of the famous swimming pool

The SHELTON

at 49TH and Lexington NEW YORK

Has all the comforts of a private club. The most enjoyable hotel atmosphere in New York.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Symphony Concert --- Films --- Plays

A CITY UNDER ONE ROOF

A few desirable shops and offices now available

LITTLE Building

Boylston at Tremont St.

BOSTON

Collector Speaking

Continued from Preceding Page

that he might save up enough nickels—and the thing was played by a brass band at that! And how he used to gather up catalogues of all the companies, and devour them with his meals and memorize the golden marvels they heralded to his inflamed envy. And many a one can tell you of hungry dreams in which figured endless lists of Titta Ruffo, Amato, Journet, Kreisler, Bonci and Pol Plancon. And how in the old days he used feverishly to scan every announcement, hoping for a bit of Bach or something from "The Messiah." His outward seeming may be that of a perfectly rational citizen, a booster or solid professional man, but in his brain dance visions of glutted shelves, gleaming black disks, huge shipments of new albums from France and England. He needs neither opium nor the poet's soul to fill his waking hours with fantasy and passion.

The philistine world is sadly unaware of the terrific grip this madness takes on its victims. Once a man becomes bitten with the frenzy, there is no cure for it but in more and better records. Meeting one of his fellows—for their number is not yet legion—is for him a red-letter experience to be treasured. Then the talk runs to heated argument anent the merits or failings of the new Pastoral Symphony, loud boasting of owning a Brahms quartet that the other has strangely overlooked, exchange of rumors concerning certain works already recorded at Camden or London and not yet published to the world, serious gossip of the studios, and mutual advice how best to catalogue the mounting pile of disks now littering parlor, bedroom and bath.

In this country, notwithstanding our pretensions to culture and the somewhat midly ludicrous attempts to create Ernest Newmans out of future movie patrons and jazz hounds, the gramophile is still lonesome enough to feel self-conscious and even a trifle absurd. In England and on the Continent, where the cult of the disk has won to comparative dignity, the phonograph is regarded as serious business, and its devotee harbors none of the misgivings that still beset the American native. He need not encounter the smirks of low-brows or the superior scorn of intelligentsia. To him the art of making records is fully as noble, as humanly essential, as the printing of books. Over here one must explain and apologize, for the term "canned" music is still abroad in the land.

Yet nothing can be more silly to the man with a taste and the necessary means and leisure to indulge it. He can have the world's delights as the whim of the moment dictates—and by a mere glance at his shelves. While at unbuttoned ease he smokes a fat after-breakfast cigar, there are Bach and Haydn and Schubert to glorify the clear morning, or a Mozart quartet, essence of youth, vigor and good cheer. Close by his shoulder stands a rack of miniature scores, and one of these he may con as the disks spin out their melodies for him. Nothing breaks the link between himself and the music, no scraping or creaking, no sight of perspiring flautist or gawky bull-fiddler. It is music undefiled; even the needle-rasp, bugaboo of older days, having gone the way of rumbling motors and wobbly, grating records. It is the true fashion in which melody should be enjoyed, informally, carelessly, with at most a friend or two by one's side.

But it's when he reaches home late at night from dusty and irritating contacts that he tastes to the depths the boon of his despised instrument. For in those quiet hours he will hear melodies the like of which was never heard on land or sea, and perhaps never will be heard—the collected quartets of Ludwig von Beethoven, sceptred emperor of Cecilia's realm. Puffing at his last pipeful he vouchsafes himself a lordly smile at all human frailty and cant, at all uncandors and vanities. Sitting by his side the master of Bonn would chuckle too, while there in the corner before him the Capets or Leners are discoursing the loveliest utterance of his life—the peerless, the unapproachable Op. 131 in C sharp Minor.

GARRY JOEL AUGUST

[Reprinted from The Musical Quarterly]

Here You Will Find

A complete stock of the OLIVER DITSON CO.'S publications and all Popular, Standard, and Classic Music

Charge accounts opened for your convenience

SPECIAL ATTENTION TO MAIL ORDERS

BOSTON MUSIC CO.

116 Boylston St.

NEAR TREMONT

Telephone HANcock 1561

The largest retail music store in New England

For Loeffler, For Honegger, The Garlands

TRANS. FEB 14

The Parisian's New Symphony, The Bostonian Honored And Epitomized

TO a certainty, Honegger completed no half-finished manuscript; clapped upon the fly-leaf a dedication to the Boston Symphony Orchestra; so fulfilled a commission for its jubilee. Nor, having received the invitation, did he search his soul and cudgel his brains to write the desired piece of music. Whether his "Symphony for Orchestra"—played at the Symphony Concert yesterday for the first time anywhere—attracted or repelled the hearer, there was no doubting it as work of a composer possessed by what he would say; striking out, white-hot, the means to the saying. For Honegger—the chroniclers agree—composition is a rapid, absorbing process. He wrote, for example, the whole music to "King David" in an incredibly brief time. By the dates on the score the new Symphony occupied him through six months, for him a long incubation. To hear it, however, is to believe that he sketched it in a passion of creation; amplified, revised and rounded it with no chill upon the earlier heats. Never once does progress falter or texture sag. Like or dislike it, his Symphony is a design accomplished, a state of spirit expressed.

Honegger, now entering the prime of the forties, writes out of full mind, large resource, busy experience. His range of musical knowledge extends from Bach to the newest prodigy of Paris. Some who have scrutinized this first Symphony say they find in the score traces (as chemists call them) of this, that and the other composer. Likely enough; for to discover such, even of Monsieur Massenet, was a favorite process when "King David" was new. Hearing is another matter. Whatever Honegger may have assimilated into the new Symphony comes forth unmistakably stamped by his mind and hand. Throughout it is the full voice of a full man.

By the same token Honegger writes with every desired resource at command. Whatever he wills, that he may put to music-paper; for the most part send sounding from his orchestra. As it seemed yesterday, the unfolding Symphony was filled to the brim. One detail after another, of substance, facture, expression, pricked the ear only to be thrust away by the next. The listener heard, exhilarated and enriched. Two or three repetitions would not exhaust the surprises of this music. (It is to be hoped that in the remaining third of the season Dr. Koussevitzky will find room for one.)

Long since Honegger was fertile in the development of his musical ideas. In the 'Symphony for Orchestra," he sets forth the leading motivs unescapably. They are stripped, clarified, reiterated. From them he develops secondary motivs; weaves this development into a many-stranded web of counterpoint—linear counterpoint in the modernist sense of the words. (An applauding minority bore witness to ears already accustomed.) Once and again these lines are so many and close that ear and mind may hardly carry and differentiate them. Then, as with Strauss in kindred abundance, comes a moment of paper-music, written rather than heard.

Honegger writes atonally, not because atonality is the newest musical discovery or the current musical fashion—for it has ceased to be either—but because it is the idiom in which he best expresses himself. His is an honest, spontaneous atonality. So written, this keyless Symphony teems with dissonance, shrill and piercing, harsh and deep, unmitigated, driven home. All ears, unless they are deliberately closed to the voice of modernist music, are now well schooled to these barrages. (The intent listening of yesterday was the proof.) In the Symphony, as usual with Honegger, it is unforced and unflaunted dissonance—the natural turn, the particular emphasis, of the musical moment. But, admittedly, it is uncommonly acrid and astringent. Similarly with his instrumental voices as such. Often they are harsh, acidulous. They protrude, bear down, shout, hammer. Or, if they sing, the melodies turn bitter on their lips. Honegger is frank, honest, urgent composer. Having chosen his ways and means, he does not spare them upon an audience. He plies them—as the American vernacular puts it—"until they hurt." When his "Horace Victorieux" was played at Symphony Hall, some found him—to quote their very words—"the most repulsive of modernists." They will now count the "Symphony for Orchestra" as companion-piece.

Nevertheless, the Honegger of the first movement is unmistakably a composer of power. The contours are bold. Even in the songful measures they are little softened. The rhythms beat sharp or hard. The march of the linear counterpoint is inexorable. Progressions grind against each other, wrenching themselves free. The strings sound oftenest from the upper registers. The brass affirms its twentieth-century right to mutter or to shrill. The more melodic measures little alter the pervading semblance. Yet the design is spacious and ascendant; the tonal texture glows. In sum a music struck off at white heat, on many a page lustrous and incandescent; a music instinct with what this present hails as power.

With all his honest modernisms, Honegger has the eclectic temperament. Contrary to much current practice, his slow movement is as chromatic as though it were written in the Wagnerian heyday. It is also music of melody—not as the eighteenth-century "classics" or the nineteenth-century "romantics" invented and fashioned it. Instead, modernist melody, short-breathed, hard-edged, thin-clothed, sharp-voiced, unfolding in long line rather than vivid color, clear-cut as in a chamber-piece; none the less ardent and intensive. Unsentimentalized yet alight with stark emotion, shunning luxuriance that surface and underbody may go bare and clear, such a slow movement, vitalized throughout, is Honegger's counterpart to the first movement of power.

The finale is a welter of exuberance. Motivs, principal or subsidiary, jostle motivs; figures whirl about in a demonic rondo. All is rhythm; all is flux and dart; high tension and sharp voice—until at last the principal motiv calls for order; sets the others in their contrapuntal place; bids the whole Symphony end calmed—or as some will say breathless. After his first exercise in modernist power and his second in modernist ardor, Honegger "tops off" with this fine frenzy of modernist tension. . . . Here at last is a symphony that, without a program, a foreword or any other verbal gloss, expresses in itself and of itself not a little of this immediate time; that deserved the week of rehearsals spent upon it; the understanding, sympathy, force and fullness with which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra proclaimed it. Once more, the Boston Orchestra, and he as conductor, are the spokesmen par excellence for the music of this immediate day.

Once more a considerable part of the audience heard and rewarded. Jubilee commissions that have added this Symphony of Honegger to Stravinsky's "Psalms," and both to Roussel's Symphony with which the series began, were not bestowed in vain.

The second half of the concert marked as nearly as might be the seventieth birthday of Charles Martin Loeffler who, as violinist and composer, has made Boston these forty years his workplace and his dwelling. The Symphony Orchestra had reason to honor the violinist who out of its ranks has become a distinguished composer in his time; who has handed it many a manuscript; who is witness to a fine, true and vital musical culture existent in Boston and in other concert-capitals of these United States. To end the afternoon came a truly domestic scene. At the call of Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Loeffler descended to the stage from his seat in the balcony; was hailed with united and hearty applause by the waiting audience; while the orchestra rose to salute him, adding its plaudits, and the conductor, as unobtrusively as might be, joined in the general homage. No one was lacking except Mme. Frijsh who had sung the singer's part in Mr. Loeffler's setting of St. Francis's "Canticle of the Sun." But from her place on the platform, by a gesture, she had already passed on to the composer her well-earned applause. Here in America, she is essential to the Hymn. From the outset it has known no other voice. Still she ripens in it.

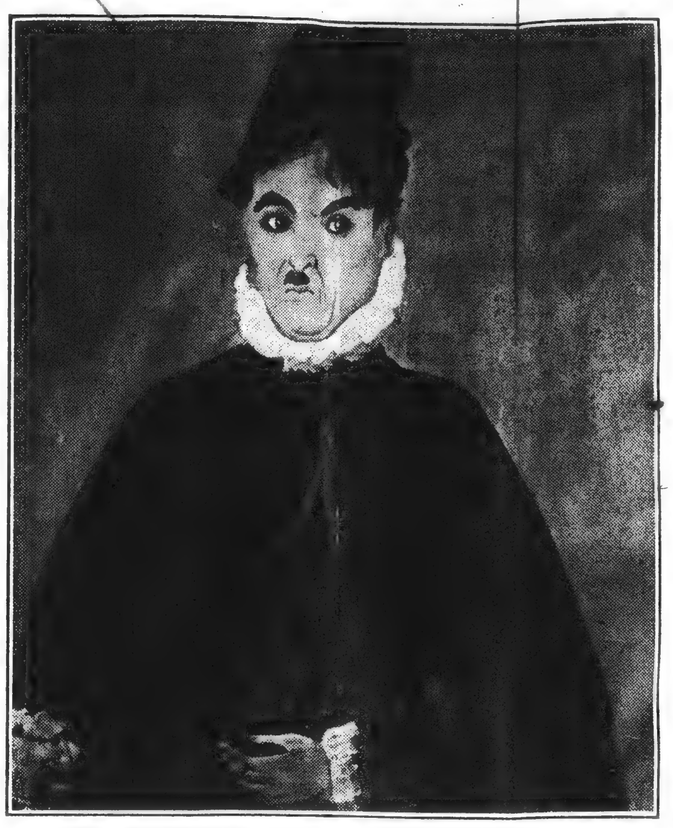
The "Canticle," and "Pagan Poem" which followed, were discerningly chosen to exemplify the symphonic Loeffler. Unless the Symphony ("Hora Mystica") which he still reserves for seemingly endless revision, shall ultimately excel it, this hymn of the holy and fraternal Francis is his most completely accomplished and most characteristic work. Heard anew yesterday, this music knows neither place nor period. It is self-contained, self-sufficient, timeless, living its own life. Out of the crucible of imagination, it is expression not only of Francis's verse but of Francis's spirit. It suffuses the Hymn, yet marks each detail as it mounts. It is no less expression of the devout, the mystical, the truly spiritual Loeffler—the sacred poet, as the old phrase ran—who may speak of these things only in tones; and speaking, lift up also the hearts of those that hear.

Over against the Canticle went "Pagan Poem" to embody the romantic, the dramatizing, the exorcising Loeffler, conjuring out of Vergil's ancient world the sorceress-girl, forsaken of her lover, spelling him back. The trumpets sound her refrain: the piano rhythms her magic; the whole orchestra speaks out her grief, longing, suspense, rejoicing. The very dog barks in the doorway. For Loeffler the spiritualizing, read Loeffler, the humanizing, tone-poet. Find in both the mating master of means to ends. "Pagan Poem" was first written a quarter of a century ago. Here and there it does not escape birthmarks. The technician, the stylist and the poet, audible in Mr. Loeffler from first piece to last, quickly efface them. . . . In Canticle and Poem the orchestra played as for a fête.

There was also a prelude to this full-freighted afternoon—a Suite for Piano and strings by young Maestro Mario Pilati of Naples and Cagliari, which is in Sardinia. It would pour a mild new wine of modernism into the old bottles of Prelude, Saraband, Minuet, Finale Burlesca. By no means did it crack them. Mr. Sanromá played expertly and sympathetically upon a percussive piano, the accompanying strings—for they were no more—did amiably what Pilati bade. Throughout, he forgot that an insistent avoidance of every cliché becomes as tedious as trite repetition. One expected cadence would have been tonic.

H. T. P.

Repairing an Error of Time



Charles Spencer Chaplin

As John Decker Believes El Greco Might Have Painted Him

Lonsdale Lightly, Colman to Match

With "The Devil to Pay" to Set Them Both Forth To Advantage

OUT of the eternal fitness of things arise such combinations as Ronald Colman in a Frederick Lonsdale play. "The Devil To Pay," now at the State Theater, is a film of just about solid delight for those who like Colman in anything, or anybody in English comedy. There is no sickly charm in his acting, no elaborate causualness. He is light, dashing, deft, and he seems as winning among the menfolk as he is with the swooning young ladies.

His casting in this piece, the merest trifle in substance, is one of the most fortuitous things that have happened, to him or to us. He swings no fists, outwits no crooks, wears no especially stunning clothes. He has only to toy with some charming people and some excellent lines in a two-day romance. Wit in the writing, if not brilliance, makes his task a grateful one. Those chosen to make the play with him were happily selected. There are on third and fourth thought, some illogicalities, but they are easily forgiven.

He is sort of the dark gray sheep of his family and comes home from Kenya Colony a bankrupt save for twenty pounds. He immediately spends fifteen on a wire-haired terrier that wags his tail from a shop window. His luggage arrives in Grosvenor square but he is not seen or heard from until the next morning. When he does show up, he says ruefully he has been in Liverpool where he missed his boat train. "Liverpool" is actually a charming young lady actress, his playmate. Once home and the interview with the grumbling, swearing, affectionate father over, he is off to the Derby with his sister and Miss Hope, whom he had that morning met for the first time. It is a picnic, on the coster side of the grounds; and the young people return to the city quite charmed with one another. The stranger is that evening announcing her engagement to a grand duke, and it is not hard to imagine that it is not going to come off. Just so. A little tiff is enough excuse for her to give back the ring, and then to find a lot of time for sport with Willie. But her father does not lose a grand duke gracefully and sets out to drop this young fortune-hunter in the Thames. He succeeds all right with the unconscious and very stupid connivance of his daughter. He wants to say a goodby to his old love and she petulantly denies him permission. By luck he does it, anyway, and father trots out the proof of his worthlessness. Willie's blithe acceptance of her jilt has the desired effect and soon she comes creeping to him.

George Fitzmaurice directed this and he engaged Lady Maureen Stanley and Lieutenant Colonel Something Something as technical advisers. He enlisted Frederick Kerr as the father, David Torrence as the menace, Loretta Young as the young lady, and some charmingly inconsequential people for the others. The result is every bit desirable and no amount of carping would make it less so. It makes the entrance into movie dialogue of the word "sycophantic." Mr. Colman uses it every bit as if he had encountered it before.

C. B. P.

BULLS

Ladysmith, Wis.—Assemblyman J. W. Carow has been asked by a delegation of Rusk county dairymen to introduce a bill in the Legislature the coming session to exempt pure bred bulls used as herd sires from taxation to encourage the use of blooded bulls in place of scrubs.

[Milwaukee Journa

From France a New Fashion for Films

As "Sous les Toits de Paris" Attacks Ingeniously the Talkie Problem

THOUGH they may not have been aware of it—for they probably were more interested in the spontaneous good nature and the typically French gayety that bubbled on the surface—the invited audience that gathered at the Fine Arts Theater last evening for the first showing of René Clair's "Sous les Toits de Paris" were looking upon a method of treatment of the talkies that is more likely to be the accepted pattern for the future than the type of picture now in favor in Hollywood.

The problem that M. Clair has attacked is an important one. When the screen received the gift of tongues it found it had acquired a dubious benefit. Its audience which had been world-wide became limited to those who could understand the language. The first expedient that came to mind as a solution was the unsatisfactory one of inserting sub-titles for the spoken word in exportations to foreign-speaking countries. Hardly more successful was the laborious and expensive system of retaking a film in foreign dialogue. The difficulties and awkwardness of translation were apparent in one of the few of such efforts to reach Boston, "The Blue Angel."

M. Clair has tried a more fundamentally cinematic method of approach. He has kept his dialogue at a minimum; has told his story in terms of pantomime and action. Sounds have been inserted, cleverly cut and interpolated bits of music have been introduced, to please the ear or to heighten effect. It has been done so that without knowledge of the language, the film is easily understandable. Something of a trend in the same direction—more of visual narration and less of dialogue—has already been noted in Hollywood. But "Sous les Toits de Paris" carries the idea to a logical conclusion. To M. Clair must go the credit for creating the first genuinely international talkie.

That is not to say that it is a perfect piece of work. On the contrary it has a familiar and fairly simple type of story—something of romance, a bit of crime, some gangsters (or the Parisian equivalent for them), catchy but rather obvious music. It is somewhat longer than it should be (your Continental likes entertainment in bulk); sometimes it seems that the songs are repeated more than is advisable. But such defects should not conceal either the importance of the method of treatment or the intrinsic merit of the film itself. For Mr. Clair has a delicious sense of humor. He touches up his characterizations with sly bits of business, finds fun in humorous juxtapositions—the various types for instance that are humming one of the two songs that run through the film, the stout woman combing her hair, the discouraged fellow soaking his feet in a basin of hot water, the irritable gentleman who tries to shut his ears to it but canont. Beyond that there is observable a Latin delight in noisy quarrels with first one and then another entering into the gesticulating argument; an equally Gallic gusto in bedroom scenes which though they may hardly be in keeping with Anglo-Saxon notions of propriety are nevertheless amusing.

It is not the Paris to which the screen is accustomed that Mr. Clair sets forth. His is the genuine article, with its gray houses, peaked roofs, chimney pots, its narrow streets, its couples talking interminably in doorways, its cheap cafes and dance halls, the crowds of the curious that can so easily be gathered. His camera takes it all in. It travels restlessly from gable to pavement, peers in at windows, glances down or up in angle shots. With the camera the sound keeps pace, now swelling, now diminishing, occasionally bringing to the ear noises of which the eye does not catch the origin. His actors, though they are of less importance than the director, are intelligent and capable.

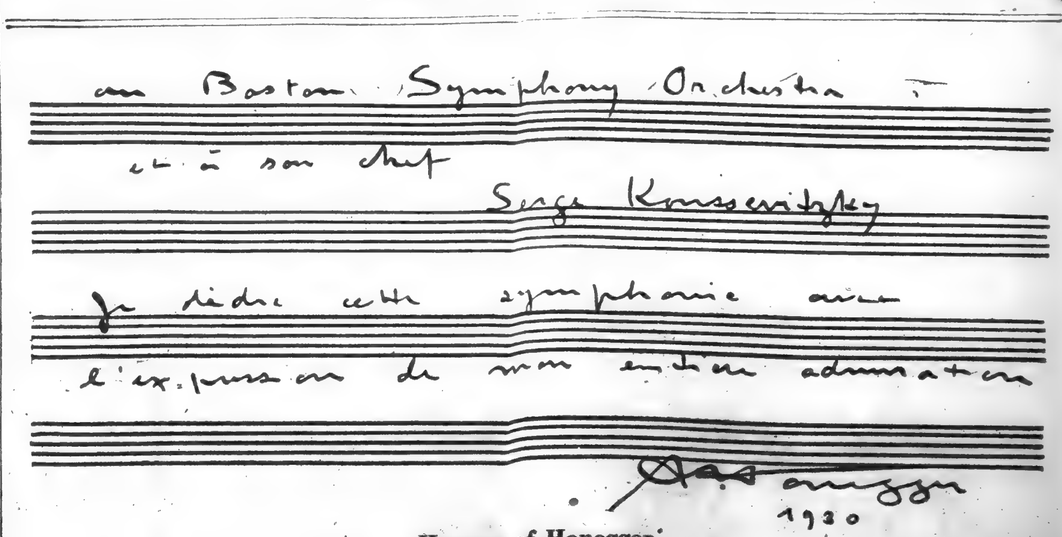
Lastly a word of the theater. It has been redecorated in cheerful colors in a modernistic scheme of design. It has been equipped with new sound reproducing apparatus. It provides an attractive place for the showing of films of interest and importance but of more limited appeal than those on which the larger movie house are forced to rely for box office patronage.

E. F. M.

Concert-Crier

Next Week

Orchestral—Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, sixteenth pair of Symphony Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzy conductor; assisting chorus from The Cecilia (Handel's Concerto Grosso for Strings, Op. 6, No. 9. Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony;" Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony). . . . Monday evening in Symphony Hall, fourth supplementary concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; assisting pianist J. M. Sanromá (Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings; Stravinsky's Caprice for Piano and Orchestra; Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica"). . . . Monday evening in Alumnæ Hall at Wellesley (8 P. M.), concert by the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, Nicolai Sokolov conductor (Brahms's First Symphony; Prelude to "Khovantschina"; Dohnányi's "Ruralia Ungarica"). . . . Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; assisting pianist J. M. Sanromá (Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings; Stravinsky's Caprice for Piano and Orchestra; Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony). . . . Saturday morning in Jordan Hall, third concert for children with Ernest Schelling as



Homage of Honegger

Dedication from the Manuscript of His New Symphony

Symphony Concert --- Films --- Plays

For Loeffler, For Honegger, The Garlands

TRANS.—FEB 14

The Parisian's New Symphony, The Bostonian Honored And Epitomized

TO a certainty, Honegger completed no half-finished manuscript; clapped upon the fly-leaf a dedication to the Boston Symphony Orchestra; so fulfilled a commission for its jubilee. Nor, having received the invitation, did he search his soul and cudgel his brains to write the desired piece of music. Whether his "Symphony for Orchestra"—played at the Symphony Concert yesterday for the first time anywhere—attracted or repelled the hearer, there was no doubting it as work of a composer possessed by what he would say; striking out, white-hot, the means to the saying. For Honegger—the chroniclers agree—composition is a rapid, absorbing process. He wrote, for example, the whole music to "King David" in an incredibly brief time. By the dates on the score the new Symphony occupied him through six months, for him a long incubation. To hear it, however, is to believe that he sketched it in a passion of creation; amplified, revised and rounded it with no chill upon the earlier heats. Never once does progress falter or texture sag. Like or dislike it, his Symphony is a design accomplished, a state of spirit expressed.

Honegger, now entering the prime of the forties, writes out of full mind, large resource, busy experience. His range of musical knowledge extends from Bach to the newest prodigy of Paris. Some who have scrutinized this first Symphony say they find in the score traces (as chemists call them) of this, that and the other composer. Likely enough; for to discover such, even of Monsieur Massenet, was a favorite process when "King David" was new. Hearing is another matter. Whatever Honegger may have assimilated into the new Symphony comes forth unmistakably stamped by his mind and hand. Throughout it is the full voice of a full man.

By the same token Honegger writes with every desired resource at command. Whatever he wills, that he may put to music-paper; for the most part send sounding from his orchestra. As it seemed yesterday, the unfolding Symphony was filled to the brim. One detail after another, of substance, facture, expression, pricked the ear only to be thrust away by the next. The listener heard, exhilarated and enriched. Two or three repetitions would not exhaust the surprises of this music. (It is to be hoped that in the remaining third of the season Dr. Koussevitzky will find room for one.)

Long since Honegger was fertile in the development of his musical ideas. In the 'Symphony for Orchestra," he sets forth the leading motivs unescapably. They are stripped, clarified, reiterated. From them he develops secondary motivs; weaves this development into a many-stranded web of counterpoint—linear counterpoint in the modernist sense of the words. (An applauding minority bore witness to ears already accustomed.) Once and again these lines are so many and close that ear and mind may hardly carry and differentiate them. Then, as with Strauss in kindred abundance, comes a moment of paper-music, written rather than heard.

Honegger writes atonally, not because atonality is the newest musical discovery or the current musical fashion—for it has ceased to be either—but because it is the idiom in which he best expresses himself. His is an honest, spontaneous atonality. So written, this keyless Symphony teems with dissonance, shrill and piercing, harsh and deep, unmitigated, driven home. All ears, unless they are deliberately closed to the voice of modernist music, are now well schooled to these barrages. (The intent listening of yesterday was the proof.) In the Symphony, as usual with Honegger, it is unforced and unflaunted dissonance—the natural turn, the particular emphasis, of the musical moment. But, admittedly, it is uncommonly acrid and astringent. Similarly with his instrumental voices as such. Often they are harsh, acidulous. They protrude, bear down, shout, hammer. Or, if they sing, the melodies turn bitter on their lips. Honegger is frank, honest, urgent composer. Having chosen his ways and means, he does not spare them upon an audience. He plies them—as the American vernacular puts it—"until they hurt." When his "Horace Victorieux" was played at Symphony Hall, some found him—to quote their very words—"the most repulsive of modernists." They will now count the "Symphony for Orchestra" as companion-piece.

Nevertheless, the Honegger of the first movement is unmistakably a composer of power. The contours are bold. Even in the songful measures they are little softened. The rhythms beat sharp or hard. The march of the linear counterpoint is inexorable. Progressions grind against each other, wrenching themselves free. The strings sound oftenest from the upper registers. The brass affirms its twentieth-century right to mutter or to shrill. The more melodic measures little alter the pervading semblance. Yet the design is spacious and ascendant; the tonal texture glows. In sum a music struck off at white heat, on many a page lustrous and incandescent; a music instinct with what this present hails as power.

With all his honest modernisms, Honegger has the eclectic temperament. Contrary to much current practice, his slow movement is as chromatic as though it were written in the Wagnerian heyday. It is also music of melody—not as the eighteenth-century "classics" or the nineteenth-century "romantics" invented and fashioned it. Instead, modernist melody, short-breathed, hard-edged, thin-clothed, sharp-voiced, unfolding in long line rather than vivid color, clear-cut as in a chamber-piece; none the less ardent and intensive. Unsentimentalized yet alight with stark emotion, shunning luxuriance that surface and underbody may go bare and clear, such a slow movement, vitalized throughout, is Honegger's counterpart to the first movement of power.

The finale is a welter of exuberance. Motivs, principal or subsidiary, jostle motivs; figures whirl about in a demonic rondo. All is rhythm; all is flux and dart; high tension and sharp voice—until at last the principal motiv calls for order; sets the others in their contrapuntal place; bids the whole Symphony end calmed—or as some will say breathless. After his first exercise in modernist power and his second in modernist ardor, Honegger "tops off" with this fine frenzy of modernist tension. . . . Here at last is a symphony that, without a program, a foreword or any other verbal gloss, expresses in itself and of itself not a little of this immediate time; that deserved the week of rehearsals spent upon it; the understanding, sympathy, force and fullness with which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra proclaimed it. Once more, the Boston Orchestra, and he as conductor, are the spokesmen par excellence for the music of this immediate day.

Once more a considerable part of the audience heard and rewarded. Jubilee commissions that have added this Symphony of Honegger to Stravinsky's "Psalms," and both to Roussel's Symphony with which the series began, were not bestowed in vain.

The second half of the concert marked as nearly as might be the seventieth birthday of Charles Martin Loeffler who, as violinist and composer, has made Boston these forty years his workplace and his dwelling. The Symphony Orchestra had reason to honor the violinist who out of its ranks has become a distinguished composer in his time; who has handed it many a manuscript; who is witness to a fine, true and vital musical culture existent in Boston and in other concert-capitals of these United States. To end the afternoon came a truly domestic scene. At the call of Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Loeffler descended to the stage from his seat in the balcony; was hailed with united and hearty applause by the waiting audience; while the orchestra rose to salute him, adding its plaudits, and the conductor, as unobtrusively as might be, joined in the general homage. No one was lacking except Mme. Frijsh who had sung the singer's part in Mr. Loeffler's setting of St. Francis's "Canticle of the Sun." But from her place on the platform, by a gesture, she had already passed on to the composer her well-earned applause. Here in America, she is essential to the Hymn. From the outset it has known no other voice. Still she ripens in it.

The "Canticle," and "Pagan Poem" which followed, were discerningly chosen to exemplify the symphonic Loeffler. Unless the Symphony ("Hora Mystica") which he still reserves for seemingly endless revision, shall ultimately excel it, this hymn of the holy and fraternal Francis is his most completely accomplished and most characteristic work. Heard anew yesterday, this music knows neither place nor period. It is self-contained, self-sufficient, timeless, living its own life. Out of the crucible of imagination, it is expression not only of Francis's verse but of Francis's spirit. It suffuses the Hymn, yet marks each detail as it mounts. It is no less expression of the devout, the mystical, the truly spiritual Loeffler—the sacred poet, as the old phrase ran—who may speak of these things only in tones; and speaking, lift up also the hearts of those that hear.

Over against the Canticle went "Pagan Poem" to embody the romantic, the dramatizing, the exorcising Loeffler, conjuring out of Vergil's ancient world the sorceress-girl, forsaken of her lover, spelling him back. The trumpets sound her refrain; the piano rhythms her magic; the whole orchestra speaks out her grief, longing, suspense, rejoicing. The very dog barks in the doorway. For Loeffler the spiritualizing, read Loeffler, the humanizing, tone-poet. Find in both the mating master of means to ends. "Pagan Poem" was first written a quarter of a century ago. Here and there it does not escape birthmarks. The technician, the stylist and the poet, audible in Mr. Loeffler from first piece to last, quickly efface them. . . . In Canticle and Poem the orchestra played as for a fête.

There was also a prelude to this full-freighted afternoon—a Suite for Piano and strings by young Maestro Mario Pilati of Naples and Cagliari, which is in Sardinia. It would pour a mild new wine of modernism into the old bottles of Prelude, Saraband, Minuet, Finale Burlesca. By no means did it crack them. Mr. Sanromá played expertly and sympathetically upon a percussive piano, the accompanying strings—for they were no more—did amiably what Pilati bade. Throughout, he forgot that an insistent avoidance of every cliché becomes as tedious as trite repetition. One expected cadence would have been tonic.

H. T. P.

Repairing an Error of Time

Charles Spencer Chaplin

As John Decker Believes El Greco Might Have Painted Him

Lonsdale Lightly, Colman to Match

With "The Devil to Pay" to Set Them Both Forth To Advantage

OUT of the eternal fitness of things arise such combinations as Ronald Colman in a Frederick Lonsdale play. "The Devil To Pay," now at the State Theater, is a film of just about solid delight for those who like Colman in anything, or anybody in English comedy. There is no sickly charm in his acting, no elaborate causalness. He is light, dashing, deft, and he seems as winning among the menfolk as he is with the swooning young ladies.

His casting in this piece, the merest trifle in substance, is one of the most fortuitous things that have happened, to him or to us. He swings no fists, outwits no crooks, wears no especially stunning clothes. He has only to toy with some charming people and some excellent lines in a two-day romance. Wit in the writing, if not brilliance, makes his task a grateful one. Those chosen to make the play with him were happily selected. There are on third and fourth thought, some illogicalities, but they are easily forgiven.

He is sort of the dark gray sheep of his family and comes home from Kenya Colony a bankrupt save for twenty pounds. He immediately spends fifteen on a wire-haired terrier that wags his tail from a shop window. His luggage arrives in Grosvenor square but he is not seen or heard from until the next morning. When he does show up, he says ruefully he has been in Liverpool where he missed his boat train. "Liverpool" is actually a charming young lady actress, his playmate. Once home and the interview with the grumbling, swearing, affectionate father over, he is off to the Derby with his sister and Miss Hope, whom he had that morning met for the first time. It is a picnic, on the coster side of the grounds; and the young people return to the city quite charmed with one another. The stranger is that evening announcing her engagement to a grand duke, and it is not hard to imagine that it is not going to come off. Just so. A little tiff is enough excuse for her to give back the ring, and then to find a lot of time for sport with Willie. But her father does not lose a grand duke gracefully and sets out to drop this young fortune-hunter in the Thames. He succeeds all right with the unconscious and very stupid connivance of his daughter. He wants to say a goodby to his old love and she petulantly denies him permission. By luck he does it, anyway, and father trots out the proof of his worthlessness. Willie's blithe acceptance of her jilt has the desired effect and soon she comes creeping to him.

George Fitzmaurice directed this and he engaged Lady Maureen Stanley and Lieutenant Colonel Something Something as technical advisers. He enlisted Frederick Kerr as the father, David Torrence as the menace, Loretta Young as the young lady, and some charmingly inconsequential people for the others. The result is every bit desirable and no amount of carping would make it less so. It makes the entrance into movie dialogue of the word "sycophantic." Mr. Colman uses it every bit as if he had encountered it before.

C. B. P.

BULLS

Ladysmith, Wis.—Assemblyman J. W. Carow has been asked by a delegation of Rusk county dairymen to introduce a bill in the Legislature the coming session to exempt pure bred bulls used as herd sires from taxation to encourage the use of blooded bulls in place of scrubs. [Milwaukee Journal

From France a New Fashion for Films

As "Sous les Toits de Paris" Attacks Ingeniously the Talkie Problem

THOUGH they may not have been aware of it—for they probably were more interested in the spontaneous good nature and the typically French gayety that bubbled on the surface—the invited audience that gathered at the Fine Arts Theater last evening for the first showing of René Clair's "Sous les Toits de Paris" were looking upon a method of treatment of the talkies that is more likely to be the accepted pattern for the future than the type of picture now in favor in Hollywood.

The problem that M. Clair has attacked is an important one. When the screen received the gift of tongues it found it had acquired a dubious benefit. Its audience which had been world-wide became limited to those who could understand the language. The first expedient that came to mind as a solution was the unsatisfactory one of inserting sub-titles for the spoken word in exportations to foreign-speaking countries. Hardly more successful was the laborious and expensive system of retaking a film in foreign dialogue. The difficulties and awkwardness of translation were apparent in one of the few of such efforts to reach Boston, "The Blue Angel."

M. Clair has tried a more fundamentally cinematic method of approach. He has kept his dialogue at a minimum; has told his story in terms of pantomime and action. Sounds have been inserted, cleverly cut and interpolated bits of music have been introduced, to please the ear or to heighten effect. It has been done so that without knowledge of the language, the film is easily understandable. Something of a trend in the same direction—more of visual narration and less of dialogue—has already been noted in Hollywood. But "Sous les Toits de Paris" carries the idea to a logical conclusion. To M. Clair must go the credit for creating the first genuinely international talkie.

That is not to say that it is a perfect piece of work. On the contrary it has a familiar and fairly simple type of story—something of romance, a bit of crime, some gangsters (or the Parisian equivalent for them), catchy but rather obvious music. It is somewhat longer than it should be (your Continental likes entertainment in bulk); sometimes it seems that the songs are repeated more than is advisable. But such defects should not conceal either the importance of the method of treatment or the intrinsic merit of the film itself. For Mr. Clair has a delicious sense of humor. He touches up his characterizations with sly bits of business, finds fun in humorous juxtapositions—the various types for instance that are humming one of the two songs that run through the film, the stout woman combing her hair, the discouraged fellow soaking his feet in a basin of hot water, the irritable gentleman who tries to shut his ears to it but canont. Beyond that there is observable a Latin delight in noisy quarrels with first one and then another entering into the gesticulating argument; an equally Gallic gusto in bedroom scenes which though they may hardly be in keeping with Anglo-Saxon notions of propriety are nevertheless amusing.

It is not the Paris to which the screen is accustomed that Mr. Clair sets forth. His is the genuine article, with its gray houses, peaked roofs, chimney pots, its narrow streets, its couples talking interminably in doorways, its cheap cafes and dance halls, the crowds of the curious that can so easily be gathered. His camera takes it all in. It travels restlessly from gable to pavement, peers in at windows, glances down or up in angle shots. With the camera the sound keeps pace, now swelling, now diminishing, occasionally bringing to the ear noises of which the eye does not catch the origin. His actors, though they are of less importance than the director, are intelligent and capable.

Lastly a word of the theater. It has been redecorated in cheerful colors in a modernistic scheme of design. It has been equipped with new sound reproducing apparatus. It provides an attractive place for the showing of films of interest and importance but of more limited appeal than those on which the larger movie house are forced to rely for box office patronage.

E. F. M.

Concert-Crier

Next Week

Orchestral—Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, sixteenth pair of Symphony Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzy conductor; assisting chorus from The Cecilia (Handel's Concerto Grosso for Strings, Op. 6, No. 9. Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony;" Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony). . . . Monday evening in Symphony Hall, fourth supplementary concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; assisting pianist J. M. Sanromá (Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings; Stravinsky's Caprice for Piano and Orchestra; Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica"). . . . Monday evening in Alumnæ Hall at Wellesley (8 P. M.), concert by the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, Nicolai Sokolov conductor (Brahms's First Symphony; Prelude to "Khovantschina"; Dohnányi's "Ruralia Ungarica"). . . . Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; assisting pianist J. M. Sanromá (Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings; Stravinsky's Caprice for Piano and Orchestra; Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony). . . . Saturday morning in Jordan Hall, third concert for children with Ernest Schelling as guide, counsellor and friend. An assisting orchestra from Symphony Hall ("Wagner Program" from "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Die Meistersinger," "Die Walküre," "Gotterdämmerung").

In Ensemble—Sunday afternoon in the Art Club, fourth chamber-concert of the Flute-Players, with a string quartet and five virtuosi of wind instruments from Symphony Hall; pianist, J. M. Sanromá (Quartet for winds by Rossini; quartet for strings by Verdi; Bliss's quintet for oboe and strings; Piston's Sonata for flute and piano). . . . Sunday evening at the Repertory Theater, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison playing pieces for two pianos from a diversified repertory, taking leave of Boston as a pair (Numbers from Bach, Mozart, Chopin, Saint-Saëns, Casella, Bax).

Eminences—Sunday afternoon in the Repertory Theater, concert by Povla Frijsh, mistress of imaginative and expressive song (Numbers from Peri, Franz, Chausson, Chabrier, Arensky, Musorgsky, Grieg). . . . Wednesday morning at Hotel Statler, concert of operatic airs, songs and miscellaneous pieces, sung in a Morning Musicale by Maria Jeritza of the Metropolitan Opera House (Airs from Massenet's "Cid" and Giordano's "Andrea Chénier." French, German, American songs).

Singer—Tuesday evening in Jordan Hall, concert of airs and songs sung by Marion Kingsbury, soprano; assisting artists, Pauline Danforth, pianist, and Georges Laurent, flutist (Airs from Mozart, Bach and Donizetti's "Torquato Tasso"; songs to Persian poetry, piano-pieces from Scarlatti and Debussy).

Further On

Week of Feb. 22—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall, concert of operatic pieces and songs sung by Florence Austral, of full voice and large style (Airs from "Fidelio" and "Aida," numbers from Marx, Strauss, Liszt, Hughes). . . . Sunday afternoon, Jordan Hall; seventh concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, Thompson Stone conductor. . . . Sunday evening, Public Library; concert of solo and ensemble numbers for flute, harp and viola di gamba, played by Messrs. Laurent, B. Zighera, A. Zighera, of the Symphony Orchestra as a Trio Instrumentale de Paris. Open to the public. . . . Tuesday afternoon, Symphony Hall; fourth supplementary matinée by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. . . . Tuesday evening, Jordan Hall; concert of old airs, German lieder and Negro Spirituals, sung by Edward Matthews, baritone (Three airs from seventeenth and eighteenth-century Italians; four songs of Brahms; four Spirituals). . . . Wednesday evening, Jordan Hall; concert of pianopieces played by Rudolph Ganz, rare visitor to Boston (Twelve Preludes of Debussy; Chopin's Sonata in B minor; numbers from Bach, Haydn, Liszt). . . . Wednesday evening, Brown Hall; concert of sonatas for violoncello and piano, played by Joseph Malkin and Jesus Maria Sanromá (Beethoven in A major; Converse; Brahms in F major, Op. 99). . . . Wednesday evening, Steinert Hall; concert of operatic airs and songs, sung by Carmen Reggio, contralto (Numbers from Handel, Verdi, Donizetti, Bizet, Thomas; Italian miscellany). . . . Thursday evening, Symphony Hall; concert of Russian airs and songs, French and Italian pieces, sung by Maxim Karolik, dramatic tenor (Numbers from Rimsky-Korsakov, Musorgsky, Balakirev, Dargomizshky; Casella's "Thirteenth-Century Songs"; novel items from Pizzetti and Chausson). . . . Thursday evening, Jordan Hall; concert divided between Clarence Knudson, violinist and Maude Erickson, soprano, assisted by an orchestra of thirty-five from Symphony Hall; conductor Arthur Fiedler (Ballet-Suite and Violin-Concerto from Chaikovsky; miscellany for Violin; operatic airs and songs). . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Symphony Hall; seventeenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. . . . Friday evening, Jordan Hall; concert of trios for piano, violin and violoncello, played by Manfred, Jacques and Joseph Malkin (Chaikovsky, Brahms, Smetana). . . . Saturday morning in the Repertory Theater, concert of folk-songs for children sung in costume by Dorothy Gordon. . . . Saturday afternoon, Jordan Hall; concert of airs and songs sung by Gertrude Ehrhart, accomplished and adventurous singer (Airs from Mozart's "Figaro" and Massenet's "Chérubin"; German lieder; Parisian pieces; English numbers from Bax, Goossens, Walton).

Week of March 1—Wednesday morning, Hotel Statler; last concert in the current series of Morning Musicales with Lauri-Volpi, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House, making a first appearance in Boston. . . . Wednesday evening, Jordan Hall; concert of airs and songs sung by Gertrude Wieder, contralto, newcomer to Boston. . . . Thursday evening, Symphony Hall; concert of piano-pieces played by the high-spirited, warm-toned Percy Grainger, infrequent visitor to Boston. New pieces of his own included. . . . Thursday evening in Paine Hall at Cambridge; concert by the student orchestra of Harvard University, Wallace Woodworth conductor; assisting violinist Malcolm Holmes; assisting at the harpsichord Ralph Kirkpatrick (Concertos of Bach and Corelli; Hindemith).

Week of March 8—Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall; concert of violin-pieces played by Albert Spalding in the prime of his powers as virtuoso and musician. A sensitive mind guides a sensitive hand. . . . Sunday afternoon, Jordan Hall; eighth concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, Thompson Stone conductor. . . . Tuesday afternoon, Symphony Hall; fifth supplementary matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. . . . Tuesday evening, Symphony Hall; concert of Negro and other pieces sung by the choir of the Hampton Institute, Nathanael Dett conductor and composer. . . . Wednesday evening, Brown Hall; concert of sonatas for violin and piano, played by Harrison Keller and J. M. Sanromá (Beethoven in C minor, Op. 30, No. 2; Debussy, Fauré in A major). . . . Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. . . . Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, eighteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. . . . Saturday morning, Jordan Hall; last of the concerts for children with Ernest Schelling as guide, counsellor and friend. An orchestra from Symphony Hall.

PLAN PRIVATE FOREST

Plans are being started for the growing of 160 acres of forest crops in Marathon county by Alva and E. B. Eighmy, Madison, Wis., who have petitioned the State conservation commission to enter the land under the forest crop program. The land is in the town of Hewitt. A hearing on the matter is to be held here Jan. 14 by the commission. [Milwaukee Journal

Homage of Honegger

Dedication from the Manuscript of His New Symphony

"HAVE ANOTHER BURNED BISCUIT"

You would never think of offering improperly cooked food to your guests . . . Are you equally fastidious about coffee?

Coffee sets the tone for the whole dinner. Good coffee accents the flavor of your favorite dishes. But not even the most careful cooking can survive poor coffee. It has ruined many a dinner that was otherwise irreproachable.

Why risk offending the good taste of your guests when it is so easy to make sure of their approval? Serve La Touraine, the fragrant, satisfying blend. Your guests expect it.

BE PROUD OF YOUR COFFEE

SERVE La Touraine

The Shelton

Home of the famous swimming pool

at 49TH and Lexington NEW YORK

Has all the comforts of a private club. The most enjoyable hotel atmosphere in New York.

MUSIC

Herald Feb 14

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, given in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Pilati, Suite for piano and orchestra (first time in Boston). Honegger, Symphony (composed for the jubilee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. First performance). Loeffler, Canticum Fratris Solis (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice and orchestra; also "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), Mme. Povla Frijsh, soprano, was the singer; Mr. Sanroma the pianist.

Mario Pilati is a Neapolitan born in 1903, now a teacher of counterpoint, composition and musical history. This Suite is in four movements, Introduction, Sarabande, Minuet (Rondo), Finale. These movements are comparatively short. The Sarabande is the most musically thought and expressed of the four. In the other movements there is a too apparent endeavor to shun the obvious. One might say that in the three there are "smart Alecisms." The Minuet begins in a charming manner; suddenly the composer says to himself, "This will never do;" he introduces at intervals rapid and inconsequential passages and excuses himself for the liberty by putting "Rondo" after "Minuet." The Finale is an Allegro burlesca. As Queen Victoria once remarked: "We were not amused." The Introduction consists of tentative phrases which hint at something worth while to come. Pilati undoubtedly has a certain talent; he is not devoid of sentiment; he appreciates the beautiful—this is shown in his Sarabande. The other movements suffer from "smartness."

Mr. Honegger took his commission seriously. He considered the dignity and the importance of the occasion, nor was he willing to write the conventional "piece d'occasion" which is heard, disappoints expectation, and is at once forgotten. This symphony must be ranked with the best of his many orchestral works; in some respects it is the best. The first movement with its crashing discords will probably disturb those who like to led in the paths of the dominant and sub-dominant with now and then a straying into the field of the subdominant. But there is impressive power, there is fiery energy in the skilfully contrived discordant measures; they are there with a purpose. Havelock Ellis, speaking of the many who found—and still find—Proust unreadable and Joyce unintelligible, says "until we find the door and the clue the new writer remains obscure. Therein lies the truth of Landor's saying that the poet must himself create the beings who are to enjoy his Paradise." Surely no one yesterday, hearing the remaining two movements, if he knocked at Honegger's door found it shut. One could hardly fail to recognize the strength of the Adagio, its massive architecture, the heroic spirit of the long and resonant melodic lines; music of lofty thoughts not lowered by the medium of expression. As for the last movement, with its persistent rhythmic figures on which compelling musical sentences, always interesting, often eloquent, are declaimed; then the lovely tranquillity of the last pages—one may well fear lest this movement become at once "popular," and not in the best meaning of that word. It is a pleasure to add that this new work of a high standing composer was well received. Even those who have exclaimed "Honeger" to scare the timid from attending a concert when that name is on the program; who have honestly thought him a Bogyman, if not the Antichrist in music, were obliged to admit that there might be something in him after all.

Two of Mr. Loeffler's compositions were performed to bring him public honor, as a fortnight ago he passed his 70th birthday. It was on Nov. 20-21, 1891, that he appeared for the first time as a composer at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He then played his suite for violin with the orchestra of which he was a valued member; his suite "Les Veillees de l'Ukraine" (after Gogol). Since then while he was still a member and after his regretted retirement, he has enriched the repertoire of this orchestra and the repertoires of other orchestras in this country and in Europe by his compositions. Those chosen yesterday are no doubt among his best, some may say they are his best, but there are earlier works that one would gladly hear. For example, his "Villanelle du Diable"—in which the macabre side of his musical nature is revealed; his Divertimento for violin and orchestra; his concerto for violoncello; his tragic "Mort de Tintagiles," nor should his composition for a jazz orchestra be neglected nor thought too light for a symphony concert—we suffer from undue seriousness, not to say solemnity that is almost ecclesiastical—for Mr. Loeffler has shown that jazz may be refined, even poetic, as well as exciting.

Yesterday the composer, the conductor, the singer and the orchestra were loudly applauded; and singer, conductor and orchestra were united in the payment of tribute to Mr. Loeffler.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, G minor, No. 6 (not op. 6 No. 9 as previously announced). Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus. Berlioz, Symphonie Fantastique.

MODERN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Loeffler Honored, and New Honegger Work

Globe Feb 14

Dr Koussevitzky devoted yesterday's Symphony concert to the performance of an all-modern program. Honegger's Symphony, dedicated to the Boston Symphony and to its present conductor, was played for the first time in public. Charles Martin Loeffler, two of whose works were played was warmly applauded, orchestra and audience standing to do him honor at the end of the concert. The only other number was an insignificant suite for piano and string orchestra by an obscure young Italian named Pilati.

Mr Loeffler has so long been a familiar figure at Symphony Hall that there is some danger of people forgetting that he is a composer of rare distinction and considerable repute. His recent 70th birthday was said to be the occasion of including his "Pagan Poem" and "Canticle of the Sun" on yesterday's program. But his music deserved to be heard for its own sake, with no commemorative or anniversary motive in the offing.

Mme Povla Frijsh repeated the sensitive and musicianly interpretation of the solo in the "Canticle" which she first gave here last season. Yesterday her voice was in fine condition, so that tonal beauty as well as musical taste distinguished her singing.

Mr Sanroma not only played the piano solo in "A Pagan Poem" but was also the pianist in Pilati's suite. In Mr Loeffler's brilliantly written measures for piano he excelled. In Pilati's rather trivial music he did all that anyone might to make it seem interesting and original.

Honegger's Symphony

This Pilati suite is the work of a young modernist composer trying to revive the formulae of 18th century music without understanding them. He fell into most of the cliches of both 18th and 20th century music. But his piece is sprightly, and very showily written for strings.

Honegger's symphony seemed at a first hearing to be a masterpiece, despite hints of the styles of other composers as diverse as Wagner and Stravinsky. In one piece, in fact, there is more than a hint of a theme from the latter's "Firebird," but Honegger is no mere tepid imitator, trimming his sails to every musical breeze, following the latest current fashion blindly and eagerly. On the contrary his music has almost excessive vigor of substance. Its rhythms, singly and in combination, are vital and original.

Almost alone in his generation, Honegger is not afraid to be, on occasion, frankly melodious. Almost alone among the younger moderns, he is not afraid of heroics, of the intensity, the passionate outbursts so characteristic of both good and bad 19th century composers. Nor do Honegger's outbursts become bombastic. They seem the spontaneous overflow of powerful feeling and are therefore, by all the canons of 19th century critical authority, positively justified.

It is, of course, absurd to pass judgment on so intricate a new piece after the first performance. One can only in such circumstances record impressions. The style of this piece seems a bit crabbed. There are curiously angular melodic and rhythmic figures. The writing for orchestra sometimes seemed yesterday to lack clarity and sonority. The idiom is modernistic, so much so that some of the combinations of notes heard sounded fortuitous, as though they could not be what was written.

Loving Care

Yet one trusts conductor and orchestra to play such things pretty accurately. It was evident that this symphony had been rehearsed by them with loving care. The performance triumphed over many obvious difficulties produced by Honegger's passion for rhythmic counterpoint.

Dr Koussevitzky's commissions to noted present-day composers for works to be written for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary season have fully justified themselves in the production of Russell's symphony, Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" and this Honegger symphony. Each has seemed at a first hearing a masterpiece. Each should, if possible, be repeated this season, as Stravinsky's work will be next week. P. R.

SYMPHONY'S TRIBUTE TO LOEFFLER

Two Numbers Played —Honegger's Work for First Time

Post Feb 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A distinguished citizen of these parts, Charles Martin Loeffler, is appropriately honored at the Symphony Concerts of this week. Mr. Loeffler has just passed his 70th birthday, and Dr. Koussevitzky paid his respects by playing yesterday afternoon, as he will this evening, Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and his more recent "Canticle of the Sun." In the latter piece, Povla Frijsh was the singer.

TWO NEW PIECES

Mr. Loeffler heard his setting of St. Francis' canticle, first performed here 13 months ago, from his accustomed place in the balcony. Before the performance of the "Pagan Poem" he left his seat, and when that piece was concluded he was escorted by Dr. Koussevitzky to the front of the platform where he was obliged to bow again and again in acknowledgement of the applause.

It was an eventful afternoon. Immediately before these complimentary rites had come the world premiere of a symphony by Arthur Honegger, composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dedicated to the orchestra and its conductor, while before that there was played for the first time in Boston a suite for piano and strings by the 28-year-old Italian, Mario Pilati, a composer hitherto unknown here.

Mr. Pilati, as his suite disclosed him, is a gifted young man who has not yet found his own voice. In the first two movements of his suite, an introduction and Sarabande, he indulges in the popular modern sport of pouring new wine into old bottles. In the Sarabande he does this with conspicuous success. The movement has a wistful charm, a fragrance as of things old and half-forgotten. The ensuing Minuet is disturbed by a bizarre figure of sharply reiterated notes and there are suggestions here, as in the final Allegro Burlesca, that Mr. Pilati is well acquainted with the music of the modern Frenchmen, particularly that of Ravel. The suite was brilliantly played by the orchestra's strings and Jesus Maria Sanroma, who was also the pianist in the two pieces of Loeffler.

Another Railroad Piece

Mr. Honegger's Symphony was to be heard with mixed emotions. Portions of the work are forceful and convincing, but not all of it. The first movement disconcertingly recalls that musically most famous of locomotives, Mr. Honegger's own "Pacific 231"; possibly this is "Pacific 232." The engine puffs and snorts; it telescopes a "local" at Readville; but at the end it steams, battered but still jaunty, into the South station. The second movement is marked by a sort of strained lyricism and is not without its moments of intensity. The opening measures, scored for violin, 'cellos and basses, are original and effective. This movement has character.

In the finale there are irresistible rhythms combined with a grim and rasping harmonic and orchestral dress. The very end, however, is blandly placid, seeming by contrast with what had gone before almost smugly euphonious. But this happy ending pleased the audience. Few of the many works written for this anniversary season have been so warmly received.

Loeffler's Canticle

There are beautiful pages in Mr. Loeffler's Canticle, pages in which the soul takes wings and soars aloft, pages truly mystical. But the nature of the text made difficult both the avoidance of monotony and the attaining of perfect continuity. A voice more sensuously lovely than that of Mme. Frijsh, who sang with her customary insight and intelligence, is needed for this work with its coloring so softly rich, a voice that would not shrill, as did Mme. Frijsh's now and then, against this melting euphony.

There was a glowing performance of the "Pagan Poem." But it is heresy to suggest that this ecstatic, rapturous composition, one of the notable scores of the 20th century, is beginning to sound a little prolix and diffuse? That it tends here and there, if ever so slightly, to cloy and to lose its grip upon the hearer?

DENIES JURY TRIAL

Motions for a jury trial of the contest of the will of John Kirchmayer, noted Cambridge woodcarver and sculptor, were denied, yesterday, by Judge John C. Leggat in Middlesex Probate Court. The contest will now be heard by one of the probate judges. Kirchmayer left $30,000 and the choice of his art treasures to his wife. His two half-brothers, Adalbert and Joseph Zwink, are contesting.

Honegger's Ne

Monitor

By L. A. SLOPER

ARTHUR HONEGGER, whose musical achievements are many and familiar, was among the composers invited to supply compositions in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His contribution to the festival year occupied the central position on the program prepared by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the concerts of Feb. 13 and 14 in Symphony Hall, Boston. This proved to be a symphony without key designation, made audible at the Friday concert for the first time anywhere.

M. Honegger, if not the most original of all composers, is certainly among the most accomplished. His symphony is characteristic of him. That is, it is the sort of symphony one would expect from the man who wrote "Horace Victorieux" and the "Pastorale d'été," "King David" and the Prayer of Judith, "Pacific 231" and the Concertino.

Upon the ears of M. Honegger, if not upon those of all his auditors, sevenths and seconds fall with a soothing incidence. Most of his works, therefore, demand that the conservative listener revise his theories of beauty in sound. This symphony is no exception. Of its three movements, the first is of Stravinskyan violence and harshness, and the second is lyrical and the third is a Presto in the nature of a Scherzo, which includes among its many ingredients passages of folk dance flavor and a touch of jazz in a portamento figure in the solo trombone; not to mention an echo of the horns of King Marke's hunting party.

It is this last movement, too, which opens with a short descending figure (in the contrabassoon) which Honegger seems to have used in many of his works much as Whistler used a butterfly. But strangely enough, the symphony closes with a brief Andante tranquillo, quite in the mood of the "Pastorale d'été." No doubt it was because of these measures that an active minority of the audience recalled the conductor until he was justified in inviting the players to share in what amounted to a considerable success, for a new piece in modernist vein. This result probably will not be surprising to the composer. It is not only by a noisy conclusion that one may achieve an effect.

ew Symphony

SLOPER Feb 14

Now it is all very well to intimate that had not Wagner, Liszt, Strauss, Florent Schmitt, Stravinsky and Schönberg lived and written, this symphony would never have graced the Boston orchestra's fête year. Every composer makes use of his musical inheritance. Honegger perhaps more than most. But it must be noted that he is at all events master of his materials. His music is atonal, but in structure it is severely classical. Honegger is not one of those who can compose without ever having had a lesson in their lives. His technique in both composition and orchestration, is expert. Perhaps it is even too expert for his inspiration. That may be why we feel that for all his brilliance, Honegger need not yet be placed in the first rank of composers. Yet his symphony is by no means the least important of the compositions written for the Boston anniversary. The work had been devotedly prepared and the performance was magnificent.

Another novelty (so far this time as Boston was concerned) was the Suite for pianoforte (J. M. Sanromá) and string orchestra by Mario Pilati, a young Italian musician. Consisting of an Introduction, Sarabande, Minuet and Finale, it pleased by its simplicity and by its nostalgic evocation of more graceful days.

The remainder of the program was devoted to one of America's most distinguished composers. Charles Martin Loeffler, although born in Alsace, has lived and worked in the United States for nearly 50 years, and used to sit beside Franz Kneisel at the first desk of the Boston orchestra's violins. It was fitting, therefore, that in honor of his recent seventieth birthday, Dr. Koussevitzky should perform two of his most important works, the "Canticum Fratris Solis" for soprano (Povla Frijsh) and orchestra, and the "Pagan Poem" for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati. At the close, Mr. Loeffler was brought to the stage, and artists and audience delighted in paying him homage.

Monitor Music Feb 14 17

Bach Festival Programs

The B minor Mass, the Magnificat, two Brandenburg Concerti and several Cantatas are among the works to be performed during the Bach Festival, which will mark the culmination of the celebration of the fiftieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The festival will continue daily from March 24 to 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will give an address. Chamber music of Bach will be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's Mass in B minor to open the festival on Tuesday (March 24), and to be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four Cantatas (Nos. 4, 20, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concerti (Nos. 2 and 5), and the Suites Nos. 1 and 3. The Concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will play the Piano Concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Clavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadésus of the "Société des Instruments Anciens" will play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory, and formerly organist with this orchestra. The Festival is now being subscribed by means of the automatic subscription board at Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY IN MODERNIST PROGRAM

Ameri

BY MOSES SMITH Feb 14

This week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins with a suite for piano and string orchestra by one Pilati, an Italian composer new to Boston. As heard yesterday for the first time here, this Suite is an interesting, stimulating, often charming example of the art of putting new wine into old bottles. Occasionally the bottles are—shall we say?—stretched, as in the third movement Minuet. But the results are suggestive, if not always brilliant.

Then comes the piece d'occasion, Honegger's new Symphony, dedicated to the orchestra and its conductor on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the organization, and given its first performance yesterday. This work is more than imposing: it is a brilliant record of Honegger's musical scholarship, of his extraordinary command of the orchestral medium. It is also surprising, for in the three movements; though the form is free, the general outlines and principles of symphonic development, as developed by the old masters, are for the most part followed. Of course the harmonic idiom is ultra-modern. But our main objection is that, aside from the principal theme of the third movement, the musical ideas are noticeable by their absence. And the quiet ending of that movement is artificial and forced.

The second half of the program was devoted to the "Canticum Fratris Solis" and "Pagan Poem" of Charles Martin Loeffler, a fine composer living in our midst, who recently celebrated his 70th birthday anniversary. Povla Frijsh was soloist in the first.

Bach Festival to Be Feature of Season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra--Musical Notes of Week

Post Feb 15

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The crowning event of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's semi-centennial year is to be, as has long been known, a Bach festival during the last week of March, specifically from Tuesday, March 24, through Sunday, March 29. The programme for this festival, and the soloists who will participate in it, are now announced.

On Tuesday, as the opening event of the festival, will come the great B minor Mass, which Boston has not heard for many years, performed in two parts, beginning at 4:30 and at 8:30, respectively. The programme on Wednesday evening will pay especial homage to Major Higginson, the orchestra's famous founder and, through 37 years, its sole sustainer. On that occasion, Bliss Perry, biographer and close friend of Major Higginson, will give the address; there will also be organ pieces and chamber music. On Thursday evening there will be a programme of orchestral music—the Second Brandenburg Concerto, the C major Suite for orchestra, the D minor piano concerto and the Magnificat for chorus and orchestra.

The above concerts, with a repetition of the B minor Mass on Sunday afternoon and evening, March 29, are those which will be open to the general public; and subscribers to the festival series may choose between Tuesday and Sunday for the hearing of the mass. The "regular" symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Sunday evening during that week will, however, be likewise a part of the festival, with two separate programmes; on Friday afternoon the D major Suite for orchestra, the concerto for two violins and two cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit"; on Saturday evening two more cantatas, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein Feste Burg," certain of the preludes and fugues played as piano solos, and the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto.

Assisting Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in these comprehensive programmes will be the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; and Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, player upon the harpischord; Wallace Goodrich, organist; and, as above mentioned, Bliss Perry as speaker. Surely a goodly array to do honor to Bach and to the Boston Symphony's half century of achievement.

* * * *

It is said that the pianist of this Bach Festival, Mr. Borovsky, as well as Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, the harpsichordist, will come from Europe especially to take part in these proceedings.

* * * *

One more word should be added concerning arrangements for this festival. Seats for it may be secured from the automatic subscription board, which has proved so popular and so practical on past occasions and which has once more been set up in the lobby of Symphony Hall. Mail orders sent to the box office will also be filled.

* * * *

AND MUS

Feb 15 Globe

Bach Festival Programs Announced

The programs for the Bach Festival to be given at Symphony Hall next month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the culmination of its celebration of its 50th anniversary year are now announced. This festival is in honor of Maj Henry Lee Higginson, founder, and for 36 seasons sole sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No other man has done anything comparable to what he achieved for music in Boston and in America. At one of the festival concerts Bliss Perry, his biographer, will speak about Maj Higginson. But no possible tribute to him, either in music or in spoken words, can be adequate.

There are to be four extra concerts by the Boston Symphony and assisting artists. The concerts in the subscription series on March 27 and March 28 are included in the festival. No tickets for these remain unsold. For the Friday concert there are several hundred unreserved seats in the second balcony, which can be obtained only by waiting in the famous "Symphony line."

But nobody will hear the whole festival, as the Saturday subscribers cannot hear the Friday concert nor the Friday subscribers the one on Saturday. This seems sure to cause discontent with the arrangements.

The B minor Mass, never before performed complete in Boston, will be given twice, on Tuesday, March 24, and on Sunday, March 29. Purchasers of tickets for the festival are given their choice of either performance of the mass. It is very long and will begin at 4:30, with an intermission for dinner, and resume at 8:30, after the manner of the Wagner festival performances at Munich and Bayreuth, or of Eugene O'Neill's "Strange Interlude." This B minor Mass is by common consent one of the greatest masterpieces of music. Nobody can afford to miss these chances to hear it.

Soloists Assisting

The chorus for the B minor Mass and the Magnificat will be the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr A. T. Davison. Four cantatas will be sung by the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

Mme Regina Patorni-Casadesus will play the harpsichord. Alexander Borovsky will appear as pianist. Wallace Goodrich, of the New England Conservatory will be organist. The assisting solo singers are to be Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Miss Evans is a newcomer, but all the others are well known here.

The programs in detail are as follows:

Tuesday, March 24, at 4:30 and at 8:30—Mass in B minor.

Wednesday, March 25, at 8:30—Organ prelude; address by Bliss Perry; Prelude and Fugue; Fantasia, and Italian concerto for harpsichord; Toccata for organ.

Thursday, March 26, at 8:30—Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2; Suite for Orchestra, No. 1, in C major; piano concerto in D minor; Magnificat for chorus and orchestra.

Week-End of Honegger and Three Pianists

His New Symphony Heard, Maier, Pattison, Orlov, Departing or Returned

ans Feb 16

To a perceptible fraction of the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, Monsieur Honegger is the horned beast of modernism. With his new Symphony in prospect, they left their seats vacant on Saturday evening, or they placed their tickets "at the disposal of the management" with as chilly intimation of the reason why. (Possibly the memory of those concerts in 1929 in which Honegger, as guest-conductor and composer, "presented" nine of his works, with "Horace Victorieux" falling for the first time on "outraged" ears, still haunts them.) Other recalcitrants deigned to come and hear; then rent the air with scorn and objurgation. Nevertheless, the ayes unmistakably had it. On Friday, when the time came for applause, they were a nervous minority. On Saturday, at the like moment, they were a firm-willed half of the audience, and more. Easily they recalled the conductor once and twice; finally set on its feet an orchestra that had worked days and nights upon the Symphony. Incredible as it may seem to our reactionaries, music is still subject to change; while the younger generation keeps the queer trick of that ever-renewed breed. It finds innovation understandable, congenial, exciting.

Second hearing of "the new Honegger" confirmed every impression of the first, deepened them, added to them. Beyond question, he is a highly individualized composer in a musical world that runs to types and schools. In the first and the last movement, his brass is unmistakable. No other composer bids it to such sounds. If now and then they recalled his Pacific locomotive, that also was image of power. Both movements also beat hard to Honegger's short-cut rhythms. In the first he energizes them. They whip at his recurring major-sevenths and drive them forward. In the last he whirls them about with a lighter hand, in eager gusto. There are pages in this "Symphony for Orchestra" that out of bare force rise to stripped power, draw near to a like splendor. Pages, again, in the slow movement, that glow with the ardors of a new instrumental song. Pages once more, in the finale, that sound with wild fantasy. Pages to end that touch in modern idiom the serene beauty of which, some say, only the ancients had the secret. But from some corner of himself Honegger—"now living" as the all-observant program-book reminded us—may also draw it. Even conservative ears were touched. The commissioned symphonies had already renewed Strawinsky. Now they matured Honegger.

For all else brief chronicle suffices. Again Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra and Mme. Frijsh joined together to make the "Canticle of St. Francis" sound in Mr. Loeffler's listening ears as, writing, he had heard it in imagination. Again "Pagan Poem" was testimony to the qualities in his music that year in and year out preserve it in our concert-halls. For him also, when both pieces were ended, the warmths of those amongst whom he has dwelt and practised his calling. They may have counted his years; but it was his life and works that gave him honor. . . . Young Signor Pilati and his Suite for Strings and Piano also deserve a second sentence. Now that Honegger no longer loomed out of the middle distance, his preluding to the concert sounded less labored. There were pleasing measures—measures with the charm of Scarlatti, had the twentieth, and not the eighteenth, century held him.

With Stravinsky For the Fun of It

Trans Feb 17

Those who follow the Monday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra looked twice at yesterday's program before they were ready to believe what they saw. The startling name was Stravinsky. Usually the Monday concerts are conservative; Mozart, Beethoven, Chaikovsky and Wagner serve the day. The name most assiduously avoided is Stravinsky. Yet the evening passed safely and the heavens did not fall. What is more, Monday's audience actually clapped the new Caprice for Piano and Orchestra and appeared to have found it entertaining. As for the remainder of the program, Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" elicited the loudest and most prolonged applause, while Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra had to be content with mild approval.

Elgar's piece, which began the concert, pleased most in its first pages. These provided measures of imposing breadth and dignity. One imagined one felt in them the sturdiness of British character. Stately periods in unison and harmonies in vertical progression outlined an impressive musical proposition corresponding, in a way, to the introduction of a spoken oration. Then, lines joined; arguments grew to developed form; the complete statement rounded the case. It was in the middle sections partaking of a "working-out" character that the ear attended with slackening interest the composer's scholarly processes. Perhaps Mr. and Mrs. Average Listener, familiar with radio and community programs, expected some honest and obvious melodiousness after the manner of "Pomp and Circumstance," and were disappointed. Yet by the end of the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky's delicate sense of program symmetry was apparent. Balance may be obtained in instrumental effect as well as in mood and style. The "Symphonia Domestica" for the full panoplied orchestra; Stravinsky's Caprice for individual virtuosity; Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for the sheen of the strings. The strings, indeed, gave an excellent account of themselves in a performance of exemplary precision, unanimity and beauty of tone. It is a peculiar joy to hear them play together with such uniformity and expressiveness.

Stravinsky's Caprice has been received with undue solemnity in its few performances outside of Boston. It is doubtful if the composer intended to be taken so seriously. Last evening it sounded as music written for the pure sport of it. Tongue-in cheek, it makes play with familiar rhythms and tonal poses. The chattering woodwinds and chirping piano have a sly satirical slant. Questions and answers, quips and cranks, mock solemnities and lugubrious sonoroties chortle an inward kind of glee. No one less adroit and independent than Stravinsky could have given so free a reign to irresponsible fancy. Of "significant" material in the serious sense of the term, it is disarmingly barren; seriousness and significance scarcely were its motivating influences. The composer has called it a "Caprice," and such it is. As a concession, let it be admitted its wit would have been twice as pointed had Stravinsky's inventions been cut in half. Nothing humorous should be lengthy. Aside from the piece itself, Mr. Sanroma's brilliant performance of the piano part won instant delight.

Beside Stravinsky, Strauss is solid and satisfactory. The listener who does not warm to the "Symphonia Domestica" and feel a desire to sing aloud the exuberant melodies has lost touch with humanity; is friendless to the universal musical idiom of which Strauss remains the supreme master. As upon previous occasions, Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work exemplified anew his combined sense of the lyrical and the dramatic. As the music itself reveals a constructive ability unexcelled among contemporary composers, so Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestral performance disclosed the successful and artistic dramatist of musical tone.

N. M. J.

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the fourth of the current series of Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen the following program: Elgar, introduction and allegro for string orchestra, op. 47; Stravinsky, capriccio for piano and orchestra (soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma); Strauss, Symphonia Domestica, op. 53. The audience was, as usual, large.

The courtly and dignified figure of Sir Edward Elgar looms like a respected but neglected and half-forgotten ghost in the background of contemporary English music. English critics at regular intervals revive the legend of his greatness and deplore the failure of English orchestras to perform his symphonies. Edward J. Dent, one of the most learned of English writers on music, even went so far as to allow Elgar's portrait in full court dress to be printed as frontispiece to his translation of Adolf Weissmann's book, "The Problems of Modern Music," though it is difficult to think of any living composer whose work is more remote from those problems than that of this belated follower of Brahms. At its best his music has moments of vigor and mellow dignity; his melody, extraordinarily of uneven quality, reveals traces of an individual and recognizable idiom. The "Enigma Variations" are in his best manner; the "Introduction and Allegro" played yesterday is merely well meant. Elgar draws a rich sonority from the string orchestra for which the piece is written. But the vigor of the opening theme is not balanced by its inherent interest; the pseudo-Welsh tune that forms its principal subject is unconvincing and of poor quality; the development to which the thematic material is treated has little musical significance or beauty; the fugato seems mechanical and dry, but is only fair to say that the manner in which it was played—uniformly loud, and without discrimination between the important and the subsidiary strands of its musical texture—was not such as to do justice to it or to any other piece of contrapuntal music.

Mr. Sanroma and the orchestra between them gave an excellent performance of Stravinsky's "Capriccio"—a work little more than a year old. The literature of music is rich in "Capriccios," but few of them deserve the title so utterly as does Stravinsky's. Not merely by its fantastic rhythms and abruptly changing moods is it capricious; nor by its tumultous movement; but still more by its ironical conglomeration of outmoded musical styles and fashions, parodied and jumbled together in fragmentary allusions and imitations, from Thalberg and Johann Strauss to the jazz of the present day. The effect is dazzling and somewhat confusing until the ironic intent is guessed.

Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" was performed superbly by Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra. It was a performance that far surpassed that given recently at a pair of Friday and Saturday concerts. It was possible to enjoy the work thoroughly both as a prodigious divertissement—the product of the lighter moods of an unsurpassed and whimsical craftsman in sound—and as a richly beautiful and almost inexhaustibly interesting piece of music. Rarely has it been so possible to forget one's conviction that this is an inferior work of the composer. The applause was deservedly enthusiastic.

S. S.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN 4TH MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Feb 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky conducting, gave last evening the fourth concert of the current Monday evening series. The program, on which no item was more than 30 years old, comprised Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra," Op 47; Stravinsky's "Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra"; and Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist.

The Stravinsky work was first introduced here two months ago. It will be interesting to ascertain whether the love that bloomed for it in December will be flourishing in May. For as regards its texture, content, and general musical effect, repeated hearings do not make for a waxing favorable impression of it.

Last evening it occupied the middle of the program, and on either side Elgar's Allegro and Strauss' eternal symphony gleamed as gems of purest ray. There is, of course, no common ground of matter, spirit, or style in the three pieces, but the two works bearing the weight of nearly 30 years seemed by far the most masterly wrought, most vigorous and exhilarating.

Aside from its rather irritatingly common materials, the "Capriccio" is diffuse and tiresome because of its very form. Stravinsky's musical methods do not here transmute base metals into musical gold, and his capriciousness is rather self-conscious and ponderous. Possibly a symphony ought not to be compared with a caprice, but beside the Stravinsky work, Honegger's new and terrifically dissonant symphony rears as a monument of classicism, logic, and power.

Elgar's "Allegro" may lack subtlety and profundity, but it exerts no little appeal on the heart and mind. The harmonic richness, the sturdy fugato, the frank and appealing, if simple, melodies all bid righteously and justly for a long life on orchestra programs.

Strauss' symphony, monstrous though it occasionally may be, is undeniably fascinating. And here, indeed, is an example of the redemption by masterly musical methods of less worthy musical materials.

The program was splendidly played. The depth and glow of the Symphony's acknowledged incomparable strings in the Elgar work were something to be treasured in memory. Mr Sanroma gave a brilliant performance of the difficult piano part of the "Capriccio."

The next Monday evening concert will be given on March 16.

BACH FESTIVAL

Feb 15

A Bach festival will be given through the last week of March. It will be the culminating feature of the Boston symphony orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening, March 25, is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, Maj. Higginson's biographer, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Koussevitzky announces Bach's Mass in B minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 20, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "well-tempered chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich. The festival is now being subscribed by means of the automatic subscription board at Symphony Hall, Boston.

4TH CONCERT OF MONDAY SERIES

Post Feb 17

Elgar, Stravinsky and Strauss Pieces Played

For the fourth concert of the current Monday series, which befell last evening, Dr. Koussevitzky prepared a programme of music by living composers, incidentally permitting the subscribers to these extra concerts to hear repetitions of three of the most brilliant performances of the regular season.

Elgar, Stravinsky and Strauss were the composers. The Englishman was represented by his Introduction and Allegro for strings, a work by no means new, but until a short time ago unknown to Boston. The Russian's piece was the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist, and the German's the "Symphonia Domestica."

If Dr. Koussevitzky is to banish growing doubts as to the importance of Elgar's orchestral music, the ever-fresh "Enigma Variations" aside, he must select for the purpose a more vital score than this Introduction and Allegro which, save for its genial opening section, is music of contrivance, interesting chiefly as a vehicle for virtuoso playing on the part of the orchestra's string choir. At least, few pieces for strings alone furnish a better test of its prowess, and perhaps that is reason enough for playing it.

There is also more of "effect" than substance in Stravinsky's Capriccio. Some of this music has to it a hollow ring, some of it does not avoid out-and-out banality, but the piece is made with such consummate skill and it offers such magnificent opportunity for the hard, dry brilliance that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, not to mention Mr. Sanroma, know how to achieve, that its performance deserves to rank among the outstanding events of the season. Last evening's audience, like three others in Boston and many more in other cities, responded warmly to it.

SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA

Ans Feb 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Serge Koussevitzky conductor, played for the fourth Monday evening concert, a program consisting of works by living composers. An audience that filled the hall heard appreciatively and applauded cordially Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

The soloist in the Capriccio was Jesus Maria Sanroma, all-round pianist extraordinary, whose yeoman work in three out of the four pieces on last week's program was an outstanding achievement. For Stravinsky's piquant, stimulating and quite delightful music Sanroma found exactly the touch. He deserved all the plaudits he received from the audience.

Elgar's work, which was introduced here at a recent concert, is an honest musical score, put together with admirable craftsmanship and containing excellent musical ideas. Mr. Koussevitzky's insistent dramatizing of it was at the sacrifice of beautiful string tone. Similarly, the performance of the Strauss tone-poem, full blown as it was, tended to coarsen a score that to begin with is not over-refined. The performance was at its best in the moments of quiet, lyrical beauty.

MUSIC

Globe Feb 15

Music Notes and Comment

Dr Koussevitzky will give the promised repetition of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" at this week's Symphony concerts in the regular series. This work seemed at a first hearing to be a masterpiece, if an austere and rather baffling one, so the repetition will be welcome. The novelty on this program will, rather curiously, be by Handel, a concerto grosso not previously played at these concerts.

On the program of the Monday concert tomorrow stands Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano, warmly welcomed by the subscribers in the regular series some weeks ago, and since acclaimed in New York. The soloist will again be Mr Sanroma, who surpassed himself in this exacting music.

There is no concert at Symphony Hall today, the first time in many seasons when none has been scheduled for a Sunday in midwinter. There is also no concert at Symphony Hall March 1. This is a sign of hard times in the concert business. Only a handful of celebrities can now assemble a large audience in this city. Presumably none of these was available.

Bach Festival to Be Feature of Season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra--Musical Notes of Week

Post Feb 15

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The crowning event of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's semi-centennial year is to be, as has long been known, a Bach festival during the last week of March, specifically from Tuesday, March 24, through Sunday, March 29. The programme for this festival, and the soloists who will participate in it, are now announced.

On Tuesday, as the opening event of the festival, will come the great B minor Mass, which Boston has not heard for many years, performed in two parts, beginning at 4:30 and at 8:30, respectively. The programme on Wednesday evening will pay especial homage to Major Higginson, the orchestra's famous founder and, through 37 years, its sole sustainer. On that occasion, Bliss Perry, biographer and close friend of Major Higginson, will give the address; there will also be organ pieces and chamber music. On Thursday evening there will be a programme of orchestral music—the Second Brandenburg Concerto, the C major Suite for orchestra, the D minor piano concerto and the Magnificat for chorus and orchestra.

The above concerts, with a repetition of the B minor Mass on Sunday afternoon and evening, March 29, are those which will be open to the general public; and subscribers to the festival series may choose between Tuesday and Sunday for the hearing of the mass. The "regular" symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Sunday evening during that week will, however, be likewise a part of the festival, with two separate programmes; on Friday afternoon the D major Suite for orchestra, the concerto for two violins and two cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit"; on Saturday evening two more cantatas, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein Feste Burg," certain of the preludes and fugues played as piano solos, and the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto.

Assisting Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in these comprehensive programmes will be the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; and Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, player upon the harpischord; Wallace Goodrich, organist; and, as above mentioned, Bliss Perry as speaker. Surely a goodly array to do honor to Bach and to the Boston Symphony's half century of achievement.

* * * *

It is said that the pianist of this Bach Festival, Mr. Borovsky, as well as Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, the harpsichordist, will come from Europe especially to take part in these proceedings.

* * * *

One more word should be added concerning arrangements for this festival. Seats for it may be secured from the automatic subscription board, which has proved so popular and so practical on past occasions and which has once more been set up in the lobby of Symphony Hall. Mail orders sent to the box office will also be filled.

* * * *

Her BACH FESTIVAL Feb 15

A Bach festival will be given through the last week of March. It will be the culminating feature of the Boston symphony orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening, March 25, is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, Maj. Higginson's biographer, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Koussevitzky announces Bach's Mass in B minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 20, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "well-tempered chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich. The festival is now being subscribed by means of the automatic subscription board at Symphony Hall, Boston.

AND MUS

Feb 15 Globe

Bach Festival Programs Announced

The programs for the Bach Festival to be given at Symphony Hall next month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the culmination of its celebration of its 50th anniversary year are now announced. This festival is in honor of Maj Henry Lee Higginson, founder, and for 36 seasons sole sustainer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No other man has done anything comparable to what he achieved for music in Boston and in America. At one of the festival concerts Bliss Perry, his biographer, will speak about Maj Higginson. But no possible tribute to him, either in music or in spoken words, can be adequate.

There are to be four extra concerts by the Boston Symphony and assisting artists. The concerts in the subscription series on March 27 and March 28 are included in the festival. No tickets for these remain unsold. For the Friday concert there are several hundred unreserved seats in the second balcony, which can be obtained only by waiting in the famous "Symphony line."

But nobody will hear the whole festival, as the Saturday subscribers cannot hear the Friday concert nor the Friday subscribers the one on Saturday. This seems sure to cause discontent with the arrangements.

The B minor Mass, never before performed complete in Boston, will be given twice, on Tuesday, March 24, and on Sunday, March 29. Purchasers of tickets for the festival are given their choice of either performance of the mass. It is very long and will begin at 4:30, with an intermission for dinner, and resume at 8:30, after the manner of the Wagner festival performances at Munich and Bayreuth, or of Eugene O'Neill's "Strange Interlude." This B minor Mass is by common consent one of the greatest masterpieces of music. Nobody can afford to miss these chances to hear it.

Soloists Assisting

The chorus for the B minor Mass and the Magnificat will be the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr A. T. Davison. Four cantatas will be sung by the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

Mme Regina Patorni-Casadesus will play the harpsichord. Alexander Borovsky will appear as pianist. Wallace Goodrich, of the New England Conservatory will be organist. The assisting solo singers are to be Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone. Miss Evans is a newcomer, but all the others are well known here.

The programs in detail are as follows:

Tuesday, March 24, at 4:30 and at 8:30—Mass in B minor.

Wednesday, March 25, at 8:30—Organ prelude; address by Bliss Perry; Prelude and Fugue; Fantasia, and Italian concerto for harpsichord; Toccata for organ.

Thursday, March 26, at 8:30—Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2; Suite for Orchestra, No. 1, in C major; piano concerto in D minor; Magnificat, for chorus and orchestra.

Friday, March 27 (open to season subscribers to the Symphony concerts only), at 2:30—Suite for orchestra in D major; Concerto for two violins; Cantatas: "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit."

Saturday, March 28, at 8:15 (open to Symphony subscribers only) — Cantata, "Christus lag in Todesbanden"; Brandenburg Concerto No. 5; Preludes and Fugues for solo piano; Cantata, "Ein Feste Burg."

Sunday, March 29, at 4:30 and at 8:30—Repetition of Mass in B minor.

Week-End of Honegger and Three Pianists

His New Symphony Heard, Maier, Pattison, Orlov, Departing or Returned

ans Feb 16

To a perceptible fraction of the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, Monsieur Honegger is the horned beast of modernism. With his new Symphony in prospect, they left their seats vacant on Saturday evening, or they placed their tickets "at the disposal of the management" with as chilly intimation of the reason why. (Possibly the memory of those concerts in 1929 in which Honegger, as guest-conductor and composer, "presented" nine of his works, with "Horace Victorieux" falling for the first time on "outraged" ears, still haunts them.) Other recalcitrants deigned to come and hear; then rent the air with scorn and objurgation. Nevertheless, the ayes unmistakably had it. On Friday, when the time came for applause, they were a nervous minority. On Saturday, at the like moment, they were a firm-willed half of the audience, and more. Easily they recalled the conductor once and twice; finally set on its feet an orchestra that had worked days and nights upon the Symphony. Incredible as it may seem to our reactionaries, music is still subject to change; while the younger generation keeps the queer trick of that ever-renewed breed. It finds innovation understandable, congenial, exciting.

Second hearing of "the new Honegger" confirmed every impression of the first, deepened them, added to them. Beyond question, he is a highly individualized composer in a musical world that runs to types and schools. In the first and the last movement, his brass is unmistakable. No other composer bids it to such sounds. If now and then they recalled his Pacific locomotive, that also was image of power. Both movements also beat hard to Honegger's short-cut rhythms. In the first he energizes them. They whip at his recurring major-sevenths and drive them forward. In the last he whirls them about with a lighter hand, in eager gusto. There are pages in this "Symphony for Orchestra" that out of bare force rise to stripped power, draw near to a like splendor. Pages, again, in the slow movement, that glow with the ardors of a new instrumental song. Pages once more, in the finale, that sound with wild fantasy. Pages to end that touch in modern idiom the serene beauty of which, some say, only the ancients had the secret. But from some corner of himself Honegger —"now living" as the all-observant program-book reminded us—may also draw it. Even conservative ears were touched. The commissioned symphonies had already renewed Stravinsky. Now they matured Honegger.

For all else brief chronicle suffices. Again Dr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra and Mme. Frijsh joined together to make the "Canticle of St. Francis" sound in Mr. Loeffler's listening ears as, writing, he had heard it in imagination. Again "Pagan Poem" was testimony to the qualities in his music that year in and year out preserve it in our concert-halls. For him also, when both pieces were ended, the warmths of those amongst whom he has dwelt and practised his calling. They may have counted his years; but it was his life and works that gave him honor. . . . Young Signor Pilati and his Suite for Strings and Piano also deserve a second sentence. Now that Honegger no longer loomed out of the middle distance, his preluding to the concert sounded less labored. There were pleasing measures—measures with the charm of Scarlatti, had the twentieth, and not the eighteenth, century held him.

S. S. ACTION STUNNED

...Allegro for strings, a work by no means new, but until a short time ago unknown to Boston. The Russian's piece was the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist, and the German's the "Symphonia Domestica."

If Dr. Koussevitzky is to banish growing doubts as to the importance of Elgar's orchestral music, the ever-fresh "Enigma Variations" aside, he must select for the purpose a more vital score than this Introduction and Allegro which, save for its genial opening section, is music of contrivance, interesting chiefly as a vehicle for virtuoso playing on the part of the orchestra's string choir. At least, few pieces for strings alone furnish a better test of its prowess, and perhaps that is reason enough for playing it.

There is also more of "effect" than substance in Stravinsky's Capriccio. Some of this music has to it a hollow ring, some of it does not avoid out-and-out banality, but the piece is made with such consummate skill and it offers such magnificent opportunity for the hard, dry brilliance that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, not to mention Mr. Sanroma, know how to achieve, that its performance deserves to rank among the outstanding events of the season. Last evening's audience, like three others in Boston and many more in other cities, responded warmly to it.

SOLOIST WITH ORCHESTRA

Globe Feb 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Serge Koussevitzky conductor, played for the fourth Monday evening concert, a program consisting of works by living composers. An audience that filled the hall heard appreciatively and applauded cordially Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Stravinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

The soloist in the Capriccio was Jesus Maria Sanroma, all-round pianist extraordinary, whose yeoman work in three out of the four pieces on last week's program was an outstanding achievement. For Stravinsky's piquant, stimulating and quite delightful music Sanroma found exactly the touch. He deserved all the plaudits he received from the audience.

Elgar's work, which was introduced here at a recent concert, is an honest musical score, put together with admirable craftsmanship and containing excellent musical ideas. Mr. Koussevitzky's insistent dramatizing of it was at the sacrifice of beautiful string tone. Similarly, the performance of the Strauss tone-poem, full blown as it was, tended to coarsen a score that to begin with is not over-refined. The performance was at its best in the moments of quiet, lyrical beauty.

With Stravinsky For the Fun of It

Trans Feb 17

THOSE who follow the Monday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra looked twice at yesterday's program before they were ready to believe what they saw. The startling name was Stravinsky. Usually the Monday concerts are conservative: Mozart, Beethoven, Chaikovsky and Wagner serve the day. The name most assiduously avoided is Stravinsky. Yet the evening passed safely and the heavens did not fall. What is more, Monday's audience actually clapped the new Caprice for Piano and Orchestra and appeared to have found it entertaining. As for the remainder of the program, Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" elicited the loudest and most prolonged applause, while Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra had to be content with mild approval.

Elgar's piece, which began the concert, pleased most in its first pages. These provided measures of imposing breadth and dignity. One imagined one felt in them the sturdiness of British character. Stately periods in unison and harmonies in vertical progression outlined an impressive musical proposition corresponding, in a way, to the introduction of a spoken oration. Then, lines joined; arguments grew to developed form; the complete statement rounded the case. It was in the middle sections partaking of a "working-out" character that the ear attended with slackening interest the composer's scholarly processes. Perhaps Mr. and Mrs. Average Listener, familiar with radio and community programs, expected some honest and obvious melodiousness after the manner of "Pomp and Circumstance," and were disappointed. Yet by the end of the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky's delicate sense of program symmetry was apparent. Balance may be obtained in instrumental effect as well as in mood and style. The "Symphonia Domestica" for the full panoplied orchestra; Stravinsky's Caprice for individual virtuosity; Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for the sheen of the strings. The strings, indeed, gave an excellent account of themselves in a performance of exemplary precision, unanimity and beauty of tone. It is a peculiar joy to hear them play together with such uniformity and expressiveness.

Stravinsky's Caprice has been received with undue solemnity in its few performances outside of Boston. It is doubtful if the composer intended to be taken so seriously. Last evening it sounded as music written for the pure sport of it. Tongue-in cheek, it makes play with familiar rhythms and tonal poses. The chattering woodwinds and chirping piano have a sly satirical slant. Questions and answers, quips and cranks, mock solemnities and lugubrious sonoroties chortle an inward kind of glee. No one less adroit and independent than Stravinsky could have given so free a reign to irresponsible fancy. Of "significant" material in the serious sense of the term, it is disarmingly barren; seriousness and significance scarcely were its motivating influences. The composer has called it a "Caprice," and such it is. As a concession, let it be admitted its wit would have been twice as pointed had Stravinsky's inventions been cut in half. Nothing humorous should be lengthy. Aside from the piece itself, Mr. Sanroma's brilliant performance of the piano part won instant delight.

Beside Stravinsky, Strauss is solid and satisfactory. The listener who does not warm to the "Symphonia Domestica" and feel a desire to sing aloud the exuberant melodies has lost touch with humanity; is friendless to the universal musical idiom of which Strauss remains the supreme master. As upon previous occassions, Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work exemplified anew his combined sense of the lyrical and the dramatic. As the music itself reveals a constructive ability unexcelled among contemporary composers, so Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestral performance disclosed the successful and artistic dramatist of musical tone.

N. M. J.

MUSIC

GLOBE FEB 15

Music Notes and Comment

Dr Koussevitzky will give the promised repetition of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" at this week's Symphony concerts in the regular series. This work seemed at a first hearing to be a masterpiece, if an austere and rather baffling one, so the repetition will be welcome. The novelty on this program will, rather curiously, be by Handel, a concerto grosso not previously played at these concerts.

On the program of the Monday concert tomorrow stands Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano, warmly welcomed by the subscribers in the regular series some weeks ago, and since acclaimed in New York. The soloist will again be Mr Sanroma, who surpassed himself in this exacting music.

There is no concert at Symphony Hall today, the first time in many seasons when none has been scheduled for a Sunday in midwinter. There is also no concert at Symphony Hall March 1. This is a sign of hard times in the concert business. Only a handful of celebrities can now assemble a large audience in this city. Presumably none of these was available.

MUSIC

Herald Feb 17

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the fourth of the current series of Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen the following program: Elgar, introduction and allegro for string orchestra, op. 47; Stravinsky, capriccio for piano and orchestra (soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma); Strauss, Symphonia Domestica, op. 53. The audience was, as usual, large.

The courtly and dignified figure of Sir Edward Elgar looms like a respected but neglected and half-forgotten ghost in the background of contemporary English music. English critics at regular intervals revive the legend of his greatness and deplore the failure of English orchestras to perform his symphonies. Edward J. Dent, one of the most learned of English writers on music, even went so far as to allow Elgar's portrait in full court dress to be printed as frontispiece to his translation of Adolf Weissmann's book, "The Problems of Modern Music," though it is difficult to think of any living composer whose work is more remote from those problems than that of this belated follower of Brahms. At its best his music has moments of vigor and mellow dignity; his melody, extraordinarily of uneven quality, reveals traces of an individual and recognizable idiom. The "Enigma Variations" are in his best manner; the "Introduction and Allegro" played yesterday is merely well meant. Elgar draws a rich sonority from the string orchestra for which the piece is written. But the vigor of the opening theme is not balanced by its inherent interest; the pseudo-Welsh tune that forms its principal subject is unconvincing and of poor quality; the development to which the thematic material is treated has little musical significance or beauty; the fugato seems mechanical and dry, but is only fair to say that the manner in which it was played—uniformly loud, and without discrimination between the important and the subsidiary strands of its musical texture—was not such as to do justice to it or to any other piece of contrapuntal music.

Mr. Sanroma and the orchestra between them gave an excellent performance of Stravinsky's "Capriccio"—a work little more than a year old. The literature of music is rich in "Capriccios," but few of them deserve the title so utterly as does Stravinsky's. Not merely by its fantastic rhythms and abruptly changing moods is it capricious; nor by its tumultous movement; but still more by its ironical conglomeration of outmoded musical styles and fashions, parodied and jumbled together in fragmentary allusions and imitations, from Thalberg and Johann Strauss to the jazz of the present day. The effect is dazzling and somewhat confusing until the ironic intent is guessed.

Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" was performed superbly by Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra. It was a performance that far surpassed that given recently at a pair of Friday and Saturday concerts. It was possible to enjoy the work thoroughly both as a prodigious divertissement—the product of the lighter moods of an unsurpassed and whimsical craftsman in sound—and as a richly beautiful and almost inexhaustibly interesting piece of music. Rarely has it been so possible to forget one's conviction that this is an inferior work of the composer. The applause was deservedly enthusiastic.

S. S.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN 4TH MONDAY CONCERT

Globe Feb 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky conducting, gave last evening the fourth concert of the current Monday evening series. The program, on which no item was more than 30 years old, comprised Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra," Op 47; Stravinsky's "Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra"; and Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist.

The Stravinsky work was first introduced here two months ago. It will be interesting to ascertain whether the love that bloomed for it in December will be flourishing in May. For as regards its texture, content, and general musical effect, repeated hearings do not make for a waxing favorable impression of it.

Last evening it occupied the middle of the program, and on either side Elgar's Allegro and Strauss' eternal symphony gleamed as gems of purest ray. There is, of course, no common ground of matter, spirit, or style in the three pieces, but the two works bearing the weight of nearly 30 years seemed by far the most masterly wrought, most vigorous and exhilarating.

Aside from its rather irritatingly common materials, the "Capriccio" is diffuse and tiresome because of its very form. Stravinsky's musical methods do not here transmute base metals into musical gold, and his capriciousness is rather self-conscious and ponderous. Possibly a symphony ought not to be compared with a caprice, but beside the Stravinsky work, Honegger's new and terrifically dissonant symphony rears as a monument of classicism, logic, and power.

Elgar's "Allegro" may lack subtlety and profundity, but it exerts no little appeal on the heart and mind. The harmonic richness, the sturdy fugato, the frank and appealing, if simple, melodies all bid righteously and justly for a long life on orchestra programs.

Strauss' symphony, monstrous though it occasionally may be, is undeniably fascinating. And here, indeed, is an example of the redemption by masterly musical methods of less worthy musical materials.

The program was splendidly played. The depth and glow of the Symphony's acknowledged incomparable strings in the Elgar work were something to be treasured in memory. Mr Sanroma gave a brilliant performance of the difficult piano part of the "Capriccio."

The next Monday evening concert will be given on March 16.

Players --- Music and Musicians

Lifelong Silhouette

The Younger Koussevitzky (Colby)

From the Book Describing his Concert-Giving Voyage down the Volga, Included in the Current Exhibition at Symphony Hall

Music

Monday Symphony

Last night in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the fourth concert in the Monday evening series. J. M. Sanromá, pianist, was the soloist. The program comprised Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra and the "Symphonia Domestica," by Strauss.

At the conclusion of Elgar's work, one wondered if Dr. Koussevitzky had deliberately set himself the task of revealing the finish now attained by the string sections of this orchestra. Based upon a pseudo-Welsh tune, the composition requires the utmost of the players who perform it. Resonance, nuance, a fine attention to detail, yet without too great attention to trifles, are items upon which both conductor and orchestra are required to concentrate. The work is broadly conceived and last night was given a masterly reading. Seldom has the listener been privileged to hear the sonorities of the strings more completely disclosed. A performance reflecting credit alike to composer, conductor and players.

Nor could Dr. Koussevitzky have more completely revealed the characteristics, in composition, of Stravinsky and Strauss than by adroitly placing them in juxtaposition on the program. Each work, speaking in general terms, allows the listener considerable latitude in visualization. Each composer prefers that his audience make its own interpretation of the music.

Treating the piano as an obbligato instrument, Stravinsky writes for it measures which tax the resources of instrument and performer. But of course, one has come to take for granted that the resources of Mr. Sanromá are equal to any demands which even a Stravinsky may make. The young man did not disappoint us. Clean-cut, intelligent work marked his entire performance, projected against a background of orchestral color both piquant and brilliant.

After this the piquancies of Strauss seemed less sparkling, yet no doubt to many in the audience of far more satisfying quality. At least the "Symphonia Domestica" brings the hearer to an occasional restful cadence. It also provides measures of melodic beauty which fall gratefully upon ears which sometimes tingle unwillingly to the dissonances of "these moderns." A distinguished performance which brought to a close another program reflecting credit upon conductor and performers alike.

G. M. S.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Burgin, first violinist of the symphony Orchestra, will play the solo-part in Mendelssohn's Concerto with the People's Orchestra next Sunday afternoon in Jordan Hall. For relative rarities the program also includes Chaikovsky's "Italian Caprice"; Elgar's overture, "Cockaigne," of London sounds and sights; a Concerto Grosso by Locatelli.

Mr. Gebhard went to New York last week to play the piano-part in Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" at four concerts of the Philharmonic Society. He was the original pianist in the piece t five years ago. He has now "ass in it more than forty times.

A letter from Hamburg to th York Sun contains a paragraph Dr. Muck and his present orchest

His conducting has all the patrician qualities of old, and under him the Hamburg Philharmonic plays much as did the Boston Orchestra. . . . There is to be no more Baireuth for Muck. He confirmed the report that he is not going back next summer. "Thirty years is enough," he said. "Since Siegfried Wagner is dead, Baireuth is not the same to me any more."

The newspapers in Berlin speak warmly of Alexander Borovsky, who will come to Boston to play piano-pieces in the Bach Festival next month. "Indubitably one of the finest Bach-players of the day."

Aaron Copland, whose Symphonic Ode for the fiftieth year of the Boston Orchestra has yet to be heard at Symphony Hall, is commissioned at short notice to write the incidental music for the Theater Guild's new play, "The Verdun Miracle."

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION,

Bach Festival in Boston.

A Bach festival of orchestral, choral and chamber music works will be given in Boston March 24-29 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata Club.

One of the features of the festival will be the two performances of the "Mass in B Minor," which will be given for the first time in Boston in its entirety. The soloists will be Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone, surely a splendid quartet. The Mass will be given on Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. It will be given in two parts, commencing at 4.30 o'clock, lasting until 6.30, and recommencing at 8.30 o'clock.

On Wednesday, March 25, the featured work will be the Prelude and Fugue and Fantasia for Harpischord, Mme. Patorni-Casadesus being the soloist. Thursday, the 26th, the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 2" with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, will be heard in addition to the "Piano Concerto in D Minor," played by Alexander Borovsky, the "Magnificat" for chorus and orchestra and "Suite for Orchestra No. 1 in C Major." Two cantatas will be sung on Friday the 27th. "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," and in addition one will hear the "Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D" and the "Concerto for Two Violins." Saturday night the cantatas "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein fest Burg" will be sung and also on the program will be the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 5" with solo piano, violin and flute. "Preludes and Fugues" for solo piano will be played. The festival closes Sunday the 29th with a repetition of the Mass.

One usually has to go to Bethlehem, Pa., for a Bach Festival but these fine programs, so near by, will the opportunity for many music rs in this vicinity to hear them. t year the orchestra sponsored a ahms Festival which was a great ccess and attracted listeners from any points.

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Berlioz' "Fantastic" and Stravinsky's New Work

GLOBE 21

Dr Koussevitzky put two symphonies on yesterday's Symphony concert program, Stravinsky's new "Symphonie de Psaumes," first performed earlier this season, and Berlioz' "Fantastic," a masterpiece too seldom heard of late years. To these he prefixed an unfamiliar and very dull Handel concerto grosso. This program was one of the longest and one of the most taxing to the listener's attention, that one can recall. It was not over until 4:40.

The repetition of Stravinsky's masterpiece was welcome. A second hearing convinced one that this symphony of psalms will remain in the repertory and grow upon the listener with familiarity. Yesterdays applause was longer and more hearty than that at the first performance last December. Both the chorus, from the Cecilia Society, and the orchestra surpassed their achievement at the premiere. Yesterday the intricate score was more clearly and more brilliantly interpreted than before.

Those who still deem Stravinsky a clever poseur, a mere juggler with rhythms and orchestral timbres, should listen to the last movement of this symphony, one of the noblest hymns of praise ever written. Its great emotional power comes from its melody and harmony. Here is none of the ostentation of the 19th century type of apotheosis, ending in a blare of sound and fury. This music is more noisy than Mozart's "Requiem" and quite as impressive.

His Own Language

The first two movements are as original, but again at a second hearing one cannot quite grasp them as a whole, either imaginatively or intellectually. Stravinsky throughout this symphony is speaking his own musical language, with no attempt at neoclassicism, or at daring cleverness.

What he is saying seems as new as his means of expression. One can catch bits of his meaning, but not his whole argument. This is not program music, but absolute music, as independent of nonmusical phenomena as is Mozart's work.

Berlioz wrote the symphony heard yesterday over a century ago, but writers about music still fail to agree about its qualities. Everyone concedes the uncanny cleverness of the scoring for orchestra, but to some the harmony is amateurish, the melody nonexistent, the technique crude. To others, including the writer, Berlioz is one of the few 19th-century composers whose music has gained rather than lost in attractiveness in the past 20 years. It is hard to believe this "Fantastic Symphony" was written in 1830, so much in it anticipates the later work of Wagner, even that of Debussy, even Stravinsky.

19th Century Melody

A tune to the average 19th century writer was a luscious and obvious thing. Most 19th century melody after Beethoven and Schubert was headed straight for the kind of thing it ended in, say, Massenet's "Elegie." Most musicians today are weary of Massenet's "Elegie." Some even grow weary of Schumann and Chopin and Liszt. But Berlioz' melody might be that of a contemporary of Honegger. His workmanship as a writer for orchestra is notably superior to that of so able a present day technician as Respighi. His music still stirs the pulse, still touches the heart, despite the absence of polyphonic texture, and the romantic overemphasis of every mood.

Berlioz was, however, a genuine romantic, as readers of his memoirs, one of the most interesting books ever written by a musician, do not need to be reminded. He was all his life a surexcited dreamer, always on the heights or in the depths, never calm, not even in old age. His music in its fever of passion expresses the man himself, and not the artistic fashions of the Parisian 1830s.

Yesterday's performance of the Berlioz was an unusually eloquent and sympathetic one, brilliant in the best sense of a much abused adjective. One wishes Dr Koussevitzky would revive other symphonies, say the "Harold in Italy" of Berlioz.

P. R.

SYMPHONY IN HOMAGE TO BERLIOZ

By MOSES SMITH

Handel's Concerto Grosso in G minor, Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony and Stravinsky's "Psalms" Symphony — the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries parading side by side—constitute the program of the current pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yesterday's performance of the "Fantastic," which has not been heard here in more than five years, was in the nature of a centennial, for the work was first played on December 5, 1830. For a century it has been proclaimed a masterpiece, a revolutionary advance in the art of orchestration over that of the almost contemporary Beethoven.

This historical interest remains, but the performance of yesterday served to show what a bore so much of the music itself has become. The long first movement, with its exasperating changes of pace, explainable only by an involved literary program, no longer has the effect Berlioz intended. Perhaps it never had; mayhap Berlioz was himself too moved to express himself articulately. Moreover, for all his genius, he lacked many of the fundamental requisites of a composer's training.

The Symphony was eloquently rendered yesterday. It was as if Dr. Koussevitzky attempted to convince himself—and his audience—that the work has not yet lost its hold. The two last movements, the March to the Scaffold and the Witches' Sabbath, are the most obvious, but still the most effective. It was a pity that many in the audience, become impatient at the length of the program, left before these two movements had been played.

The Stravinsky Symphony, first heard here in December, was more impressive to this writer on second hearing, and seemed a worthy addition to the list written this year especially for the Boston Symphony. Yet again we are convinced that there is much dross with the gold; that much of the orchestral writing is artificial, forced, intellectual—in a word, a pose. The Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, sang beautifully in this difficult music.

Music

Monday Feb 17

Monday Symphony

Last night in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the fourth concert in the Monday evening series. J. M. Sanromá, pianist, was the soloist. The program comprised Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra and the "Symphonia Domestica," by Strauss.

At the conclusion of Elgar's work, one wondered if Dr. Koussevitzky had deliberately set himself the task of revealing the finish now attained by the string sections of this orchestra. Based upon a pseudo-Welsh tune, the composition requires the utmost of the players who perform it. Resonance, nuance, a fine attention to detail, yet without too great attention to trifles, are items upon which both conductor and orchestra are required to concentrate. The work is broadly conceived and last night was given a masterly reading. Seldom has the listener been privileged to hear the sonorities of the strings more completely disclosed. A performance reflecting credit alike to composer, conductor and players.

Nor could Dr. Koussevitzky have more completely revealed the characteristics, in composition, of Stravinsky and Strauss than by adroitly placing them in juxtaposition on the program. Each work, speaking in general terms, allows the listener considerable latitude in visualization. Each composer prefers that his audience make its own interpretation of the music.

Treating the piano as an obbligato instrument, Stravinsky writes for it measures which tax the resources of instrument and performer. But of course, one has come to take for granted that the resources of Mr. Sanromá are equal to any demands which even a Stravinsky may make. The young man did not disappoint us. Clean-cut, intelligent work marked his entire performance, projected against a background of orchestral color both piquant and brilliant.

After this the piquancies of Strauss seemed less sparkling, yet no doubt to many in the audience of far more satisfying quality. At least the "Symphonia Domestica" brings the hearer to an occasional restful cadence. It also provides measures of melodic beauty which fall gratefully upon ears which sometimes tingle unwillingly to the dissonances of "these moderns." A distinguished performance which brought to a close another program reflecting credit upon conductor and performers alike.

G. M. S.

Incidents and Prospects

Hans Feb. 19

Mr. Burgin, first violinist of the symphony Orchestra, will play the solo-part in Mendelssohn's Concerto with the People's Orchestra next Sunday afternoon in Jordan Hall. For relative rarities the program also includes Chaikovsky's "Italian Caprice"; Elgar's overture, "Cockaigne," of London sounds and sights; a Concerto Grosso by Locatelli.

Mr. Gebhard went to New York last week to play the piano-part in Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" at four concerts of the Philharmonic Society. He was the original pianist in the piece twenty-five years ago. He has now "assistied" in it more than forty times.

A letter from Hamburg to the New York Sun contains a paragraph about Dr. Muck and his present orchestra.

> His conducting has all the patrician qualities of old, and under him the Hamburg Philharmonic plays much as did the Boston Orchestra. . . . There is to be no more Baireuth for Muck. He confirmed the report that he is not going back next summer. "Thirty years is enough," he said. "Since Siegfried Wagner is dead, Baireuth is not the same to me any more."

The newspapers in Berlin speak warmly of Alexander Borovsky, who will come to Boston to play piano-pieces in the Bach Festival next month. "Indubitably one of the finest Bach-players of the day."

Aaron Copland, whose Symphonic Ode for the fiftieth year of the Boston Orchestra has yet to be heard at Symphony Hall, is commissioned at short notice to write the incidental music for the Theater Guild's new play, "The Verdun Miracle."

layers --- Music and Musicians

Lifelong Silhouette

The Younger Koussevitzky (Colby)

From the Book Describing his Concert-Giving Voyage down the Volga, Included in the Current Exhibition at Symphony Hall

FEB. 21 —

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

SPRINGFIELD UNION, 1931

Berlioz' "Fantastic" and Stravinsky's New Work

GLOBE 21

Dr Koussevitzky put two symphonies on yesterday's Symphony concert program, Stravinsky's new "Symphonie de Psaumes," first performed earliier this season, and Berlioz' "Fantastic," a masterpiece too seldom heard of late years. To these he prefixed an unfamiliar and very dull Handel concerto grosso. This program was one of the longest and one of the most taxing to the listener's attention, that one can recall. It was not over until 4:40.

The repetition of Stravinsky's masterpiece was welcome. A second hearing convinced one that this symphony of psalms will remain in the repertory and grow upon the listener with familiarity. Yesterdays applause was longer and more hearty than that at the first performance last December. Both the chorus, from the Cecilia Society, and the orchestra surpassed their achievement at the premiere. Yesterday the intricate score was more clearly and more brilliantly interpreted than before.

Those who still deem Stravinsky a clever poseur, a mere juggler with rhythms and orchestral timbres, should listen to the last movement of this symphony, one of the noblest hymns of praise ever written. Its great emotional power comes from its melody and harmony. Here is none of the ostentation of the 19th century type of apotheosis, ending in a blare of sound and fury. This music is more noisy than Mozart's "Requiem" and quite as impressive.

His Own Language

The first two movements are as original, but again at a second hearing one cannot quite grasp them as a whole, either imaginatively or intellectually. Stravinsky throughout this symphony is speaking his own musical language, with no attempt at neoclassicism, or at daring cleverness.

What he is saying seems as new as his means of expression. One can catch bits of his meaning, but not his whole argument. This is not program music, but absolute music, as independent of nonmusical phenomena as is Mozart's work.

Berlioz wrote the symphony heard yesterday over a century ago, but writers about music still fail to agree about its qualities. Everyone concedes the uncanny cleverness of the scoring for orchestra, but to some the harmony is amateurish, the melody nonexistent, the technique crude. To others, including the writer, Berlioz is one of the few 19th-century composers whose music has gained rather than lost in attractiveness in the past 20 years. It is hard to believe this "Fantastic Symphony" was written in 1830, so much in it anticipates the later work of Wagner, even that of Debussy, even Stravinsky.

19th Century Melody

A tune to the average 19th century writer was a luscious and obvious thing. Most 19th century melody after Beethoven and Schubert was headed straight for the kind of thing it ended in, say, Massenet's "Elegie." Most musicians today are weary of Massenet's "Elegie." Some even grow weary of Schumann and Chopin and Liszt. But Berlioz' melody might be that of a contemporary of Honegger. Hi workmanship as a writer for orchestra is notably superior to that of so able a present day technician as Respighi. His music still stirs the pulse, still touches the heart, despite the absence of polyphonic texture, and the romantic overemphasis of every mood.

Berlioz was, however, a genuine romantic, as readers of his memoirs, one of the most interesting books ever written by a musician, do not need to be reminded. He was all his life a surexcited dreamer, always on the heights or in the depths, never calm, not even in old age. His music in its fever of passion expresses the man himself, and not the artistic fashions of the Parisian 1830s.

Yesterday's performance of the Berlioz was an unusually eloquent and sympathetic one, brilliant in the best sense of a much abused adjective. One wishes Dr Koussevitzky would revive other symphonies, say the "Harold in Italy" of Berlioz.

P. R.

Bach Festival in Boston.

A Bach festival of orchestral, choral and chamber music works will be given in Boston March 24-29 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata Club.

One of the features of the festival will be the two performances of the "Mass in B Minor," which will be given for the first time in Boston in its entirety. The soloists will be Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone, surely a splendid quartet. The Mass will be given on Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. It will be given in two parts, commencing at 4.30 o'clock, lasting until 6.30, and recommencing at 8.30 o'clock.

On Wednesday, March 25, the featured work will be the Prelude and Fugue and Fantasia for Harpischord, Mme. Patorni-Casadesus being the soloist. Thursday, the 26th, the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 2" with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, will be heard in addition to the "Piano Concerto in D Minor," played by Alexander Borovsky, the "Magnificat" for chorus and orchestra and "Suite for Orchestra No. 1 in C Major." Two cantatas will be sung on Friday the 27th. "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O, Ewigkeit," and in addition one will hear the "Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D" and the "Concerto for Two Violins." Saturday night the cantatas "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein fest Burg" will be sung and also on the program will be the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 5" with solo piano, violin and flute. "Preludes and Fugues" for solo piano will be played. The festival closes Sunday the 29th with a repetition of the Mass.

One usually has to go to Bethlehem, Pa., for a Bach Festival but these fine programs, so near by, will > the opportunity for many music rs in this vicinity to hear them. t year the orchestra sponsored a hms Festival which was a great ccess and attracted listeners from ny points.

SYMPHONY IN HOMAGE TO BERLIOZ

AMER. Feb 21

By MOSES SMITH

Handel's Concerto Grosso in G minor, Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony and Stravinsky's "Psalms" Symphony — the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries parading side by side—constitute the program of the current pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yesterday's performance of the "Fantastic," which has not been heard here in more than five years, was in the nature of a centennial, for the work was first played on December 5, 1830. For a century it has been proclaimed a masterpiece, a revolutionary advance in the art of orchestration over that of the almost contemporary Beethoven.

This historical interest remains, but the performance of yesterday served to show what a bore so much of the music itself has become. The long first movement, with its exasperating changes of pace, explainable only by an involved literary program, no longer has the effect Berlioz intended. Perhaps it never had; mayhap Berlioz was himself too moved to express himself articulately. Moreover, for all his genius, he lacked many of the fundamental requisites of a composer's training.

The Symphony was eloquently rendered yesterday. It was as if Dr. Koussevitzky attempted to convince himself—and his audience—that the work has not yet lost its hold. The two last movements, the March to the Scaffold and the Witches' Sabbath, are the most obvious, but still the most effective. It was a pity that many in the audience, become impatient at the length of the program, left before these two movements had been played.

The Stravinsky Symphony, first heard here in December, was more impressive to this writer on second hearing, and seemed a worthy addition to the list written this year especially for the Boston Symphony. Yet again we are convinced that there is much dross with the gold; that much of the orchestral writing is artificial, forced, intellectual—in a word, a pose. The Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, sang beautifully in this difficult music.

HERALD FEB 20

MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 16th concert of its 50th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, G minor, op 6 No 6; Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus (Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, its conductor); Berlioz, Symphonie Fantastique.

Seldom has anything more beautiful been heard in Symphony hall than the latter half of Stravinsky's 150th psalm as it was performed yesterday. Seldom has there been a more dramatic performance of any work than that of the "Fantastic" symphony as it was interpreted by Dr. Koussevitzky and played by Boston's superb orchestra. Much might be said about the two works themselves: Stravinsky's Three Psalms composed in 1930 for the orchestra's jubilee; the symphony of Berlioz, composed in 1830 and first performed in that year.

When one remembers that Beethoven had died only a few years before Berlioz wrote his symphony; that Schubert also had died; that Schumann and Wagner were not known as composers; one must regard this audacious work of Berlioz as nothing less than marvelous. No predecessor had given him hints for orchestration; he invented his own system; he thought and wrote orchestrally. Liszt, Meyerbeer, Wagner, Strauss, the Russian school, in fact the musical world of the last century is indebted deeply to Hector Berlioz. Without him all would have been sadly at a loss.

Yet it is the fashion today in some quarters to sneer at his harmonic schemes, to say that his melodic vein is thin and feeble. The Oxford crowd in it supercilious way speak flippantly of him; even in New York, the young lions of the press put him in the ranks of the impotent. The English philistines have met a valiant champion of Berlioz in no less a critic than Ernest Newman.

Another charge brought against Berlioz is that he was hysterically romantic. When he wrote this symphony, it was in a romantic period. The leading poets, novelists, dramatists, painters of France were then all wildly romantic. What we now decry as unaesthetic exaggeration was in the air. Not till his blood had cooked did Berlioz join classicists with his Virgilian opera "Les Troyers." In the 30's his passion also influenced his art. One may smile in this age of machinery at the frantic love of Berlioz for the Irish actress; at the program of the "Fantastic" symphony, written when he was not 27 years old; but there's no denying the genius shown in this work, the genius that has kept this music alive in spite of a few cheap or arid pages; for there is the imagination, the poetic sensitiveness that we rightly associate with genius. If one would gladly shorten the "Scene in the Fields" what is to be said against that masterpiece the "March to the Scaffold," with its haunting, nightmarish rhythm, its ghostly chatter of the bassoons, its mocking shouts of brass? Or who does not find beauty in the first movement, brilliance in the second, and a demoniacal spirit in the Finale?

Mr. Newman has wisely said that the harmonies of Berlioz suited exactly his aims; that however strange they may seem on paper, they are justified when they are heard. As for the charge of failure as a melodist, there are the songs; there is the pathetic air of Marguerite in "The Damnation of Faust"; the "Farewell of the Shepherds" in "The Childhood of Christ"; the grand arias in "Les Troyens."

Stravinsky's "Psalms," the third in order still seems to be the most musical, the most original in treatment. There are fine moments in the two preceding, but the orchestral portion at times is labored and unnatural, not in the spirit of the text; often at war with the choral expression and warring without justification. But the third Psalm is an answer to those who say that Stravinsky is now merely a man of patterns and rhythms; a man whose inspiration has fled, not to return.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week as announced comprises the Prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwentoline"; Hill's new symphony (first time); Beethoven's Violin concerto (Mr. Heifetz, violinist) and the overture to "Egmont."

SYMPHONY CONCERT VERY LONG

POST FEB 21

Handel, Stravinsky and Berlioz Make Up List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was one of the longest of recent seasons. Yet there have been many that offered more music in the narrower sense of the term. Only the Concerto Grosso of Handel, No. 6 in G minor, with which the afternoon began, gave the listener 100 cents on the musical dollar.

ANOTHER CENTENNIAL

But two other pieces made this generous programme: the one, Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," composed for the present golden jubilee year of the Symphony Orchestra and first performed here last December; the other, Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which reached its 100th birthday on the fifth of the same month and was played yesterday in somewhat belated commemoration of that anniversary.

A second hearing of Stravinsky's so-called Symphony clarified certain impressions and resulted in a much more satisfactory performance by the chorus of the Cecilia Society of the generally ungrateful measures that fell to its lot. To be fair to the composer, this rehearing did bring to light certain striking effects that at first either went unheeded or were speedily forgotten. But it did not efface the conviction prompted by the first performance that this music is the work of an enormously clever man who was once a genius.

If Stravinsky had written as rewardingly for the voices as he has for the instruments, the work would afford more consistent pleasure. But the choral writing is too often not merely dissonant, but muddy and unsonorous. The play of timbres that make linear counter-point and atonal and polytonal writing effective for the orchestra does not operate, at least in the same degree, in the case of the chorus.

The most successful parts of the work are the first movement, which has a certain primitive strength, the orchestral introduction to the second, which conveys a far more definite emotion than does the succeeding choral part, and the last half of the third movement. But here, as was observed in these columns before, Stravinsky's music reminds us of the finale that one Giocomo Puccini contrived for the first act of his opera "Tosca."

Berlioz's Music Fades

None can take away from Berlioz the glory that is his for having invented, perhaps created is the better word, the modern art and science of orchestration. That the "Fantastic" should have come upon the world when it did seems today more than ever incredible. But alas, while Berlioz's command of orchestral resources at that distant day still causes us to gasp and stare, his music has faded sadly. There are persuasive pages in the first section, passages of genuine tonal poetry. The ensuing dance-scene is brilliant and alluring—as a whole, by far the strongest movement of the five. The "Scene in the Fields" is as empty of musical interest as it is long drawn out, the "March to the Scaffold" no longer sends shivers down our backs and the "Witches' Sabbath" has dwindled into a flat and tasteless racket.

Conductor and orchestra labored valiantly with the Symphony yesterday and were rewarded by warm and long continued applause on the part of those members of the audience who had not departed discouraged after the third movement.

Music

Monitor Feb 21

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The "Fantastic" Symphony of Hector Berlioz holds an important place in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It stood upon the program that Friday afternoon, now nearly 11 years ago, when the "strike" was precipitated that for a time threatened the existence of the orchestra. Do not misunderstand; it was not Berlioz's music that caused the strike of a majority of the players. They walked out in sympathy with the then concertmaster, who was dismissed on the technical ground that he had refused to obey Pierre Monteux's signal to the orchestra to rise and share the applause for an excellent performance of the "Fantastic."

For this reason, and because the score is a century old, and because controversy over the merits of its composer has been raging in Europe recently, and because Dr. Koussevitzky excels in riding the musical tempest, it was a pleasure to see this symphony restored to the active list for the concerts of Feb. 20 and 21. Now that memories have been revived, and curiosities satisfied, we shall not repine if the score is put back on the shelf for a long rest.

For the important thing about the "Fantastic" Symphony is that it is 100 years old. When it was first performed, as Mr. Hale's program notes reminded us, Beethoven and Schubert had only recently passed on, Schumann had just obtained his mother's permission to study music, Verdi was a student at Busseto, César Franck was eight years old, Wagner was studying at Leipzig, and Brahms and Tchaikovsky were unborn. Therefore, though we smile at the composer's naïve extravagances, his absurd theatricalities and his banal musical material, let us not fail to marvel at the genius which enabled him to blaze the way for modern orchestration and for the symphonic poem. Perhaps this symphony should be played only in a musical equivalent of Mr. Morley's lamented Old Rialto Theater, Hoboken; or perhaps it should be kept in the museum or the classroom. Nevertheless, but for its author, it is unlikely that Liszt, Rimsky-Korsakoff or Strauss could have accomplished what they did. Conductor and orchestra did all they could for the piece, and won for themselves a generous reward of applause from an audience that had been kept in its seats half an hour longer than usual.

In 2031 will paragraphs like the above be written about Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra with chorus, one of the Boston Orchestra's jubilee presents, which was heard for the second time this season? We hope not, because a second hearing tended to confirm our first impression that it is among the more individual and characteristic works of its composer, ranking no doubt below the "Sacre" and the "Noces," but probably above the "Œdipus Rex." The Cecilia Society Chorus (trained by Arthur Fiedler) and the orchestra distinguished themselves in the performance.

That imp of overstraining which always lurks at Dr. Koussevitzky's elbow again got control of his baton in the Handel Concerto Grosso in G minor, op. 6, no. 6, and obtained from this fine body of players some very ragged entries and a negation of the flow which belongs to Handelian music.

L. A. S.

Conductor and Orchestra at Full Stature

TRANS. FEB 21

Stravinsky's Summit in the Psalms — Berlioz as He Imagined Himself

IT IS a year of anniversaries at the Symphony Concerts. The orchestra has been marking its own jubilee with a repetition of its first pair of concerts under its first conductor; with the intermittent performance of commissioned works. There are additional rites to come. Not until next May, possibly, will they all be fulfilled. Into the midst of things careless time chose to drop other anniversaries. At mid-January Mozart passed his one hundred seventy-fifth birthday. Performances of his Symphony in G minor noted it. A fortnight later Mr. Loeffler was seventy years old. A week ago half a program fell to him, with his fellow townsmen standing at salute. On the fifth day of December in 1830, Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony was born into the Parisian world. Dr. Koussevitzky would signalize its century of existence in the active repertory of many orchestras. Yesterday he found opportunity. The piece filled the second half of the longest Symphony Concert within recollection. It continued through nearly an hour. At the end of the March to the Scaffold came a burst of irrepressible clapping. At the close of the whole Symphony the audience forgot the speedy exit customary on Fridays; lingered obstinately until orchestra as well as conductor had received its plaudits. True, there were noticeable departures at the pause midway—after the "Scene in the Fields." Even so, there was no questioning the pervasive interest and pleasure.

In the fifty years of the Symphony Orchestra the Fantastic Symphony has been played at fourteen pairs of concerts. No longer ago than 1920, it was repeated, "by general request," at a second pair in the same season. In the time of Dr. Muck, who disliked it, though he was quite willing to play the super-romantic Liszt, it fell out of the repertory for nine years. Dr. Kouss vitzky has not returned to it since the autumn of 1925. None the less, "The Fantastic" is in good standing with the Bostonian public of symphonic music—so good that visiting conductors, with no subscribing audience, have ventured it, like Mr. Weingartner within long memory.

It is difficult to believe that this continuing audience is versed in the records and the legends of Berlioz' storm-ridden twenties. Except as it scans the program-book at each re-hearing of the Fantastic Symphony, it is probably unaware of his amours with the actress, Smithson, or of the retaliation he believed he had wrought into his music. Nor does it read in his letters and discover the vast and frenetic design in which he also composed it. Last year the Parisians celebrated the centenary of the Romantics of 1830 in all the arts. To us Americans they are less known and we take them less seriously. But along comes the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz—their spokesman in music—and a Bostonian audience listens intently through an hour; then applauds with unmistakable emotion.

Now through all these fifty years the reputation of Berlioz has been steadily undermined. In his youth—we have been told—he wrote romantic rodomontade; at maturity affected a pale classicism. It is the early Berlioz who survives in the concert-hall and there—the indictment continues—he poses and rants, the perpetual barnstormer. He cannot invent a melody; or if he does, it loses the way and dies of exhaustion as it crosses instrumental waste-lands. He imagined this, that and the other; he felt, as the French say, énormément; but no such a would he transfer these images and sensations to music-paper than he was frustrated. He believes himself burning with white or red flame; in the outcome is only bathetic or lurid. His counterpoint is enept; his harmony sterile. Even his orchestral voices, with which traditionally he excelled, have dwindled and hollowed in these days of Strauss and Ravel, Rimsky-Korsakov and Stravinsky.

Finally, the romantic flood on which the Parisian generation of 1830 floated to fame, receded long since. Their ark, which was the romantic convention, is now dry. Yet. We ought to hear the Fantastic Symphony as indifferently as we sit before Hugo's "Hernani" in the theater or as detachedly as we survey Delacroix's "Death of Sardanapalus" in a memorial exhibition. Who now reads the narrative poems of Byron, unless they are set as college task; or pulls down the poetry of Hugo when he has an evening among his books? By all the exercises of reason the youthful Berlioz ought to be equally unfashionable and in disuse.

Yet the Fantastic Symphony recurs in the concert-hall: two or three overtures keep it company; now and then even "Harold in Italy" gains place. By the customary signs, the usual audience hears them gladly; even at "Harold" neither balks nor grins. If the onlooker chooses to be abstract and philosophical, he may say that romantic impulse and romantic sensibility linger eternal in human nature. The fervors and frenzies of the romanticists of 1830 are indeed relegated to the mental and the emotional garret; but when by chance or design they are fetched down and paraded again, we hear and see, first interested, then stirred. Who knows? A romantic renascence may be waiting around the corner, even in a machine age. Meanwhile ghosts of the romantic past haunt the premises; may seem, for the instant, less shades than substance.

In the theater and the concert-hall performance may bring that moment. Before the Comédie-Française declined into a house of mistresses and walking gentlemen it was possible to sit before "Hernani" or "Ruy Blas" and receive the veritable illusion that Hugo would evoke; to know the thrill that traversed his romantic time. Not so long ago in New York Mr. Toscanini almost resuscitated "Harold in Italy." Yesterday, in Symphony Hall, we heard the Fantastic Symphony of Dr. Koussevitzky and his present orchestra; while out of it, and often enough to be engrossing, emerged the Fantastic Symphony that Berlioz imagined and believed he had put on music-paper. Of course, no conductor can draw from a piece of music what, manifestly, it does not contain; but by conjuring and transmitting imagination he can, on a fortunate day, release what the self-deceiving composer left semi-articulate. Dr. Koussevitzky has no more precious or triumphant quality than his ability to believe to the utmost, at rehearsal or performance, in the pages open before him. That faith sharpens his insight, warms his imagination, intensifies his imparting powers.

Berlioz' "idée fixe"—the motiv that symbolizes the haunting beloved and therefore haunts the whole Fantastic Symphony—is no remarkable invention. It is paltry beside the motivs of Wagner or the more significant themes of Strauss. The scornful may even liken it to salon melody. Yet as it emerged yesterday, as it wandered through the whole music, Dr. Koussevitzky, and the orchestra doing his will, so shaped and colored it, so prepared its entrances and returns, so manipulated Berlioz' counterpoint—as in the waltz at the ball—that it gained tonal vitality and seldom failed of illusion. Berlioz' "Dreams and Passions" are obviously neither Beethoven's nor Brahms's; but they have their own quality of romantic restlessness, tossing no-whither, tortured by they know not what. From Berlioz' measures, the divining conductor drew it. Persuading himself that he was Berlioz' haunted lover, Dr. Koussevitzky made the waltz sound sensuously, from afar, upon a trembling air—which is to give it romantic voice.

A hundred years on, in this our particular time, the meditative Scene in the Fields seems over-long and overwrought. Call more or less of it, if the listener likes, romantic elaboration, hollow within. By these very tokens, it is next of kin to the long, decorative, furbelowed speeches in Hugo's dramas. (Remember Charles V. before the tomb of Charlemagne in "Hernani"). Such music, such poetry, has reason in its rhetoric, by that rhetoric lives. It must be declaimed, not spoken; in the actor or the conductor is its final and compelling being. Dr. Koussevitzky manipulated this third movement elaborately; sung it rhetorically. Throughout it was alive again.

Conductor and orchestra must agree whole-heartedly to the tonal spectacle of the March to Execution, the frenetic fantasy and parody of the Witches' Sabbath. Doubt them for a moment, and thereafter performance only shams. But launch them as so much melodrama in tones and they prevail. When the brass travesties the "Dies Iræ," Berlioz believed he was blaspheming. Such music is not intended to make sense. It is designed and written as pure sensation. Dr. Koussevitzky took Berlioz at his word went him better, and hearing was near to believing. There is no other way in these days. Berlioz must be acted, staged, infused and intensified with an artful rhetoric. He must be performed as an act of faith. Then he speaks with his own voice; moves in his own image; sounds and illudes upon an audience seized and possessed.

It was indeed an afternoon of the unexpected. To the repertory of the string choir, Dr. Koussevitzky added a Concerto Grosso of Handel, hitherto unheard "at these concerts"—Number Six, in G minor, of Opus 9, in the usual five movements. Anticipation ran easily: a stately, sonorous Preludium or Overture; a slow movement unfolding in the deep curve of amply fashioned, warmly felt melody; quick movements of running figures or lively counterpoint. Instead, came a first movement almost wholly contrapuntal, strand woven against strand; restlessly phrased and accented, grave and troubled of mood. To it succeeded a terse fugue of contrast. Next an extended Musette believing the dance that named it; again an austere, brooding, closely wrought music, forswearing rich melody and propulsive march.

For ending, two brief and rather mechanical Allegros, added, like an afterthought, to round out a form and fulfill the expectation of an eighteenth-century audience. Enough for Handel that in the first three movements he had expressed himself: with the end of the Musette was done. Seemingly a perturbed mood had beset him, to be released in this hard-surfaced counterpoint. Self-absorbed, he had put by his usual expansiveness. The string choir, used oftenest as a whole, gave him the edgy power he asked. A puzzled audience applauded meagerly.

Middle piece was the promised repetition, from last December, of Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony," soon to be conveyed to New York for double performance there with the chorus of the Schola Cantorum. Again, the orchestra was reconstituted and rescated according to the composer's prescriptions. Mr. Sanromá and Mr. Fiedler took place at the two pianos. The Cecilia provided the chorus, more confident, and therefore more spirited, with their long diatonic periods. Under repetition, the studious listener grasped more clearly the singular and intricate fugue in the second division; heard plain the arrayed motivs that fill the orchestral interlude in the third; better perceived the sinewy frame, the close-knit texture, the lean and pungent voice of the whole music. The seeker for æsthetic sensations felt anew the oppressed atmosphere, the somber course, the straining, sharpening accents of the Psalm of petition; the suspensive progress, the sonorous expansion of the Psalm that foretells divine favor and the new song; the glow and pulse of the fervor, deep and mystical that suffuses the final praises into beauty. Hearing, the measurer of Stravinsky's career added a third summit to the peaks of "Le Sacre" and "Œdipus Rex." All of which is to say that with the "Psalms-Symphony" repetition is confirmation.

H. T. P.

In Its First Year And Its Hundredth

TRANS. FEB. 21 - '31

For This Centenary Time, the Birth-Pangs of a Famous Piece — The Legend And the Truth

THERE is still one centennial to celebrate for the year 1930, and it is a musical centennial. The Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz was performed for the first time on Dec. 5, 1830. What an astonishing year that was to produce so many inemorable works of art and historical events!

Eighteen-thirty, the year of "Ernani," the year which saw the publication of Alfred de Musset's first book of verses, of "Le Rouge et le Noir," and of "La Peau de Chagrin," the year of the rise of Eugene Delacroix, was also—more than any other in his life—the year of Berlioz. A product of his time, though still a student, it was 1830 which brought to Berlioz the full realization of his genius. In the two years just previous he had received the impact of what he himself calls "three thunderbolts." The first was his discovery of Shakspeare as revealed to his eyes through the form of a woman who gave him the illusion of being Ophelia. The second was his introduction to a book, Goethe's "Faust." The last—and this the most vivid of all for a musician—was his discovery of Beethoven.

At once, in a fever of inspiration, Berlioz began to set to music the choral passages of "Faust," bringing them out as his Opus 1. In the work of his mature years we find them replaced by the "Damnation of Faust." He undertook also a "descriptive symphony" after Faust which he said in a letter, writter Feb. 2, 1829, was "fermenting in his head." He composed his portfolio of "Irish Melodies" suggested to him by the beautiful Irish actress, Henriette Smithson, who had roused a tumultuous passion in his breast. And finally he wrote—the first man to do so, not merely in France but in the whole of Europe—the first post-Beethovenian symphony. This was the work which was soon to take a definitive form under the name of the Fantastic Symphony.

The love-stories of poets, of men of letters (or women of letters for that matter), and of artists (and everyone knows how many artists the 1830's spawned) form a chapter of the greatest importance in the development of romanticism. The loves of Berlioz, in all their diversity, were particularly stormy and there is good reason for holding him up as the only true model of the romantic man. Eighteen-thirty was precisely the year when his love-life reached a crisis.

At the beginning of the year Berlioz was in despair. The actress who was at the moment the toast of aristocratic and artistic Paris, Miss Smithson, had discouraged his passionate advances. At first she had even been a little scared by them. Berlioz could find no other outlet for his vexation except hard work. Berlioz' correspondence is singularly rich in references which throw light on his work and on the man himself. A letter of his, dated the second of January, reports that he "has in mind an immense instrumental composition" for his next concert. At the end of the same month, Jan. 30, he repeats these words, adding that he "will attempt to make a striking impression on the listeners by this new sort of composition." The sixth of February he says, "I have it all in my head." The sixteenth of April, "I have just written the last note." The eighteenth, "Joy at having finished my symphony has made me forget the fatigue I suffered from this enormous composition." Thus in three months and a half the work was done.

Berlioz had dreamed of having the piece performed during a concert on the Feast of Ascension or of Pentecost but the season was already far advanced. It would be impossible to produce a work so unusual and exacting under the auspices he desired—at the Théâtre de Nouveautés, a sort of branch or annex of the Opéra-Comique. It would be necessary to put the work over until the beginning of the winter season. In the meantime Berlioz had been present at the first performance of "Ernani." The author of "Victor Hugo raconté par un temoin de sa vie," names him as among those present on that historic evening. He himself gives his impression of the play in the same letter in which he announces that he has just finished his Fantastic Symphony. He next allowed himself to be drawn into what he called a "violent distraction." This was caused by a charming young artist, later a pianist of the first rank—Mme. Pleyel, at this time still Mlle. Camille Moke. She was willing to console him for a time for the defection of his Ophelia. It was one of Berlioz's characteristics that he could not stand emotional solitude. "Seul, solo, alone, allein—in all languages the word sounds ugly," he wrote towards the end of his life. Thus led on by the illusion of happiness, he spent all the rest of the year on this new adventure. The episode is typical enough of life in the romantic mood. A year later it just missed ending in tragedy.

The explosion hung fire. Berlioz felt, he tells us, "the most horrible anger he ever experienced in his whole life." In front of the audience he seized his score and hurled it at the heads of the orchestra players, knocking over the music stands. The Malibran, who had a seat in the orchestra pit, scrambled out in a fright. In short, a scandal such as the respectable auditorium had never seen before and has never seen since. One more red letter day in the year 1830.

Only two months remained to the laureate before his required departure for Rome. They were by no means unoccupied. Profiting by the curiosity provoked by an artist who was like no one else in the world, the director of the Opéra commissioned Berlioz to write him a musical work—not to be staged but to be performed during the course of a performance. Berlioz composed a vocal and orchestral fantasy on "The Tempest"—another page inspired by Shakspeare though not by Ophelia, whom the amiable "Distraction" had made him forget for a time. The Distraction herself is personified now by another Shakspearean name, that of Ariel.

At last the day finally came, the day of the Fantastic Symphony. Here once more it is impossible to mistake the intimate interrelation between Berlioz' music and his love-affairs. But is it really necessary to attribute to these love-affairs the direct and fundamental importance which is generally ascribed to them in analyzing the treatment and even the conception of this work? Must we believe that such and such a woman should be identified with the themes of the symphony? Shall we imagine that the principal theme which winds through the whole composition like a leading motive, and which Berlioz calls "Tidée fixe," is Henriette Smithson—"this Juliet, this Ophelia," who seems to be the central figure. By no means. This theme is the air of a cantata composed for the competition for the Prix de Rome, dating back two years before 1830. The cantata was called "Herminie." Even the title indicates that the inspiration did not come from Shakspeare. Even more convincing is the composer's reworking of an old melody—a simple song which Berlioz composed in his childhood to verses by Florian. The song was inspired by the fair Estelle, young daughter of St. Eynard, the object of Berlioz' first passion. Berlioz reworked it to form the expressive, plaintive theme of his introduction. But Estelle is certainly not Henriette and the melody belongs to neither. It is Berlioz, Berlioz himself, dreaming of love, remaining always the same, the great lover, whoever might be the woman with whom he was infatuated at the moment. As for Camille Moke—the "distraction"—the symphony can not owe her so much as a single note, for the simple reason that the score was completed a month before she and the composer became acquainted.

The fact is that in his conception of the Fantastic Symphony Berlioz wished essentially to compose a musical work—more especially a symphonic work. For whatever one may say about it, it is a symphony and what is more a symphony in the Beethoven manner. Composed hardly three years after the death of him who was the father of the nine muses, and the first work in this genre to be written by anyone other than he, it carries on his tradition both in form and in spirit. When Berlioz listened with pleasure to the compliments of those who declared that he had gone farther than Beethoven, he obviously made no pretension of surpassing the master in genius. But he could legitimately maintain that with him the symphony had advanced a step, just as with Beethoven it had advanced beyond Mozart, and with Mozart beyond Haydn.

The Fantastic Symphony is just as much a symphony as the Pastoral. Indeed, it is a pastoral symphony, transformed by a new genius and by the feeling of a different period. This is by no means a contradiction. Both these symphonies have definite programs. The program is outlined by simple captions in the case of Beethoven, and more complex with Berlioz; but essentially the process remains the same. Each of these two works sets forth, step by step, a series of subjective impressions, capable of expression pictorially. Beethoven leads us through the fields by the side of a murmuring brook. He lets us watch the frolicking peasants, lets us listen to their rural music, and interrupts them with the rattle of a thunderstorm. Berlioz suggests impressions to us which, however different they may be in spirit, are similar in kind.

As for musical forms, they were already very free with Beethoven, at least in comparison with classical precedents. They are freer still with Berlioz, but not notably freer—merely enough so to indicate that evolution is at work. The first portion of the Fantastic Symphony follows an absolutely classical pattern, with its slow introduction, its allegro constructed on two themes, with the traditional restatement and the normal development working out the thematic elements. "The Ball" takes the place of the scherzo or, better still, of the minuet. But why should a musician of 1830 forego a bit of a waltz tune in the place where a contemporary of Louis XV. would have employed the dance par excellence of his own time? The scene in the fields is almost exactly drawn on the plan of that which Beethoven labeled "By the Brookside." But note the essential difference. Beethoven in his serene conclusion sets a flock of birds twittering. In a similar passage Berlioz leaves the thunder rumbling. The romantic nature reveals itself clearly in this parallel. But in each case the inspiration is drawn direct from nature.

As for the "March to the Gallows" and the "Witches' Sabbath," audacious though they are in conception, they are not, musically, notably more free than the finale of this same "Pastoral," or of the Fifth Symphony, or the "Heroic," not to mention the Ninth. And these pages illustrate the very considerable progress in orchestral trituration which is characteristic of Berlioz's music.

In fine, the symphonic genius reveals itself in all its plenitude and power in this work of 1830, although it must be added that those who followed the path of the classic symphony after Beethoven did little to carry on the process of evolution: Schubert, Mendelssohn, even Schumann with all his genius, and most of all Brahms. It is necessary for us to skip to the composers of nearly three-quarters of a century later—Mahler, Bruckner, Richard Strauss, not to mention several contemporary French musicians—in order to discover the logical culmination and outcome of the effort which traces back to Berlioz, a young composer less than twenty-seven years old a century ago.

The Fantastic Symphony was performed for the first time at Paris in the hall of the conservatory under the direction of Habeneck on the fifth of December, 1830, as we said above. It is an important date in the history of music. Of course the work was not understood at the first hearing; it was hardly possible that it could be. The performance, however, was the scene of a memorable meeting. Liszt, a virtuoso performer, already celebrated at nineteen was present. He showed for his older confrére and admiration and a friendly feeling which on both sides was destined to bear fruit. An alliance on behalf of the art of the future was straightway agreed upon between these two. This was the real début of Berlioz' creative genius.

Three days later Berlioz left for Rome, and 1830 came to a close. But we must agree that for him it had been a busy year.

JULIEN TIEROT.

(Translated from Le Temps by D.W.B.)

For all that, Berlioz's love-affairs made him forget neither his art nor his professional duties. In July, 1830, wishing to compete for the Prix de Rome, he occupied a study at the Institute. On the 27th he heard the sound of cannon rumbling in the suburbs. On the 28th, the sound came nearer. On the 29th the battle reached its height before his eyes, in front of the Louvre. He scrawled the last page of his score in haste and ran down to the street. He armed himself with a pair of horse pistols, got hold of powder and shot, and joined the "blessed mob." "We are a sublime people," he wrote his father on the 2d of August, while giving him news of the Revolution. . . . He orchestrated the Marseillaise. "Whoever has a voice, a heart and red blood in his veins—!" We remember the phrase.

For the rest, Berlioz was awarded the Prix de Rome and was able from now on to the end of the year to devote himself to his musical plans and to realize his great schemes.

There was one more mishap. At the end of his cantata "Sardanapalus" Berlioz had added a symphonic finale describing the catastrophe by bringing back one after the other his principal motifs, interrupted by the final coda—a conception which was later given full scope in "Götterdämmerung," but which was here tried out for the first time in this academic work. Then came the mishap: on the occasion of the public performance, which took place at the prize exercises, the orchestral leader charged with the duty of conducting music so unaccustomed in form let his musicians get out of hand. The fireworks failed to go off.

121

Boston Symphony Bach

SPFGLD. UNION & REPUBLICAN FEB. 22

Higginson to Be Honored As Founder of Orchestra

Bach Festival to Celebrate 50th Anniversary of Boston Symphony—Series to Open at Symphony Hall Tuesday, March 24 and Will Continue Each Day Through Sunday, the 29th

A BACH FESTIVAL to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's half-century season. The festival will be performed at Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored, on the second night, which will be dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Maj Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the festival on Tuesday, March 24, and will be repeated the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee club and Radcliffe Choral society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg concertos (Nos 2 and 5), and suites (Nos 1 and 3). The concerto for two violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord." Mme Paternni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens," will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England conservatory, and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Other events of the 50th anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson. A Beethoven festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

An Illustrious Half Century

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and preseminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who, through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees.

After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly-enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows: George Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924; Serge Koussevitzky, 1924-.

DR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

FEB. 22 SPRING. UNION & REP.

(Photo by Bachrach)

Distinguished Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

1220

Sibelius Amid the Tuesday Classics

Trans. Feb 25

SIBELIUS and Chaikovsky filled the program at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon; Sibelius with the early and popular symphonic poem, "Finlandia," and the comparatively recent seventh symphony, Chaikovsky with the stirring fourth symphony in F minor.

An observer can occupy himself interestingly by taking note of the growing fortunes of a new symphony. The Seventh of Sibelius is such an one. Five years ago it was first played by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This year has come the first series of repetitions. Yesterday a Tuesday audience heard it for the first time. Now the Tuesday audience is not one to which one brings works of an experimental nature. The inclusion of the symphony in the program is evidence in itself that the conductor regards it as a masterpiece accomplished rather than as a "noble experiment." How would this most recent of symphonic audiences regard a six-year-old symphony at first hearing? How would that small minority which has heard most of the Bostonian performances react to this latest playing? And lastly (perhaps this should have come first), how would repetition affect performance?

One recalls a sense of feeling baffled from the experienced audience of Friday afternoon when first it heard this symphony. However the symphony contained no harsh combinations of tones, no jarring counterpoints to which routined hearers could pin any possible objections. Rather, these hearers suspected dullness, while at the same time they realized vaguely the presence of forces in the face of which they dared not openly accuse the symphony of being dull. Those blest with deeper insight recognized austerity, unadorned power, the gaunt articulations of a skeletonized form, as positive assets of no mean order. But the majority remained at a willingness "to be shown."

To the audience yesterday the symphony was as new as to that previous audience of a Friday afternoon. Yet, to judge by those visible signs which alone make judgment possible, they accepted the latest Sibelius far more readily, far more eagerly, far more as a "matter of course" than did the others five years ago. One saw no signs of bewilderment, no evidences of being puzzled, no tell-tale reactions of boredom. Those who had heard most of the performances of the symphony before began to talk—for the first time—as if they were finding a covering of flesh and blood over these hard bones, steeled sinews. One heard in the intermission such expressions as "what emotional depth," or "what intensity of feeling," or "what dark, moving power."

Now it is not within belief that the Tuesday audience, eager as it is, far as it finds itself from a blasé point of view, should of itself be capable of as much surer an appreciation of this symphony as indicated in a preceding paragraph. Nor is the reaction of the "repeaters" without significance. Both together point to performance as perhaps a determining factor in this increased acceptance, in this new reaction toward the symphony. It is matter of common knowledge that Dr. Koussevitzky's repetitions of a given work proceed in a straight line of gradual but sure ascent of increasing revelation of the work in hand. Of no work has this been more true than of Sibelius's seventh symphony. One begins now to hear strings sing in a rare but melancholy song. One hears trombones and brass, thrice-repeated, in a nobility and an elevation for which they seem as if made, but in which composers have none too often given them voice. One begins to hear wood-winds, in playful measures taking on a new charm. By all the signs thus, with yesterday's performance a new "Sibelius's Seventh" is beginning to emerge. One can find its early course thus far similar to that of symphonies of Brahms. Here, too, one found first austerity, erudition, scholarship; found these gradually giving way to glowing romance. Already one can add to the first impressions of this latest Sibelius. It is not beyond belief that he also will in time achieve the glow which one now accords to the bearded Johannes.

Concerning "Finlandia" or Chaikovsky's "Fourth," what is there new to write? From the folk manner to the excitements of brass and percussion "Finlandia" came and went vividly. With the older symphony Dr. Koussevitzky again sooth l. charmed, electrified. No less than cataclysmic are some of his climaxes.—Speaking of masterpieces, here is a masterpiece of interpretation.

A. H. M.

MUSIC

Herald Feb 25

Hw

SYMPHONY CONCERT

For the fourth concert of the Tuesday afternoon series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky arranged the following program: Silebius, "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem and Symphony No. 7; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor. This was an arresting choice of composers—though their ancestors may have been the same, their music proves quite different in character; further, the contours of Sibelius's Symphonic Poem and Seventh Symphony, the two compositions separated by some quarter of a century, show a wonderful development. It is interesting to observe the contrast in the two works.

"Finlandia" impresses with its straightforwardness, sturdy rhythms and beautiful melodies sung so expressively by the orchestra. It is optimistic simple, in the manner of a folk tune. No subtleties cloud its meaning, in fact, it often would infringe on the obvious were it not that the conductor's sense of the fitness of things saved it from falling in this category. In the Seventh Symphony it would seem one is dealing with a different man. The beautiful melodies he still retains, but they are more episodic in character. Nothing is obvious; subtlety reigns supreme. The oneness of mood—for the contracts are not marked enough to break the general impression of somberness—does not relieve and refresh the listener by changes in intensity and feeling. The symphony is rich, powerful and profound. Despite Dr. Koussevitzky's intelligent and thoughtful interpretation, despite the wonderful cooperation of the orchestra, its depths were not sounded by the audience. It left them baffled.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's symphony was scintillating; excellent in detail, wondrously perfect as a whole. The andante was delicately tinged with melancholy; the scherzo, of a faerie quality, was redolent of the whirring of humming birds' wings.

A large audience welcomed Dr. Koussevitzky and remained to applaud him.

L. B. D.

SIBELIUS' MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Tchaikovsky Symphony in F Minor Heard

Globe Feb 25

Dr Koussevitzky divided the program of the fourth Tuesday Symphony concert yesterday afternoon between the music of Sibelius and that of Tchaikovsky. From the former composer he chose the familiar and highly popular "Finlandia" and the new and austere Seventh Symphony. The F minor Symphony, in which conductor and orchestra now excel, represented Tchaikovsky at his best.

There is more in common between these two composers than some of Sibelius' admirers like to admit. If anyone has influenced Sibelius, whose originality of matter and manner is generally conceded, it has been Tchaikovsky, as "Finlandia" would suffice to prove.

This tone poem has the obstreperous rhythms, the obviously emotional melodic interludes that have made so much of the Russian master's work at once popular with the average concert-goer and unpopular with fastidious musicians.

"Finlandia" was brilliantly played yesterday. Dr Koussevitzky succeeded, as he so often does in music of this sort, in revealing new beauties in a hackneyed piece, and in concealing something of its banality by his sensitive and tasteful management of melodic lines.

The Seventh Symphony of Sibelius grows on one with repeated hearings.

Yesterday one felt in it an emotional warmth, a human appealing quality absent before. The style is a bit crabbed. The themes are unusual. In a sense the whole work is a fantasy on the scale passage which is one of its principal themes. But its imaginative unity, the result of the creative imagination of the composer, imposes itself on the listener. This symphony is no mere experiment in musical form. It is music deeply imagined, nobly conceived.

Yesterday's performance seemed the best of the several Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra have given us. Perhaps to them, as to the audience, this symphony is a thing to be gradually understood and loved, not a thing making an instant popular appeal.

The next concert in this series will be given March 10. The program is not yet announced.

P. R.

Trans. Feb 26 Pla

The Second Symphony of A Bostonian

Dr. Koussevitzky Finds Room For Professor Hill in Modern Vein

FROM Professor Edward Burlingame Hill comes to the week-end pair of concerts at Symphony Hall the new and for some months awaited "Symphony No. 2 in C major." This symphony is not in any sense connected with or written for the anniversary of the orchestra. Instead, it is dedicated to Walter R. Spalding, who like Mr. Hill, is a professor in the division of music of Harvard University. The new symphony bears the opus number 35, and on the title-page of the score one finds the dates "July, 1929, to February, 1930." On the last page of the score one may read more specifically the date of the completion of the symphony—"Cambridge, Massachusetts, Feb. 11, 1930."

Mr. Hill's second symphony is the most considerable work he has yet produced. It is more expansive than the first, is visibly planned on larger lines. It runs through the usual four movements, (1) a free, modern working of a sonata-form, (2) scherzo, (3) maestoso, ma non troppo lento, (4) allegro energico. With reason one did not quote the tempo indication that stands at the head of the first movement, for neither that "moderato tranquillo e sostenuto" nor any other tempo indication represents the course of this movement. In fact, by every device, the score gives evidence that the composer planned that it should have the utmost freedom and flexibility of rhythm and meter and of tempo. The complete list of changing tempo indications would in itself fill a small paragraph. They range from tranquillo, through various shades of animato to brioso, back and forth again, several times, ending in a largamente e pesante. Indications of meter show an equal desire to escape rhythmic rigidity. At the beginning, measures of 9-8 and 7/8 follow each other several times only to give way soon to other rhythmic patterns. Thematically, the usual symphonic conditions are reversed. The lyric group of themes is here the "first theme" while a more energetically rhythmed theme taken "risoluto" is "second theme." This theme proceeds in an interesting pattern which alternates 3/4 and 6-8 meters. Soon after it is first heard it is followed by a "scherzando" variant. The working-out section develops largely and broadly and variedly. Of both rhythmical and dynamic ebbings and flowings and huge surges there are not a few, proceeding along broad and well-considered lines. At such a climax the recapitulation occurs, with fullest possible statement of the principal or lyric theme. This time the rhythmical theme enters "maestoso" in sounding brass. The ending is quiet and poetical.

The scherzo, at a vivace of break-neck speed, begins in C minor with an intriguing rhythmical pattern of measures 3-4, 3-4, 2-4. Within the measures scherzo figures are treated imaginatively, subtly. There is much skilfully delicate handling of wood-winds. Inevitably the scherzo grows more and more songful until a middle section of lyric type is reached; then as inevitably there is return to the music and mood of the first.

A single theme pervades the maestoso, which is third movement. The movement is in A minor, 4-4. Horns give out the theme, which is of sombre yet expressive majesty. Again a series of animati increase the rhythmic intensity until the development of the theme reaches a tonal and rhythmic climax. There is a lull. Then a variant of the same theme is treated with caressing gentle accompaniment. After which there is return to the original form of the theme, once more a climax, this time a gentle one, and the movement comes to conclusion.

The finale proceeds "allegro energico" in C major, 3-4. Horns give voice to a virile theme, developed at some length. Already an energetic theme, trumpets soon take it in more highly energized rhythm. After another "animato" a waltz-rhythmed melody enters in strings, which after several starts keeps breaking off in scherzo-like manner. But soon the waltz triumphs. It too proceeds at some length. Then follows a lyric portion, delicately and sensitively orchestrated. We return to the waltz, which again flirts with a scherzo, this time giving the latter more show. There follows a climactic statement and development of the theme of the beginning, together with extended developments of waltz and main theme, with which the symphony closes.

The orchestra is the usual one of modern times, with six horns, a piano and a fairly liberal complement of percussion.

A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

Next week the Symphony Orchestra will revisit New York, calling at Northampton and New Haven on the way. In New York, with the chorus of the Schola Cantorum assisting, Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony" will be heard at both concerts. On Thursday evening, Honegger's new Symphony will also be played, with a Concerto Grosso of Handel and Ravel's "Waltz" to begin and end the concert respectively. On Saturday afternoon, there will be room for Mr. Hill's new Symphony; another Concerto Grosso by Handel; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice."

Returning to Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra will be heard, first, at Symphony Hall in a supplementary matinée on Tuesday, March 10. Mozart's Symphony in G minor and Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" will fill the program.

At the following Symphony Concerts in regular course, on Friday and Saturday, March 13 and 14, Nathan Milstein, violinist new to Boston, will play the solo-part in Brahms's Concerto. A "Symphonic Legend" by Alexander Steinert will also be heard for the first times. Haydn will have his annual inning with a resurrected Symphony in D major. (Dr. Koussevitzky is usually fortunate in these re-discoveries.) Two Hungarian Dances from Brahms will end both concerts.

HEIFETZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Reaches Heights in Beethoven's Concerto

Post Feb 28

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In days gone by, when assisting artists were the "regular thing" at the Symphony Concerts, the soloist, in the eyes of many, was the concert. The soloist today does not usurp the place that properly belongs to orchestra and conductor. Yet when he is an "eminence," he does, even in the enlightened present, tend to dominate the occasion.

HEIFETZ SERVES COMPOSER

Jascha Heifetz, violinist, in some respects without peer, appeared yesterday with the orchestra and there was no mistaking the air of impending excitement that hung over the hall immediately before his entrance. His playing was heeded as that of the orchestra alone is seldom heeded, and the applause at the end was of the sort bestowed on prima donnas.

In the meanwhile the cause of this furore, the centre of this adulation, bore himself with his usual quiet dignity. Mr. Heifetz's piece was the Concerto of Beethoven. He was there to serve the composer, if the audience was pleased, so much the better. And serve the composer Mr. Heifetz did, with a spirit humble, yet not abashed, in the presence of greatness and with all the skill that is his to command, with fine and true musicianship.

Violinist at Heights

For a time it seemed as though Mr. Heifetz was going to stop short of the highest rung on the violinistic ladder. When he played the Concerto of Brahms with the Symphony Orchestra a season or two ago, such forebodings were happily dispelled. It was then to be seen that Mr. Heifetz could rise, and magnificently, to an occasion. Yesterday he rose again, and conductor and players did not lag behind. Not since Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck between them brought about an ever-memorable performance of this same concerto many seasons ago had the piece so sounded in Symphony Hall. To write in detail of Mr. Heifetz's tone and technique would be an impertinence. They were means rather than end.

Mr. Heifetz did not play yesterday until after the intermission. Before the concerto, had come, for the first time under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," and, for the first time anywhere, the Second Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill. Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," in stirring performance, brought the close.

Was Dr. Koussevitzky's pace with Chabrier's music slower than that to which we were once accustomed? In any event he made the most of its richness of coloring, its warm and intense expressiveness.

Mr. Hill's Symphony

On first hearing, Mr. Hill's symphony seemed less individual, less salient in invention than its predecessor, which Dr. Koussevitzky has twice conducted here. There is mood and atmosphere in each of the four movements, pervadingly a grave and reflective mood that does not wholly disappear even in the Scherzo, a movement of much charm.

The great and enduring symphonies—and the last hundred years have produced few enough that deserve such characterization—have without exception been marked by striking thematic invention. And it is this that Mr. Hill's newest score, for all its wealth of pleasing detail, seems most to lack. The most arresting theme, at first blush, was the chief theme of the finale, but it was not to be felt, at least on one hearing, that the composer had made the most of its possibilities.

Present in the audience, Mr. Hill was brought to the platform by Dr. Koussevitzky, who had conducted his work eloquently, and there received the cordial plaudits of his fellow-townsmen.

One more manuscript, commissioned for the jubilee year of the Boston Orchestra, has arrived at Symphony Hall. It comes from Paul Hindemith, who, above any other, represents the post-war generation of German composers. He calls it "Konzert-Musik"—written for strings and brass, in two movements. As soon as the parts can be copied, it will be put into rehearsal. . . . Ravel is now the only one of the "anniversary" composers who has not delivered his work.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald Feb 28

BY PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its 17th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. Jascha Heifetz was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Chabrier, prelude to act II of "Gwendoline"; Hill, symphony No. 26, major; Beethoven, violin concerto and overture to "Egmont."

The charming prelude of Chabrier's, an orchestral page of a much finer texture than the overture to the opera, was poetically played. Even the pause between this prelude and the symphony did not prevent late comers from bustling down the aisles between the first and second movements of the latter. It was not so long ago that when the concert began with a short piece, time was given for the belated to enter the hall during the following pause; and they were not allowed to enter after the symphony had begun until it was ended. Of late the entrance seems to be of the go-as-you-please order.

Mr. Hill's symphony was well received. He was present and bowed his acknowledgment of the applause. The work itself at this, the first hearing, did not seem to be of as pronounced musical interest as Mr. Hill's preceding venture in the symphonic field. One missed in this later work the melodic grace, the flowing line, the harmonic tints and colors, the pervading poetic spirit that have characterized much of his music. The themes in the second symphony have not the distinction of those in the earlier work, nor is the treatment of them so uniformly interesting. Mr. Hill has said that he has here kept to the traditional forms, thinking he has not had sufficient experience to experiment. He is too modest: he has experimented in the past and with pleasing results. If one says here is an instance of new wine in old bottles, it may also be said that the wine is too heady and not always clear. A large orchestra is employed to give authority to outbursts and climaxes. There is at times a violence, a fury that one does not associate with Mr. Hill's indisputable musical nature; there is an absence of the subtlety that is more eloquent than obvious storm and stress. Of the movements the Scherzo seems now to be the most spontaneous and interesting. It pleased at once—perhaps by its persistent, compelling rhythm and ingratiating chief musical idea. There was that stir in the audience that is a sign of glad acceptance.

Mr. Heifetz, always a welcome visitor, again played with the tonal beauty, the brilliant technic, the exquisite treatment of details, and the general aesthetic taste that have given him fame. Yet to some the second movement was performed at too slow a pace, too much ad libitum. There was at times an approach to lackadaisicalness. Will any violinist ever have the courage to omit the final movement? Not even Mr. Heifetz's delicate reading, an almost capricious reading of the chief theme, can disguise the intrinsic vulgarity of it; nor can consummate mastery in the performance reconcile one to the thematic hiccups that come from solo violin and orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave Mr. Heifetz an accompaniment that was as noteworthy as the performance of the soloist: an accompaniment that was most sympathetic in support, and was itself a thing of beauty; but even the leader and the orchestra could not make the third movement music of great or even moderate worth.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be out of town. The program of March 13-14 will be, i. e., is announced as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D major (B. & H. No. 10); A. L. Steinert, "Leggenda Sinfonica" (first time in the United States); Brahms, Violin Concerto and Two Hungarian Dances. Nathan Milstein will be the solo violinist.

See Page for Trans Feb 28

HEIFETZ HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Violinist Applauded in Beethoven Concerto

Globe Feb 28

Jascha Heifetz was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. His playing in the Beethoven violin concerto was applauded with exceptional warmth not merely by the audience, but also by the members of the orchestra. The usually impasssive demeanor of the celebrated virtuoso varied for a moment. His gratification at the applause from the orchestra was plain.

One can hardly blame him after experiencing it all his life, for accepting any amount of applause from any audience as the usual thing. A new symphony by Prof E. B. Hill of Harvard, his second, performed for the first time in public won rather more applause than is given to most American compositions. The composer came on the stage to acknowledge it. Dr Koussevitzky's program began with an entr'act from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and concluded with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont."

It was the Beethoven concerto in which Heifetz made his debut at the Boston Symphony concerts in 1919. To one who then heard him for the first time yesterday's repetition of the same piece offered an interesting chance to compare memories with actualities. In 1919 Heifetz played with the same astonishing technical facility, the same exquisite beauty of tone he still manifests at every appearance here. This generation has heard no other violinist equally gifted in these respects.

In 1919, however, his playing seemed superficial, musically considered. He then merely displayed his amazing virtuosity, exactly as though the concerto were by Vieuxtemps and not Beethoven.

Much Played Masterpiece

Yesterday's performance was far more mature, far more thoughtful. He has now worked out an individual interpretation of the much played masterpiece. He stresses its almost wistful lyricism, its romantic play of light and shade. He minimizes its classic serenity and vigor. For profound emotion, which some have revealed in this music, Heifetz substitutes tender sentiment, half veiled longing, sprightly graces. It is all very beautiful, but is it the true Beethoven? Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra, rather curiously, were not quite at their best in the orchestral accompaniment.

Mr Hill explains in a program note that this C major symphony "has no descriptive background, no literary quotations appended."

"I find myself in sympathy with those of the younger generation who feel that music has enough intrinsic problems of its own without adding those of the other arts," he writes. 'Also, I have kept to the traditional forms, thinking I had not had sufficient experience to experiment."

From this last remark some of the younger generation, not to mention their elders, might learn. For Mr Hill, now in his 50s, has written a number of previous works for orchestra, most of them heard at Boston Symphony concerts.

Imaginative Power

One thought yesterday of the music of Prokofiei in listening to this symphony. Its graceful scherzo, placed by exception before the slow movement, recalled that composer's "Classical Symphony." The deliberate austerity, the intentional bareness verging on monotony of much in the other movements, the jagged rhythmic figures and harmonic clashes sedulously imposed on a musical substratum essentially conventional reminded one of the latest symphony by the clever Russian. Mr Hill, unlike most of his musical generation, has changed with the musical times. He no longer models himself on Debussy, Ravel, and Faure.

This symphony did not yesterday impress one by its imaginative power. It was rather the good taste and the craftsmanship shown that struck the listener's mind. His heart remained unstirred.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra managed to make Chabrier's entr'acte sound less banal than it actually is. To make music appear better than it is, is a gift reserved to the greatest performers. Kreisler, for instance, can do it to perfection.

Their performance of the "Egmont" overture was much the best they have given that classic. It, like that of Chabrier's piece, demonstrated the great improvement achieved in recent seasons.

P. R.

LOEFFLER AT SEVENTY

Tribune Feb

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

THE Philharmonic-Symphony Society at its concerts of next week will give four performances in Carnegie Hall of a work by an American composer. In the same week, this same music will have two performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. The music in question is the magnificent "Pagan Poem" after Virgil, for orchestra, piano, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati, by Charles Martin Loeffler—music dating from the beginning of the century, but still the outstanding symphonic work composed in America.

The tribute of the six performances by the two great orchestras is a handsome one, but it is richly deserved. Loeffler was seventy years old last Friday. For almost half a century he has been a salient figure in our musical life, and today he is, beyond question, the most distinguished American composer.

* * *

An Alsatian Turns New Englander

IT was in the summer of 1881 that Loeffler, a young Alsatian of twenty, landed in New York from the French ship Le Canada. Six years later he became a citizen of this country, and he has lived here ever since. For most of his fifty years among us he has been identified with the musical life of Boston. He joined the first violin section of Colonel Higginson's famous orchestra in the season of 1882-'83, and remained a member of that organization for two decades. Since his retirement to his country home at Medfield, Mass., he has continued, in his reluctant and self-challenging way, to add to his output as a creative artist.

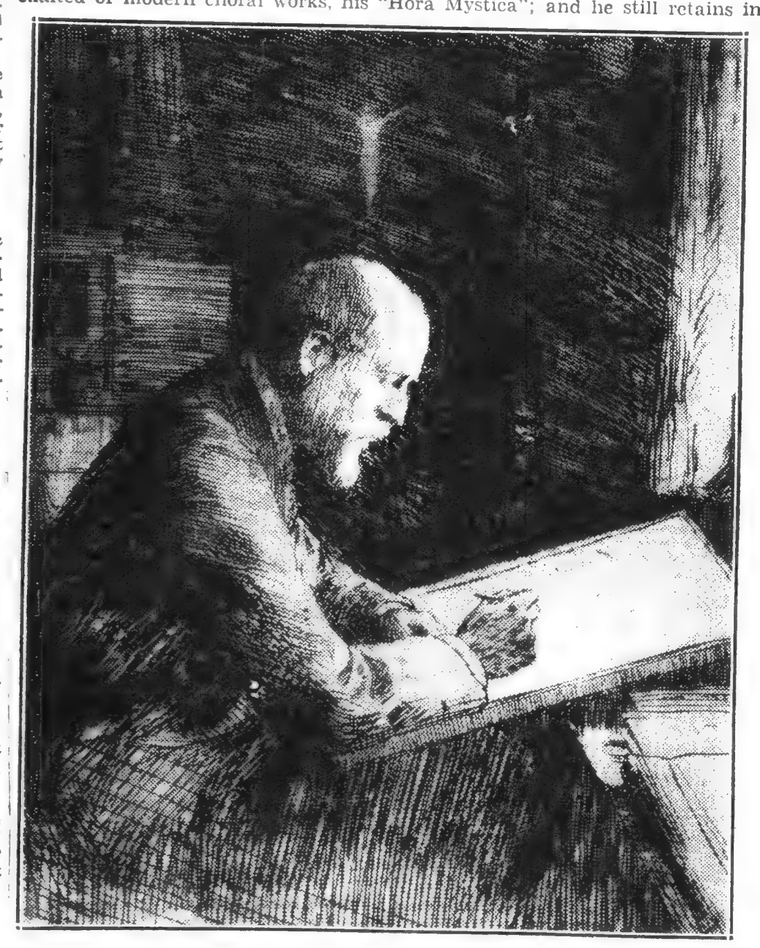
Whatever he has put forth has redounded to the honor of musical art as practiced in the land of his adoption. Long ago he was ranked by the discerning as the most individual and in many ways the most remarkable music-maker in America. He is still a solitary figure, aloof, autonomous, unparagoned—a composer extraordinary for his purity of intention, his distinction of thought, his choiceness of procedure. He is among the aristocrats of musical style. Even when he pays brief court to Jazzerella, he cannot quite dissemble the grand seigneur, and is inclined to address the wench as if she were his worshiped lady, the veritable Dulcinea del Toboso.

* * *

The Most Reticent of Composers

LOEFFLER has long been known as the most reticent, the most self-critical, and the most secretive of modern composers. His fastidiousness has become a legend; his loathing of the facile has provoked the derision of those who—forgetting how Beethoven agonized over the shaping of a three-note phrase and the exact duration of a rest—concluded that such a passion for perfection must be psychopathic, since it certainly was not normal.

It has often seemed, to those familiar with his activities, as if Loeffler's chief concern after finishing a new work were to conceal it from public knowledge. His indifference to celebrity, to the promotion of his reputation, was for years extravagant, fanatical. One felt that he would far rather keep a manuscript in his closet or on his desk, with pencil and eraser handy, than yield it to the engraver or even to a performer for experimental hearing. He has withheld from publication for years the score of one of the most exalted of modern choral works, his "Hora Mystica"; and he still retains in his portfolio the manuscript of an opera whose production might alter some of our beliefs as to the seemingly inevitable mediocrity of American endeavors in this field.



(From the etching by Frank W. Benson)

Charles Martin Loeffler

If it is an unwelcome publicity which, in his later years, has befallen this singular recluse—who yearns for conspicuousness about as avidly as a popular prima donna yearns for the nunnery—he has only his genius to blame for it.

* * *

The Virgilian Sorceress Vs. the Locomotive

LOEFFLER'S field of reference (barring his tentative dalliance with Jazzerella), is remote from the preoccupations of our day. Music and musicians have traveled far from the time when composers were addicted to symphonic poems, and chose for their subjects doomed and piteous children, veiled hand-maidens and sinister dread Queens, Sorceresses out of Virgil, wind among Celtic reeds, the deathlessness of Helen. Composers no longer write symphonic poems, or, if they do, they go for their subjects to regions far removed from those nameless lands "in the strange years of legends" that yielded such music as Loeffler's. They go to the football field, or the railroad yard, or the steel mill—which is all very well, and quite as it should be; though one may be tempted to ask if the drop-kick or the locomotive or the foundry have yet given us any music that shows signs of enduring vitality. Will Honegger's "Pacific 231" still be snorting and pounding through the symphonic night thirty years after it was written, as Loeffler's Ygraine and Tintagiles still cry to us from the darkness of their nameless land a generation after their composer set them there; as his pagan Sorceress still sings to us her amorous, incantatory songs? Perhaps. Criticism has nought to do with prophecy. Yet we may wonder.

The musical idiom of Loeffler is not that of today—a grave disadvantage which it shares with the idioms of Debussy, Brahms, Wagner, Schubert, Beethoven, Mozart, Bach, Monteverdi and other ancients. Yet, oddly enough, it remains an apt and expressive vehicle of beauty and eloquence and distinguished musical thought.

It remains, too, a curiously personal possession. There is no music quite like this, with its fineness of fiber, its uncompromising distinction, its blended subtlety and passion. Loeffler is sui generis: he is still, as Mr. Carl Engel once happily called him, "that rare and comforting thing in life and art—a perfect anomaly."

Often in Loeffler's music we are brought close to immemorial things—to sorrow and loveliness and transport and faith and the haunted destiny of man, his terrors and fantasies and dreams; so that we may find ourselves wondering if this is not, perhaps, art of the sort that can afford to be indifferent to the hues of time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

123

FEB 1 1931

Large Crowd Expected To Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra

Appearance at Mosque Tomorrow Night, Under Direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, Regarded as Musical Event of Season

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, to be presented at 8:30 o'clock tomorrow night at the Mosque, is generally regarded the outstanding musical event of Richmond's season. It is expected to prove an artistic and social occasion of unusual distinction.

Many visitors, including large parties from Fredericksburg, Farmville and other points, will attend the concert in addition to a large Richmond representation. T. Michaux Moody, manager of the Richmond Civic Music Association, stated last night that good reservations are still available, due to the extraordinary capacity of the Mosque, though the auditorium [illegible]d made [illegible]s. The [illegible]nphony [illegible]vent of [illegible]hedule. [illegible]as no-[illegible]sons in [illegible] scores [illegible]rsakov. [illegible]f and Fourth feature a par- Com- by the [illegible]nduct- Warren [illegible]n Post [illegible]oncerts [illegible]sevitzky [illegible]is con- [illegible] fellow [illegible]parage- [illegible]vements [illegible]s. And [illegible]nces of [illegible]led that [illegible]hony at [illegible]ternoon. Fate, so [illegible]ng mo- [illegible]g sym- only of finale. [illegible]hing in orches- [illegible] virtu- [illegible]'s six-teenths as though they were child's play, outwardly in a very delirium of emotion yet actualy in hair-trigger response to the conductor's will. Contrasted more than ever sharply to the passion of the first movement and the excitements of the last, the melancholy Andantino and the Scherzo of plucked strings and isolated wind-choir each came and went yesterday in beautifully finished performances, while throughout the symphony there was an elasticity remarkable even for this orchestra's present prowess. Hardly had the last chord ceased to sound before the audience sought release in frantic applause that continued unabated until Dr. Koussevitzky, on his third return to the stage, brought the players to their feet."

Accompanying the Boston Symphony in its Richmond appearance as soloist will be the noted young Spanish-American pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, whose art has been highly acclaimed by Northern critics.

The program has been announced as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in G minor (Koechel No. 550).
- I. Allegro molto.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto; Trio.
- IV. Finale; Allegro assai.

Stravinsky—Capriccio for piano and orchestra.
- I. Presto.
- II. Andante rapsodico.
- III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.

Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.
- I. Andante sostenuto; moderto con anima (in movimento di valse).
- II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
- III. Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato.
- IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Boston Symphony Pays Third Visit To New York

Zecchi, Italian Pianist, Is Soloist This Week With Philharmonic-Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall next Friday evening, instead of the customary Thursday, when Serge Koussevitzky will devote his program to numbers infrequently heard here: Sir Edward Elgar's introduction and allegro for strings, Op. 47; Sibelius's seventh symphony, Op. 105, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." On Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat the Strauss work, and will also present Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, which was given last month in the Thursday evening series. The soloist again will be Jesuse Maria Sanroma.

The Sibelius symphony, published in 1925, was played for the first time in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski in the spring of 1926. Its first New York performance was by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky on January 8, 1927, followed by two performances by the New York Symphony under Klemperer on January 13 and 16. It has not been played here since 1927.

The Boston Symphony's third Brooklyn concert will be given next Thursday night, February 5, instead of on Friday.

AMONG MU[illegible]

By ELISABETH E. POE.

IN the less than three weeks remaining until Ash Wednesday begins the 40 penitential days the formal musical season so far as professional concerts are concerned will be virtually completed. Of course there will be concerts by visiting artists for some weeks into Lent. But the pressure of full musical weeks when three or four major concerts are on the calendars will be over.

One can sit down then and judge in calmness what has truly been a remarkable musical season in Washington. Judging from the good audiences at the concerts the so-called depression has had little effect upon the cultural arts. The evening concerts, while losing somewhat in patronage among those who entertain and are entertained constantly, have been most successful in providing opportunity to hear really good artists to thousands of Government workers who can not attend the afternoon concerts. That the chance is appreciated greatly no one can doubt who has witnessed the enthusiasm prevailing in these groups while world-famous artists have been singing or playing for them.

Much interest is expressed in Washington in the recent Paris premiere of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms." This symphony has its premiere in America at the celebration of its fiftieth anniversary by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. European critics were as kind to this latest work of Stravinsky's as American ones had been and some even hailed it as the culminating point of his art.

Music in

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit of the season to Brooklyn to give a concert in the Academy of Music, next Thursday evening at 8:15 instead of the usual Friday evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with Sir Edward Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, Op. 47. He will introduce to Brooklyn Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra which, first performed in Paris last year, has had its first American performances under his direction in Boston, New York and other cities. The soloist in this score will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, the brilliant young Spanish-American pianist.

The latter part of the program will be occupied by Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Thiss et of pianoforte pieces has been arranged for a large orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The French composer made the arrangement especially for Koussevitzky and it was by him that the suite was first played in Europe and America. The titles of the pictures which the Russian composer has set to music are as follows: Promenade, Gnomus, Promenade, Tuileries, Bydlo, Promenade, Ballet of Chicks in their Shells, Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle, Limoges, The Market Place, Catacombs, The Hut on Fowl's Legs, The Great Gate at Kiev.

The Budapest String Quartet (Emil Hauser, violin; Jose Roismann, violin; Stephen Ipolyi, viola; Mischa Schneider, 'cello, which is playing its first American tour this season, will be heard in a chamber music recital at the Academy this afternoon. The program follows: Smetana, E minor, Op. 116 ("Aus meinem Leben"); Dittersdorf, A major, No. 6; Tschaikowsky, F major, Op. 22.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

HEIFETZ HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Violinist Applauded in Beethoven Concerto

Globe Feb 28

Jascha Heifetz was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. His playing in the Beethoven violin concerto was applauded with exceptional warmth not merely by the audience, but also by the members of the orchestra. The usually impasssive demeanor of the celebrated virtuoso varied for a moment. His gratification at the applause from the orchestra was plain.

One can hardly blame him after experiencing it all his life, for accepting any amount of applause from any audience as the usual thing. A new symphony by Prof E. B. Hill of Harvard, his second, performed for the first time in public won rather more applause than is given to most American compositions. The composer came on the stage to acknowledge it. Dr Koussevitzky's program began with an entr'act from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and concluded with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont."

It was the Beethoven concerto in which Heifetz made his debut at the Boston Symphony concerts in 1919. To one who then heard him for the first time yesterday's repetition of the same piece offered an interesting chance to compare memories with actualities. In 1919 Heifetz played with the same astonishing technical facility, the same exquisite beauty of tone he still manifests at every appearance here. This generation has heard no other violinist equally gifted in these respects.

In 1919, however, his playing seemed superficial, musically considered. He then merely displayed his amazing virtuosity, exactly as though the concerto were by Vieuxtemps and not Beethoven.

Much Played Masterpiece

Yesterday's performance was far more mature, far more thoughtful. He has now worked out an individual interpretation of the much played masterpiece. He stresses its almost wistful lyricism, its romantic play of light and shade. He minimizes its classic serenity and vigor. For profound emotion, which some have revealed in this music, Heifetz substitutes tender sentiment, half veiled longing, sprightly graces. It is all very beautiful, but is it the true Beethoven? Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra, rather curiously, were not quite at their best in the orchestral accompaniment.

Mr Hill explains in a program note that this C major symphony "has no descriptive background, no literary quotations appended."

"I find myself in sympathy with those of the younger generation who feel that music has enough intrinsic problems of its own without adding those of the other arts," he writes. "Also, I have kept to the traditional forms, thinking I had not had sufficient experience to experiment."

From this last remark some of the younger generation, not to mention their elders, might learn. For Mr Hill, now in his 50s, has written a number of previous works for orchestra, most of them heard at Boston Symphony concerts.

Imaginative Power

One thought yesterday of the music of Prokofiel in listening to this symphony. Its graceful scherzo, placed by exception before the slow movement, recalled that composer's "Classical Symphony." The deliberate austerity, the intentional bareness verging on monotony of much in the other movements, the jagged rhythmic figures and harmonic clashes sedulously imposed on a musical substratum essentially conventional reminded one of the latest symphony by the clever Russian. Mr Hill, unlike most of his musical generation, has changed with the musical times. He no longer models himself on Debussy, Ravel, and Faure.

This symphony did not yesterday impress one by its imaginative power. It was rather the good taste and the craftsmanship shown that struck the listener's mind. His heart remained unstirred.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra managed to make Chabrier's entr'acte sound less banal than it actually is. To make music appear better than it is, is a gift reserved to the greatest performers. Kreisler, for instance, can do it to perfection.

Their performance of the "Egmont" overture was much the best they have given that classic. It, like that of Chabrier's piece, demonstrated the great improvement achieved in recent seasons.

P. R.

Tribune Feb

LOEFFLER AT SEVENTY

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

THE Philharmonic-Symphony Society at its concerts of next week will give four performances in Carnegie Hall of a work by an American composer. In the same week, this same music will have two performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. The music in question is the magnificent "Pagan Poem" after Virgil, for orchestra, piano, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati, by Charles Martin Loeffler—music dating from the beginning of the century, but still the outstanding symphonic work composed in America.

The tribute of the six performances by the two great orchestras is a handsome one, but it is richly deserved. Loeffler was seventy years old last Friday. For almost half a century he has been a salient figure in our musical life, and today he is, beyond question, the most distinguished American composer.

* * *

An Alsatian Turns New Englander

IT was in the summer of 1881 that Loeffler, a young Alsatian of twenty, landed in New York from the French ship Le Canada. Six years later he became a citizen of this country, and he has lived here ever since. For most of his fifty years among us he has been identified with the musical life of Boston. He joined the first violin section of Colonel Higginson's famous orchestra in the season of 1882-'83, and remained a member of that organization for two decades. Since his retirement to his country home at Medfield, Mass., he has continued, in his reluctant and self-challenging way, to add to his output as a creative artist.

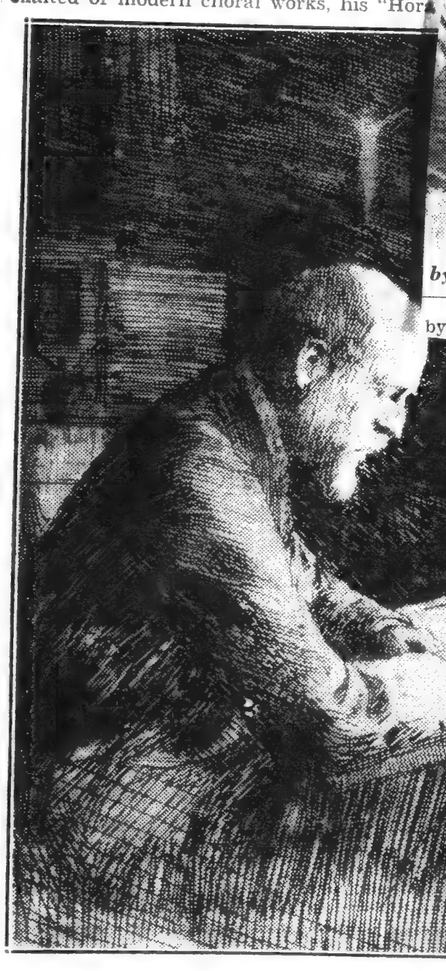
Whatever he has put forth has redou[nded] as practiced in the land of his adoption. [He is] discerning as the most individual and in[fluential] music-maker in America. He is still a s[ingular] unparagoned—a composer extraordinary [for the] distinction of thought, his choiceness of pr[ocess] crats of musical style. Even when he pays [homage] not quite dissemble the grand seigneur, and [he treats] as if she were his worshiped lady, the veri[table]

* *

The Most Reticent of Composers

LOEFFLER has long been known as t[he most] critical, and the most secretive of mod[ern] has become a legend: his loathing of the [public] of those who—forgetting how Beethoven [wrote] three-note phrase and the exact duration [of] a passion for perfection must be psychop[athic] normal.

It has often seemed, to those familiar [with] chief concern after finishing a new work [was] knowledge. His indifference to celebrity, t[o which] was for years extravagant, fanatical. On[e] keep a manuscript in his closet or on his de[sk] than yield it to the engraver or even to a pe[rformer] He has withheld from publication for yea[rs] exalted of modern choral works, his "Hor[se Tent]



(Drawing by Laura Knight)

by a single recent example. The large[st] [work], his most im-

(From the etching by Frank W. Benson)

Charles Martin Loeffler

his portfolio the manuscript of an opera whose production might alter some of our beliefs as to the seemingly inevitable mediocrity of American endeavors in this field.

If it is an unwelcome publicity which, in his later years, has befallen this singular recluse—who yearns for conspicuousness about as avidly as a popular prima donna yearns for the nunnery—he has only his genius to blame for it.

* * *

The Virgilian Sorceress Vs. the Locomotive

LOEFFLER'S field of reference (barring his tentative dalliance with Verlaine) is remote from the preoccupations of our day. Music and musicians have traveled far from the time when composers were addicted to symphonic poems, and chose for their subjects doomed and piteous children, veiled hand-maidens and sinister dread Queens, Sorceresses out of Virgil, wind among Celtic reeds, the deathlessness of Helen. Composers no longer write symphonic poems, or, if they do, they go for their subjects to regions far removed from those nameless lands "in the strange years of legends" that yielded such music as Loeffler's. They go to the football field, or the railroad yard, or the steel mill—which is all very well, and quite as it should be; though one may be tempted to ask if the drop-kick or the locomotive or the foundry have yet given us any music that shows signs of enduring vitality. Will Honegger's "Pacific 231" still be snorting and pounding through the symphonic night thirty years after it was written, as Loeffler's Ygraine and Tintagiles still cry to us from the darkness of their nameless land a generation after their composer set them there; as his pagan Sorceress still sings to us her amorous, incantatory songs? Perhaps. Criticism has nought to do with prophecy. Yet we may wonder.

The musical idiom of Loeffler is not that of today—a grave disadvantage which it shares with the idioms of Debussy, Brahms, Wagner, Schubert, Beethoven, Mozart, Bach, Monteverdi and other ancients. Yet, oddly enough, it remains an apt and expressive vehicle of beauty and eloquence and distinguished musical thought.

It remains, too, a curiously personal possession. There is no music quite like this, with its fineness of fiber, its uncompromising distinction, its blended subtlety and passion. Loeffler is sui generis: he is still, as Mr. Carl Engel once happily called him, "that rare and comforting thing in life and art—a perfect anomaly."

Often in Loeffler's music we are brought close to immemorial things—to sorrow and loveliness and transport and faith and the haunted destiny of man, his terrors and fantasies and dreams; so that we may find ourselves wondering if this is not, perhaps, art of the sort that can afford to be indifferent to the hues of time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

123

FEB 1 '31

Large Crowd Expected To Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra

Appearance at Mosque Tomorrow Night, Under Direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, Regarded as Musical Event of Season

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, to be presented at 8:30 o'clock tomorrow night at the Mosque, is generally regarded the outstanding musical event of Richmond's season. It is expected to prove an artistic and social occasion of unusual distinction.

Many visitors, including large parties from Fredericksburg, Farmville and other points, will attend the concert in addition to a large Richmond representation. T. Michaux Moody, manager of the Richmond Civic Music Association, stated last night that good reservations are still available, due to the extraordinary capacity of the Mosque, though the auditorium will be well filled by the demand made during the last several weeks. The appearance of the Boston Symphony has become an established event of Richmond's annual musical schedule.

Although Dr. Koussevitzky has notably performed during his seasons in America a number of Russian scores by Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and other composers, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, which will be a feature of the program here, has made a particularly brilliant impression. Commenting on its performance by the Boston Symphony under the conducting of Dr. Koussevitzky, Warren Storey-Smith of the Boston Post stated in part:

"To recall the symphony concerts since the coming of Dr. Koussevitzky is, for many, to think first of his conducting of the music of his fellow countrymen, and this is no disparagement of his remarkable achievements with the music of other lands. And to the list of notable performances of Russian music may now be added that of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony at the concert of yesterday afternoon. . . . The pervading theme of Fate, so different from the corresponding motive in Tchaikovsky's succeeding symphony, sounded the note, not only of awe, but of terror.

"In headlong rush went the finale. Mr. Koussevitzky's baton flashing in air like a sword of battle, the orchestra accomplishing marvels of virtuosity, tossing off Tchaikovsky's sixteenths as though they were child's play, outwardly in a very delirium of emotion yet actualy in hair-trigger response to the conductor's will. Contrasted more than ever sharply to the passion of the first movement and the excitements of the last, the melancholy Andantino and the Scherzo of plucked strings and isolated wind-choir each came and went yesterday in beautifully finished performances, while throughout the symphony there was an elasticity remarkable even for this orchestra's present prowess. Hardly had the last chord ceased to sound before the audience sought release in frantic applause that continued unabated until Dr. Koussevitzky, on his third return to the stage, brought the players to their feet."

Accompanying the Boston Symphony in its Richmond appearance as soloist will be the noted young Spanish-American pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, whose art has been highly acclaimed by Northern critics.

The program has been announced as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in G minor (Koechel No. 550).
I. Allegro molto.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto; Trio.
IV. Finale; Allegro assai.

Stravinsky—Capriccio for piano and orchestra.
I. Presto.
II. Andante rapsodico.
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.

Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.
I. Andante sostenuto; moderto con anima (in movimento di valse).
II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
III. Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

Music in

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit of the season to Brooklyn to give a concert in the Academy of Music, next Thursday evening at 8:15 instead of the usual Friday evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with Sir Edward Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, Op. 47. He will introduce to Brooklyn Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra which, first performed in Paris last year, has had its first American performances under his direction in Boston, New York and other cities. The soloist in this score will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, the brilliant young Spanish-American pianist.

The latter part of the program will be occupied by Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." Thiss et of pianoforte pieces has been arranged for a large orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The French composer made the arrangement especially for Koussevitzky and it was by him that the suite was first played in Europe and America. The titles of the pictures which the Russian composer has set to music are as follows: Promenade, Gnomus, Promenade, Tuileries, Bydlo, Promenade, Ballet of Chicks in their Shells, Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle, Limoges, The Market Place, Catacombs, The Hut on Fowl's Legs, The Great Gate at Kiev.

The Budapest String Quartet (Emil Hauser, violin; Jose Roismann, violin; Stephen Ipolyi, viola; Mischa Schneider, 'cello, which is playing its first American tour this season, will be heard in a chamber music recital at the Academy this afternoon. The program follows: Smetana, E minor, Op. 116 ("Aus meinem Leben"); Dittersdorf, A major, No. 6; Tschaikowsky, F major, Op. 22.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

FEB 1 1931

AMONG MU

By ELISABETH E. POE.

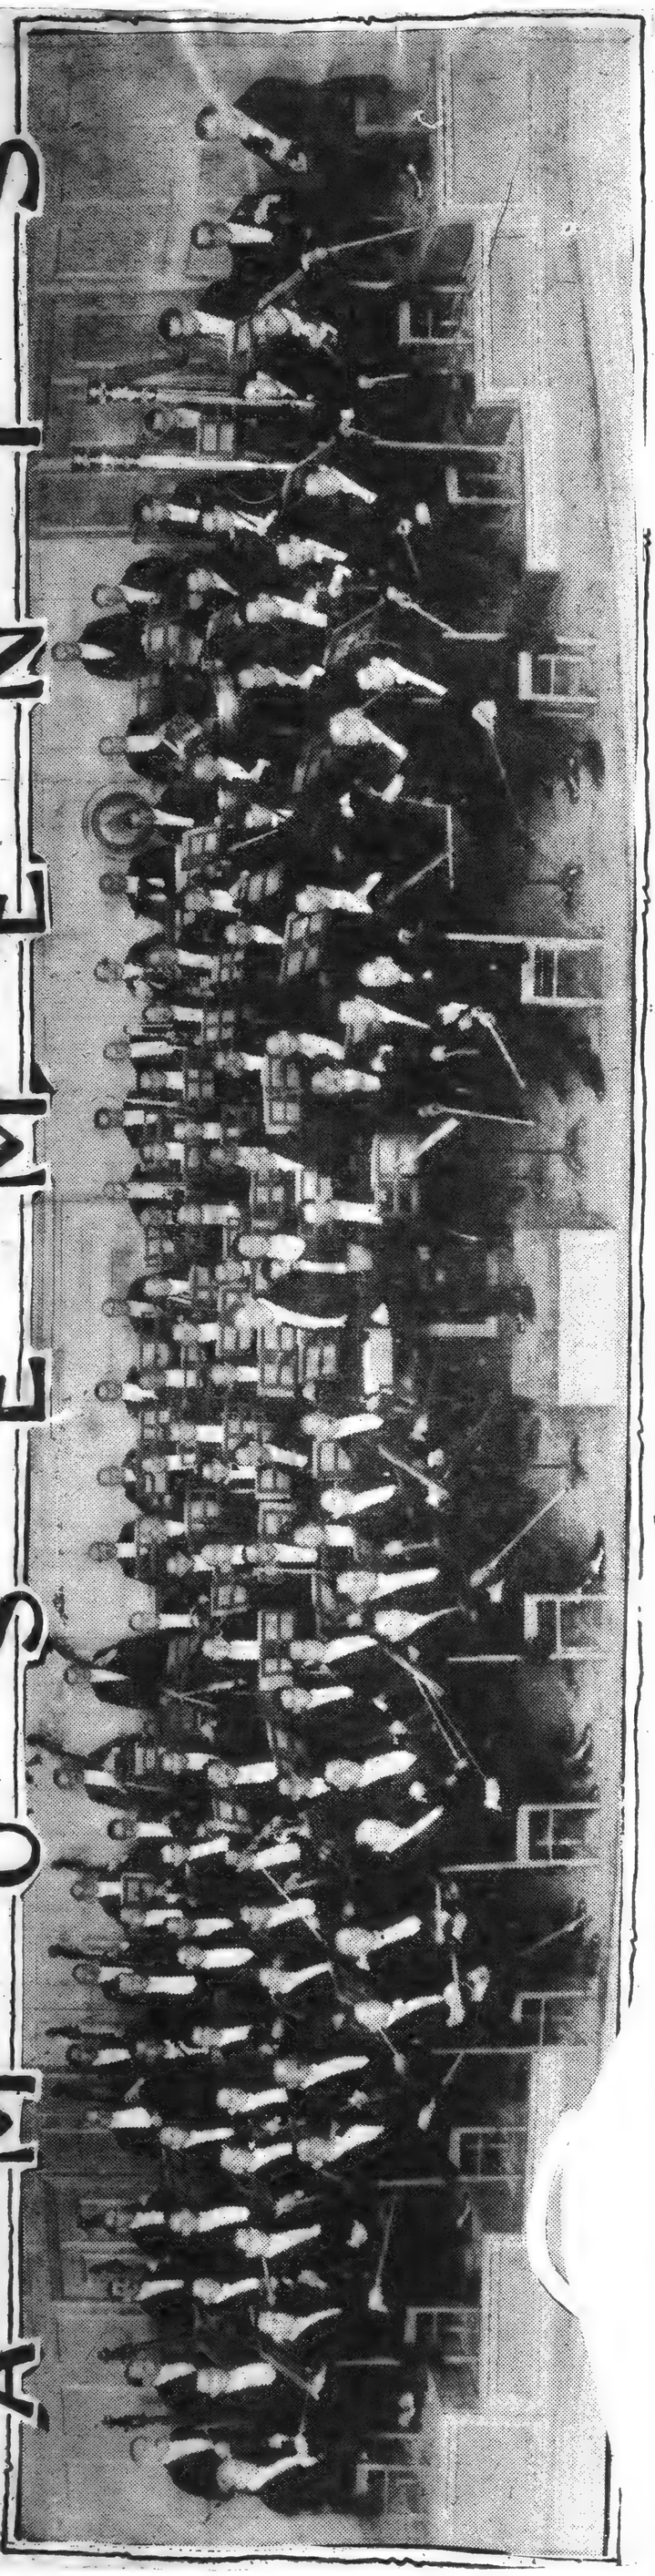
IN the less than three weeks remaining until Ash Wednesday begins the 40 penitential days the formal musical season so far as professional concerts are concerned will be virtually completed. Of course there will be concerts by visiting artists for some weeks into Lent. But the pressure of full musical weeks when three or four major concerts are on the calendars will be over.

One can sit down then and judge in calmness what has truly been a remarkable musical season in Washington. Judging from the good audiences at the concerts the so-called depression has had little effect upon the cultural arts. The evening concerts, while losing somewhat in patronage among those who entertain and are entertained constantly, have been most successful in providing opportunity to hear really good artists to thousands of Government workers who can not attend the afternoon concerts. That the chance is appreciated greatly no one can doubt who has witnessed the enthusiasm prevailing in these groups while world-famous artists have been singing or playing for them.

Much interest is expressed in Washington in the recent Paris premiere of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms." This symphony has its premiere in America at the celebration of its fiftieth anniversary by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. European critics were as kind to this latest work of Stravinsky's as American ones had been and some even hailed it as the culminating point of his art.

124

MUSEUM



BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT, SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, CONDUCTOR
MOSQUE, MONDAY NIGHT

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 1 - 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 2

Boston Symphony At Mosque Tonight

Serge Koussevitzky and Ensemble Begin Tour

Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive here today for their annual concert in Richmond which will be held tonight at the Mosque. Dr. Koussexitsky and the ensemble of the orchestra left Boston last night on a special train and will arrive at Broad Street Station this morning at 10:40 o'clock.

The Boston-Richmond trip is the longest the orchestra will make this season as many of the usual out-of-town concerts have been eliminated in order that this anniversary celebration in Boston may include more concerts.

The party includes, in addition to Dr. Koussevitsky, 111 musicians, the librarian and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the conductor soloist.

The Richmond Civic Musica Association is sponsoring tonight's concert. The program will include Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

After tonight's concert the orchestra will give single concerts in Washington and Baltimore on Tuesday and Wednesday nights and three concerts in New York. They will return to Boston after the week's tour.

Conductor of t

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

conductor organiza
the Rich

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Koussevitzky And Roxy on Music Bills

By CARROLL DULANEY.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its only concert of the season in Baltimore at the Lyric next Wednesday.

Just two months ago this orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliant leadership, thrilled the musical world with a four-performance festival of Beethoven in Washington as part of the orchestra's golden jubilee celebration. And an even more pretentious Bach festival is planned for Boston in March in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who organized the orchestra and carried it along financially for many years.

For this program Wednesday Dr. Koussevitzky will present Strauss' "Symphonia Domestic" in one movement. He will also give Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra (opus 47), the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing at the Lyric Wednesday evening.

Among the artists who will be in Washingto selle; lower left, Serge Koussevitzsky, a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

erge its seater-con-
con-
con sen will in to;

e). er-on for lude to choreo-

Bostonians Top Line-up Of the Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final Washington appearance this season, with a concert at Constitution Hall on Tuesday afternoon, February 3, at 4:30 o'clock. Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. This concert will constitute the third attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic series.

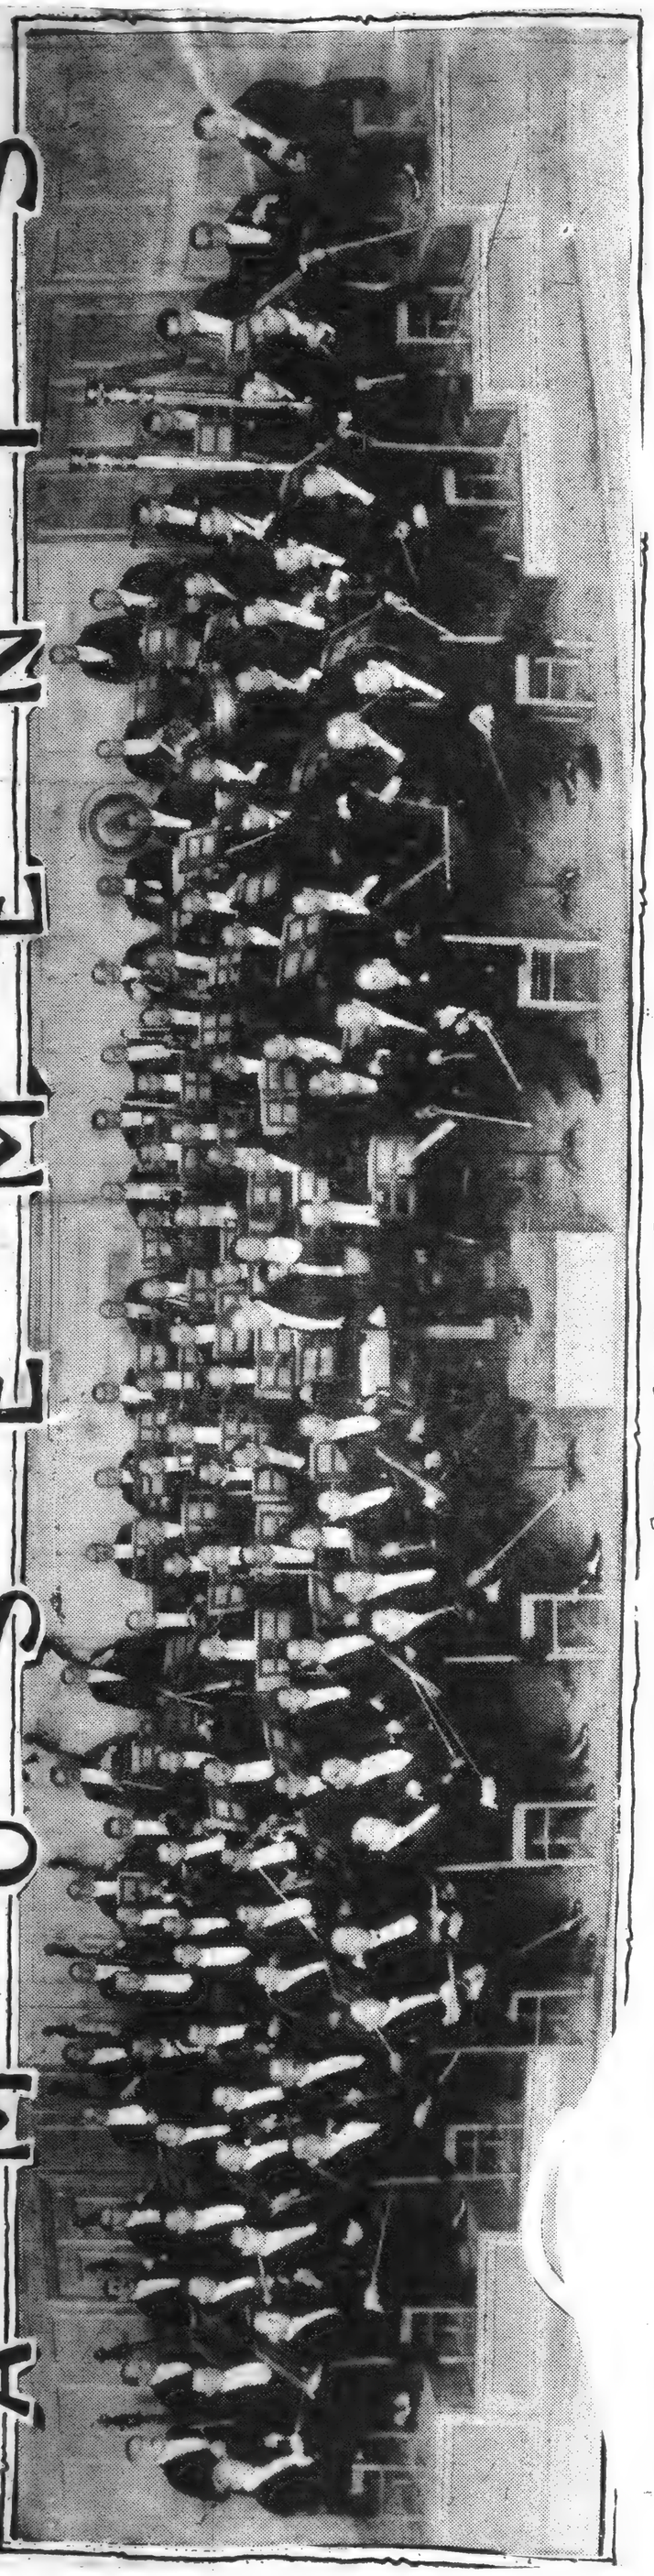
For his Tuesday concert, Dr. Koussevitzky's program offers the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony in F minor (Opus 36), Elgar's introduction and Allegro for string orchestra (Opus 47), the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and Ravels choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 1 - 1931

INFORMATION OBSCURED

124

SEMI-AMU



BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT, SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, CONDUCTOR
MOSQUE, MONDAY NIGHT

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 1 - 1931

Conductor of the Bo

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of t who will bring his famous organizatio —an event sponsored by the Richm

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 2

Boston Symphony At Mosque Tonight

Serge Koussevitzky and Ensemble Begin Tour

Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive here today for their annual concert in Richmond which will be held tonight at the Mosque. Dr. Koussexitsky and the ensemble of the orchestra left Boston last night on a special train and will arrive at Broad Street Station this morning at 10:40 o'clock.

The Boston-Richmond trip is the longest the orchestra will make this season as many of the usual out-of-town concerts have been eliminated in order that this anniversary celebration in Boston may include more concerts.

The party includes, in addition to Dr. Koussevitsky, 111 musicians, the librarian and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the conductor soloist.

The Richmond Civic Musica Association is sponsoring tonight's concert. The program will include Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

After tonight's concert the orchestra will give single concerts in Washington and Baltimore on Tuesday and Wednesday nights and three concerts in New York. They will return to Boston after the week's tour.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Music Bills

By CARROLL DULANEY.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its only concert of the season in Baltimore at the Lyric next Wednesday.

Just two months ago this orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliant leadership, thrilled the musical world with a four-performance festival of Beethoven in Washington as part of the orchestra's golden jubilee celebration. And an even more pretentious Bach festival is planned for Boston in March in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who organized the orchestra and carried it along financially for many years.

For this program Wednesday Dr. Koussevitzky will present Strauss' "Symphonia Domestic" in one movement. He will also give Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra (opus 47), the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

R. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing at the Lyric Wednesday evening.

Among the artists who will be in Washingto selle; lower left, Serge Koussevitzky, a

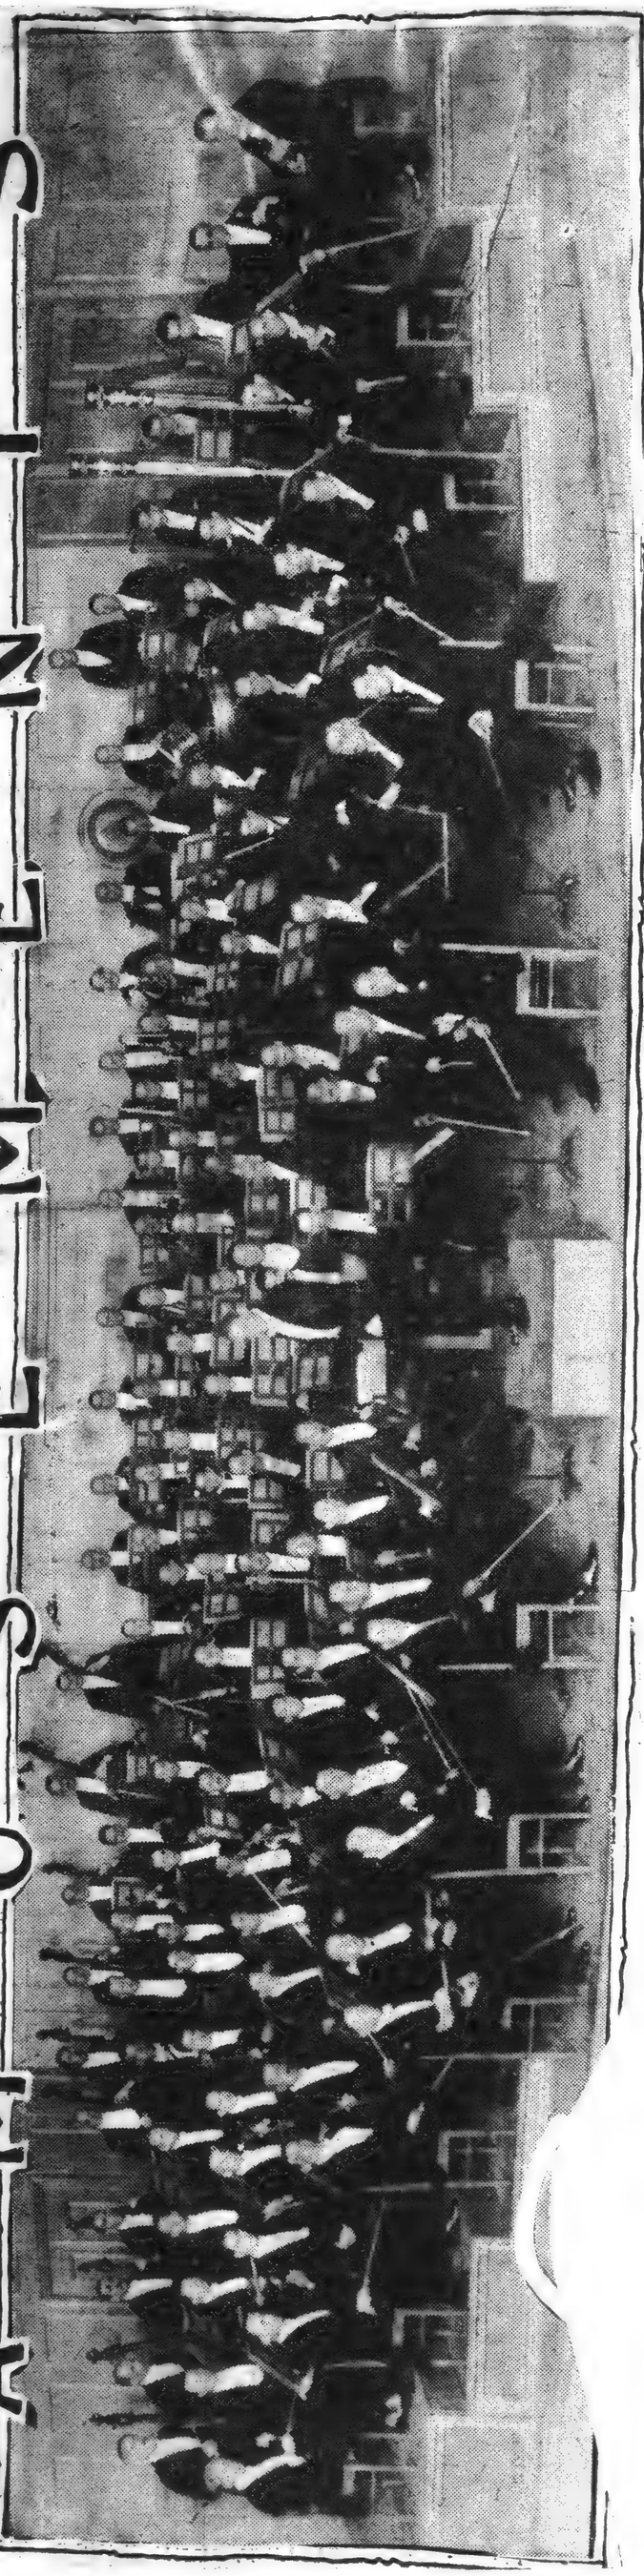
THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final Washington appearance of the season at Constitution Hall Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will constitute the third attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's philharmonic series of afternoon musical events at Constitution Hall.

For his concert, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen a program of distinction and charm. He will offer the Tschaikowsky "Fourth Symphony in F Minor, Opus 36." 1. Andante sostenuto; moderto con anima (in movemento do valse). 2. Andantino in modo do canzona. 3. Scherzo, pizzisato ostinato. 4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco. Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Opus 47"; the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the Ravel choreographic poem "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 1 - 1931

for string orchestra (Opus 47), the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and Ravels choreographic poem, "La Valse."

124



BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT, SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, CONDUCTOR
MOSQUE, MONDAY NIGHT

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 1 - 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 1 1931

Boston Symphony At Mosque Tonight

Serge Koussevitzky and Ensemble Begin Tour

Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive here today for their annual concert in Richmond which will be held tonight at the Mosque. Dr. Koussexitsky and the ensemble of the orchestra left Boston last night on a special train and will arrive at Broad Street Station this morning at 10:40 o'clock.

The Boston-Richmond trip is the longest the orchestra will make this season as many of the usual out-of-town concerts have been eliminated in order that this anniversary celebration in Boston may include more concerts.

The party includes, in addition to Dr. Koussevitsky, 111 musicians, the librarian and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the conductor soloist.

The Richmond Civic Musica Association is sponsoring tonight's concert. The program will include Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

After tonight's concert the orchestra will give single concerts in Washington and Baltimore on Tuesday and Wednesday nights and three concerts in New York. They will return to Boston after the week's tour.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
FEB 1 1931

Koussevitzky And Roxy on Music Bills

By CARROLL DULANEY.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its only concert of the season in Baltimore at the Lyric next Wednesday.

Just two months ago this orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliant leadership, thrilled the musical world with a four-performance festival of Beethoven in Washington as part of the orchestra's golden jubilee celebration. And an even more pretentious Bach festival is planned for Boston in March in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who organized the orchestra and carried it along financially for many years.

For this program Wednesday Dr. Koussevitzky will present Strauss' "Symphonia Domestic" in one movement. He will also give Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra (opus 47), the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing at the Lyric Wednesday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 1 1931

Among the artists who will be in Washington this selle; lower left, Serge Koussevitzky, a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
FEB 1 1931

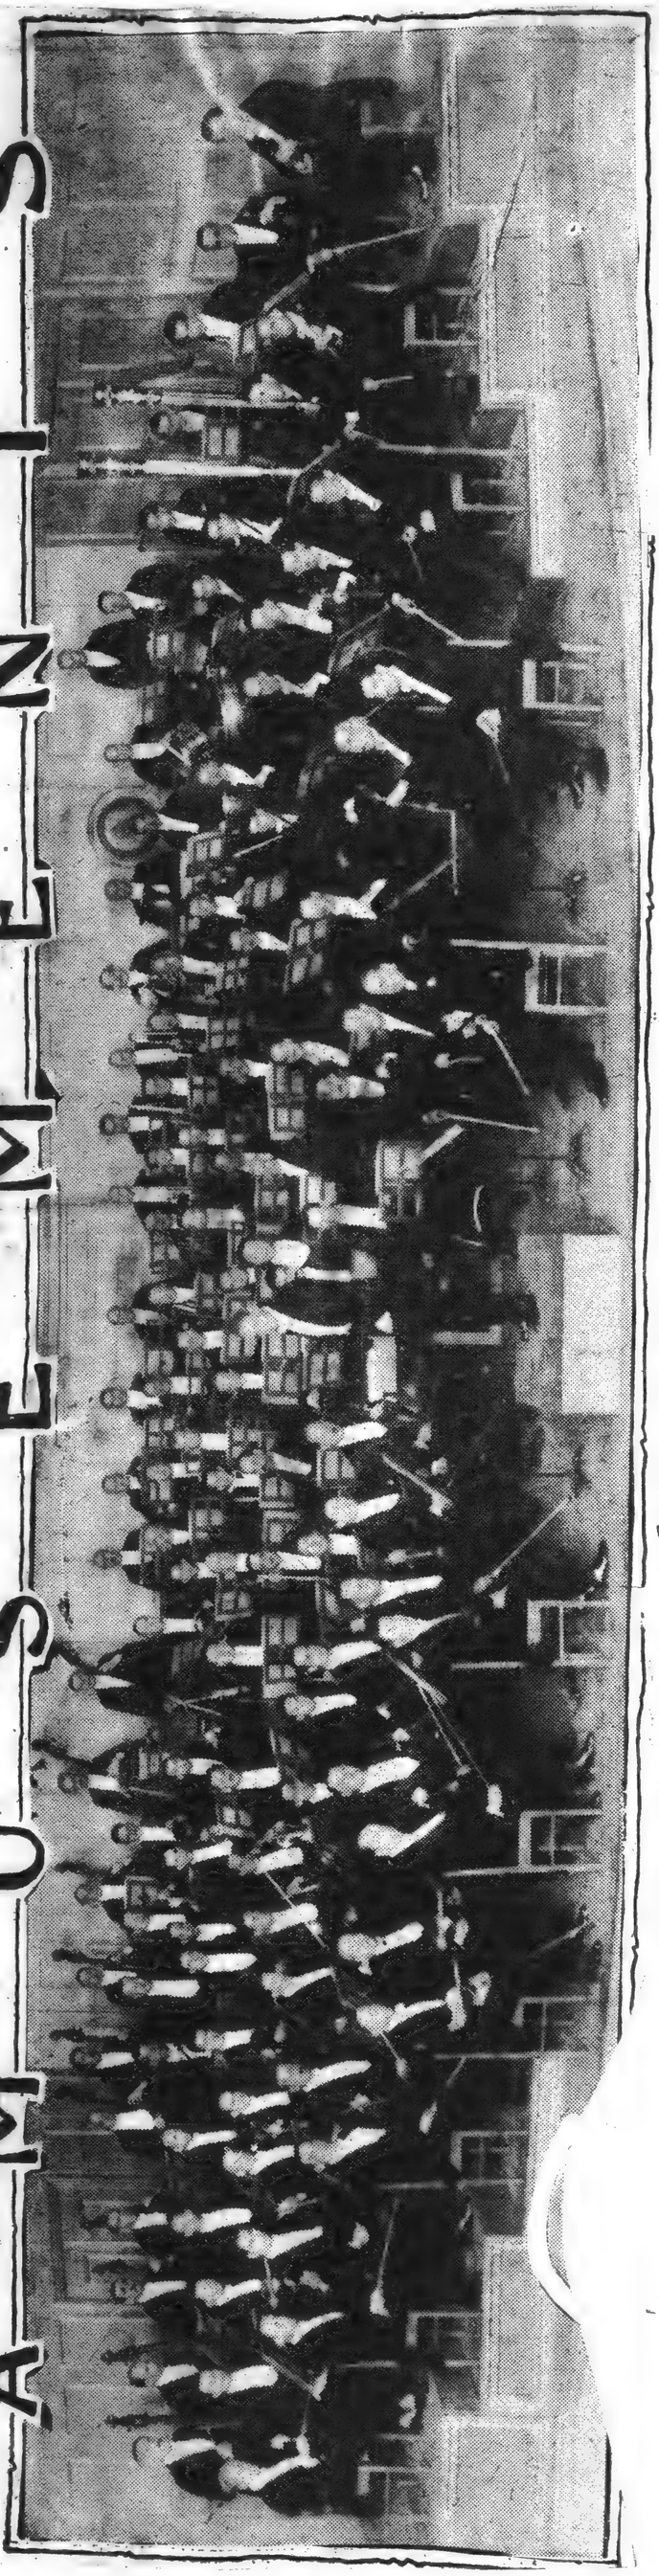
Bostonians Top Line-up Of the Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final Washington appearance this season, with a concert at Constitution Hall on Tuesday afternoon, February 3, at 4:30 o'clock. Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. This concert will constitute the third attraction in Mrs. Wilson Greene's Philharmonic series.

For his Tuesday concert, Dr. Koussevitzky's program offers the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony in F minor (Opus 36), Elgar's introduction and Allegro for string orchestra (Opus 47), the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and Ravels choreographic poem, "La Valse."

124

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 1 - 1931



BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT, SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, CONDUCTOR
MOSQUE, MONDAY NIGHT

S E M I A U T O

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 1 - 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 1 - 1931

Conductor of the Boston Symphony

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of t... Symphony Orchestra, who will bring his famous organization ... row evening —an event sponsored by the Richmon...

Boston Symphony At Mosque Tonight

Serge Koussevitzky and Ensemble Begin Tour

Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive here today for their annual concert in Richmond which will be held tonight at the Mosque. Dr. Koussexitsky and the ensemble of the orchestra left Boston last night on a special train and will arrive at Broad Street Station this morning at 10:40 o'clock

The Boston-Richmond trip is the longest the orchestra will make this season as many of the usual out-of-town concerts have been eliminated in order that this anniversary celebration in Boston may include more concerts.

The party includes, in addition to Dr. Koussevitsky, 111 musicians, the librarian and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the conductor soloist.

The Richmond Civic Musica Association is sponsoring tonight's concert. The program will include Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

After tonight's concert the orchestra will give single concerts in Washington and Baltimore on Tuesday and Wednesday nights and three concerts in New York. They will return to Boston after the week's tour.

Music Bills

By CARROLL DULANEY.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its only concert of the season in Baltimore at the Lyric next Wednesday.

Just two months ago this orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliant leadership, thrilled the musical world with a four-performance festival of Beethoven in Washington as part of the orchestra's golden jubilee celebration. And an even more pretentious Bach festival is planned for Boston in March in memory of Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who organized the orchestra and carried it along financially for many years.

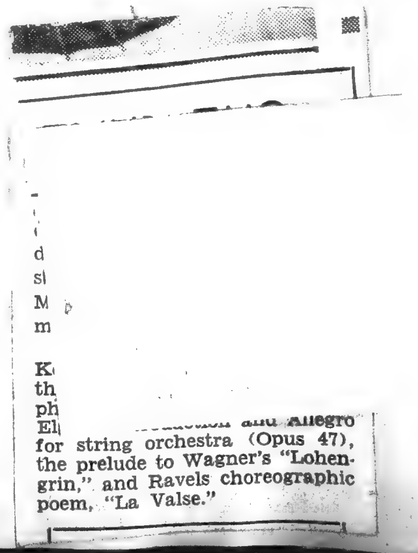
For this program Wednesday Dr. Koussevitzky will present Strauss' "Symphonia Domestic" in one movement. He will also give Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra (opus 47), the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing at the Lyric Wednesday evening.

Among the artists who will be in Washington ... selle; lower left, Serge Koussevitzsky, a...

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final Washington appearance of the season at Constitution Hall Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will constitute the third attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's philharmonic series of afternoon musical events at Constitution Hall.

For his concert, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen a program of distinction and charm. He will offer the Tschaikowsky "Fourth Symphony in F Minor, Opus 36." 1. Andante sostenuto; moderto con anima (in movemento do valse). 2. Andantino in modo do canzona. 3. Scherzo, pizzisato ostinato. 4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco. Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Opus 47"; the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the Ravel choreographic poem "La Valse."



... for string orchestra (Opus 47), the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and Ravels choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

Koussevitzky To Conduct At The Lyric

Concert Situation Here And Discouragements Met By It Bring Up Many Questions

Events Scheduled For Coming Weeks Regarded As Of Importance In The Season

Music This Week

TODAY

Maryland Casualty Auditorium, Treble Clef Club, 4 P. M.

Lord Baltimore Hotel, Cyril Zamanski, tenor, 4 P. M.

Jewish Educational Alliance, 1216 East Baltimore street, mixed recital, 8.30 P. M.

WEDNESDAY

Lyric Theater, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 8.30 P. M.

THURSDAY

Peabody Recital Hall, teachers' recital, 8.15 P. M.

FRIDAY

Peabody Auditorium, Carlo Zecchi, pianist, 4 P. M.

Lyric Theater, Schumann-Heink and Roxy Gang, 8.30 P. M.

SATURDAY

Emerson Hotel, Baltimore Music Club, members' recital, 2.30 P. M.

By HELEN S. TAYLOR

THE current month will not have as many musical attractions as the past one, but those scheduled are of primary importance. The concert situation this season in several ways has been very discouraging. Artists who in other cities are still attracting their full quotas of attendance are finding Baltimore unresponsive.

The attendance at symphony concerts, except in one or two instances, has not been full. Never in the history of concert-going have the boxes at the Lyric remained so consistently empty as this season, in a city which has long been regarded as very musical.

Whether this is due to a winter exodus of the initiate to warmer latitudes or is an argument that the individual artist is slowly losing his ability to draw more than a very limited crowd, which is not true elsewhere, no one seems to be able to answer, and all around, at concerts and elsewhere, one hears the same question, Why?

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The main event for the week will be the now annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its magnetic conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston orchestra has this year celebrated its golden jubilee, fifty years of brilliant and honorable service to music. During that time it has had many able and gifted directors, but no one of them has ever approximated the popularity of the present one.

It is true that we of the present have acquired a tendency to lionize our orchestra directors, who were taken more as a matter of course years back, but at least the attitude shows a step up in that we have acquired knowledge and therefore a greater appreciation of the value of the truly constructive leader to an orchestra.

HIS OPPORTUNITY

Dr. Koussevitzky had an extraordinarily favorable opportunity, in that his orchestra had practically to be rebuilt and its morale restored, so that he was able to do for it what Stokowski did for the Philadelphia Orchestra some years ago. Just how important that work was and the results it netted was very evident to anyone privileged to have heard the Beethoven festival in Washington early in December.

A similar and more pretentious one is planned for Boston in March, a Bach festival in memory of Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the organization fifty years ago and whose financial support enabled it to survive until it could run along unaided. The director has announced for Wednesday's concert, Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53, in one movement; Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47; Prelude to Lohengrin and Ravel's choreographic poem, La Valse.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

FEB 1 1931

Boston Symphony Pays Third Visit To New York

Zecchi, Italian Pianist, Is Soloist This Week With Philharmonic-Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall next Friday evening, instead of the customary Thursday, when Serge Koussevitzky will devote his program to numbers infrequently heard here: Sir Edward Elgar's introduction and allegro for strings, Op. 47; Sibelius's seventh symphony, Op. 105, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." On Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat the Strauss work, and will also present Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, which was given last month in the Thursday evening series. The soloist again will be Jesus Maria Sanroma.

The Sibelius symphony, published in 1925, was played for the first time in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski in the spring of 1926. Its first New York performance was by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky on January 8, 1927, followed by two performances by the New York Symphony under Klemperer on January 13 and 16. It has not been played here since 1927.

The Boston Symphony's third Brooklyn concert will be given next Thursday night, February 5, instead of on Friday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

CONDUCTORS AND PROGRAMS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Why does a conductor not take into account what other conductors have played or what he himself has played? At his last visit Serge Koussevitzky played Stravinsky's new "Capriccio," but not the Prokofieff symphony he had first announced. Now, for his next visit, he announces the "Capriccio" a second time, instead of letting us hear the Prokofieff at least once.

He also announces Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Sibelius's Seventh symphony (though he has played these works here and has not played others by the same composers). Giving so few concerts in New York, Mr. Koussevitzky should repeat only unfamiliar works that cannot be grasped at first hearing so that we may hear as many as possible of the interesting works that he plays in Boston. If anything, then, he should repeat the Sibelius symphony, which is rarely heard and not easily grasped. Instead, he announces one performance of this work, and two of the Strauss, which is well known and not difficult!

A SUBSCRIBER.

New York, Jan. 27, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

FEB 1 1931

LAST CONCERT THIS TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final Washington appearance of this, its fiftieth anniversary season, with a concert at Constitution Hall on Tuesday afternoon, February 3, at 4:30 o'clock, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. This will constitute the third attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic series.

For his final 1930-31 Washington concert, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen a program of great distinction and charm. It offers the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony in F minor (Opus 36) in four movements—I, Andante sostenuto, moderato con anima (in movements di valse); II, Andantino in modo do canzona; III, Scherzo; pizzzicato ostinato; IV, Finale: Allegro con fucco. Elgar's introduction and allegro for string orchestra (Opus 47) will open the program, which will also include the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall on Friday at 8.30 instead of the usual Thursday evening, and on Saturday afternoon at 2.30.

At the Friday concert Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present Sir Edward Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Opus 47; the seventh and latest symphony of Sibelius, Opus 105, and Richard Strauss's Symphonia Domestica.

At the matinee concert Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which Koussevitzky has introduced to America and which he played at the evening concert of this orchestra's last visit, will be repeated. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist. The program will open with two preludes by Bach, which have been arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, and close with Strauss's Symphonia Domestica.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

FEB 18 1931

First Conductor Of Hub Orchestra 81 Yrs. Old Today

London, Feb. 18. — (AP) — Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given to him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations. It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Co. orchestra in the same program given his Boston jubilee concert.

CONDUCTORS AND PROGRA

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Why does a conductor not tak account what other conductors played or what he himself played? At his last visit Serge sevitzky played Stravinsky's "Capriccio," but not the Prok symphony he had first annou Now, for his next visit, he anno the "Capriccio" a second tim stead of letting us hear the Prok at least once.

He also announces Strauss's

YLE IN SINGING

N. Y. TIMES FEB 1

fonia Domestica" and Sibeli Seventh symphony (though he played these works here and has played others by the same posers). Giving so few concert New York, Mr. Koussevitzky sh repeat only unfamiliar works cannot be grasped at first hea so that we may hear as many as possible of the interesting works that he plays in Boston. If anything

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

Conducts

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony appear here Tuesday.

Boston Symphony Director Eager for Concert Tonight

By KATHERINE WARREN.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the 110 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will play at 8:30 o'clock tonight at the Mosque theatre under the auspices of the Richmond Civic Music Association, arrived at 10:20 A. M. today at the Broad-Street station on their special train of six Pullmans and a baggage car, on which they left Boston last night.

Almost the last to alight were Dr. Koussevitzky and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the young pianist, who will be heard as soloist in the new capriccio by Stravinsky.

Dr. Koussevitzky is so tremendously enthused over the capriccio that he had hardly stepped from the train before he began talking about it.

"It is wonderful, wonderful," he said. "Our audience at Carnegie Hall was enthusiastic and nearly all of the New York critics united in praising it. You have a great new treat in store for you when you hear it this evening. I cannot tell you how remarkable it is."

Sanroma, although more quiet in manner, was equally enthused over the new composition.

The noted conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, was warmly clad in a fur-collared great coat, with a heavy scarf wrapped tightly about his throat, for when he left Boston yes-

Continued on Page Nine.

Leaders of Boston Symphony Arrive

Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano soloist, were photographed by The News Leader at the Broad-Street station, where they were welcomed on their arrival at 10:15 A. M. by T. Michaux Moody, manager of the Richmond Civic Music Association. The orchestra will be heard this evening at the Mosque theatre, under the auspices of the association. Dr. Koussevitzky is shown shaking hands with Mr. Moody. [News Leader photo by Dementi.]

DIRECTOR IS EAGER FOR MOSQUE EVENT

Continued From First Page.

terday there were two feet of snow on the ground. He was delighted to step into an almost April day in Richmond, and kept talking about how happy our climate should make us here.

"Today it seems like Cannes or Monte Carlo," he said. "Although I am Russian and should be used to the cold, I do not like our Boston winters. I should love, if possible, to live in your Southern climate.

"It is not always like this, however, for on my first visit here in April seven years ago, when I had expected to arrive to blue skies and flowers everywhere, it was very, very cold.

"Richmond will like our program this evening," he said, "Mozart's and Tchaikovsky's symphonies and especially the Stravinsky."

Likes Audiences.

Dr. Koussevitzky likes the audiences he has had here, which he found most responsive. Philadelphia audiences, he says, he likes least of all, for he finds them more attuned to the martial music of Sousa's band than to that of a symphony orchestra.

Sanroma also remembers playing here some years ago, but his chief memory of the city lies in what he described as "that terrible auditorium," which, it developed, was the old city auditorium. When he was told of the new Mosque theatre, in which he is to play, he was delighted.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who by the way, is the only man ever to be awarded the honorary degree of doctor of laws at Harvard University, returned from a midwinter vacation last Sunday. He conducted Monday night, Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Boston.

On leaving here the orchestra will go to Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn for a concert at each place, before returning to Boston next Sunday.

The conductor and soloist were met at the station by T. Michaux Moody, manager of the Richmond Civic Music Association, whom Dr. Koussexitzky greeted like an old friend. They were taken to the Jefferson hotel, which they will make their headquarters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

Hortense Husserl Triumphs.

Seldom before in the annals of American pianists has an artist risen to acknowledged virtuosity more spectacularly or in a briefer period than has Hortense Husserl, one of the finest performers of the present generation of younger pianists. Making her solo debut in Newark to one of the largest and most appreciative audiences that ever filled a local hall, then following that triumph with even greater success in New York, she attained the height of her pianistic career last week in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

Koussevitzky To Conduct At The Lyric

Concert Situation Here And Discouragements Met By It Bring Up Many Questions

Events Scheduled For Coming Weeks Regarded As Of Importance In The Season

Music This Week

TODAY

Maryland Casualty Auditorium, Treble Clef Club, 4 P. M.

Lord Baltimore Hotel, Cyril Zamanski, tenor, 4 P. M.

Jewish Educational Alliance, 1216 East Baltimore street, mixed recital, 8.30 P. M.

WEDNESDAY

Lyric Theater, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 8.30 P. M.

THURSDAY

Peabody Recital Hall, teachers' recital, 8.15 P. M.

FRIDAY

Peabody Auditorium, Carlo Zecchi, pianist, 4 P. M.

Lyric Theater, Schumann-Heink and Roxy Gang, 8.30 P. M.

SATURDAY

Emerson Hotel, Baltimore Music Club, members' recital, 2.30 P. M.

By HELEN S. TAYLOR

THE current month will not have as many musical attractions as the past one, but those scheduled are of primary importance. The concert situation this season in several ways has been very discouraging. Artists who in other cities are still attracting their full quotas of attendance are finding Baltimore unresponsive.

The attendance at symphony concerts, except in one or two instances, has not been full. Never in the history of concert-going have the boxes at the Lyric remained so consistently empty as this season, in a city which has long been regarded as very musical.

Whether this is due to a winter exodus of the initiate to warmer latitudes or is an argument that the individual artist is slowly losing his ability to draw more than a very limited crowd, which is not true elsewhere, no one seems to be able to answer, and all around, at concerts and elsewhere, one hears the same question, Why?

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The main event for the week will be the now annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its magnetic conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston orchestra has this year celebrated its golden jubilee, fifty years of brilliant and honorable service to music. During that time it has had many able and gifted directors, but no one of them has ever approximated the popularity of the present one.

It is true that we of the present have acquired a tendency to lionize our orchestra directors, who were taken more as a matter of course years back, but at least the attitude shows a step up in that we have acquired knowledge and therefore a greater appreciation of the value of the truly constructive leader to an orchestra.

HIS OPPORTUNITY

Dr. Koussevitzky had an extraordinarily favorable opportunity, in that his orchestra had practically to be rebuilt and its morale restored, so that he was able to do for it what Stokowski did for the Philadelphia Orchestra some years ago. Just how important that work was and the results it netted was very evident to anyone privileged to have heard the Beethoven festival in Washington early in December.

A similar and more pretentious one is planned for Boston in March, a Bach festival in memory of Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the organization fifty years ago and whose financial support enabled it to survive until it could run along unaided. The director has announced for Wednesday's concert, Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53, in one movement; Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47; Prelude to Lohengrin and Ravel's choreographic poem, La Valse.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
FEB 1 1931

Boston Symphony Pays Third Visit To New York

Zecchi, Italian Pianist, Is Soloist This Week With Philharmonic-Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall next Friday evening, instead of the customary Thursday, when Serge Koussevitzky will devote his program to numbers infrequently heard here: Sir Edward Elgar's introduction and allegro for strings, Op. 47; Sibelius's seventh symphony, Op. 105, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." On Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat the Strauss work, and will also present Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, which was given last month in the Thursday evening series. The soloist again will be Jesus Maria Sanroma.

The Sibelius symphony, published in 1925, was played for the first time in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski in the spring of 1926. Its first New York performance was by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky on January 8, 1927, followed by two performances by the New York Symphony under Klemperer on January 13 and 16. It has not been played here since 1927.

The Boston Symphony's third Brooklyn concert will be given next Thursday night, February 5, instead of on Friday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
1931

CONDUCTORS AND PROGRAMS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Why does a conductor not take into account what other conductors have played or what he himself has played? At his last visit Serge Koussevitzky played Stravinsky's new "Capriccio," but not the Prokofieff symphony he had first announced. Now, for his next visit, he announces the "Capriccio" a second time, instead of letting us hear the Prokofieff at least once.

He also announces Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Sibelius's Seventh symphony (though he has played these works here and has not played others by the same composers). Giving so few concerts in New York, Mr. Koussevitzky should repeat only unfamiliar works that cannot be grasped at first hearing so that we may hear as many as possible of the interesting works that he plays in Boston. If anything then, he should repeat the Sibelius symphony, which is rarely heard and not easily grasped. Instead, he announces one performance of this work, and two of the Strauss, which is well known and not difficult!

A SUBSCRIBER.

New York, Jan. 27, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
FEB 1 1931

LAST CONCERT THIS TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final Washington appearance of this, its fiftieth anniversary season, with a concert at Constitution Hall on Tuesday afternoon, February 3, at 4:30 o'clock, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. This will constitute the third attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic series.

For his final 1930-31 Washington concert, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen a program of great distinction and charm. It offers the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony in F minor (Opus 36) in four movements—I, Andante sostenuto, moderato con anima (in movements di valse); II, Andantino in modo da canzona; III, Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato; IV, Finale: Allegro con fuoco. Elgar's introduction and allegro for string orchestra (Opus 47) will open the program, which will also include the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall on Friday at 8.30 instead of the usual Thursday evening, and on Saturday afternoon at 2.30.

At the Friday concert Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present Sir Edward Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Opus 47; the seventh and latest symphony of Sibelius, Opus 105, and Richard Strauss's Symphonia Domestica.

At the matinee concert Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which Koussevitzky has introduced to America and which he played at the evening concert of this orchestra's last visit, will be repeated. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist. The program will open with two preludes by Bach, which have been arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, and close with Strauss's Symphonia Domestica.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE
FEB 18 1931

First Conductor Of Hub Orchestra 81 Yrs. Old Today

London, Feb. 18. — (AP) — Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given to him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations.

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Co. orchestra in the same program given at his Boston jubilee concert.

CONDUCTORS AND PROGRA

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Why does a conductor not tak account what other conductors played or what he himself played? At his last visit Serge sevitzky played Stravinsky's "Capriccio," but not the Prok symphony he had first annou Now, for his next visit, he anno the "Capriccio" a second tim stead of letting us hear the Prok at least once.

He also announces Strauss's

YLE IN SINGING

N. Y. TIMES FEB 1

fonia Domestica" and Sibeli Seventh symphony (though he played these works here and has played others by the same posers). Giving so few concert New York, Mr. Koussevitzky sh repeat only unfamiliar works cannot be grasped at first hea so that we may hear as many as possible of the interesting works that he plays in Boston. If anything

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
1931

Conducts

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony appear here Tuesday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

Boston Symphony Director Eager for Concert Tonight

By KATHERINE WARREN.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the 110 members of his Boston Symphony orchestra, which will play at 8:30 o'clock tonight at the Mosque theatre under the auspices of the Richmond Civic Music Association, arrived at 10:20 A. M. today at the Broad-Street station on their special train of six Pullmans and a baggage car, on which they left Boston last night.

Almost the last to alight were Dr. Koussevitzky and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the young pianist, who will be heard as soloist in the new capriccio by Stravinsky.

Dr. Koussevitzky is so tremendously enthused over the capriccio that he had hardly stepped from the train before he began talking about it.

"It is wonderful, wonderful," he said. "Our audience at Carnegie Hall was enthusiastic and nearly all of the New York critics united in praising it. You have a great new treat in store for you when you hear it this evening. I cannot tell you how remarkable it is."

Sanroma, although more quiet in manner, was equally enthused over the new composition.

The noted conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, was warmly clad in a fur-collared great coat with a heavy scarf wrapped tightly about his throat, for when he left Boston yes-

Continued on Page Nine.

Leaders of Boston Symphony Arrive

Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano soloist, were photographed by The News Leader at the Broad-Street station, where they were welcomed on their arrival at 10:15 A. M. by T. Michaux Moody, manager of the Richmond Civic Music Association. The orchestra will be heard this evening at the Mosque theatre, under the auspices of the association. Dr. Koussevitzky is shown shaking hands with Mr. Moody. [News Leader photo by Dementi.]

DIRECTOR IS EAGER FOR MOSQUE EVENT

Continued From First Page.

terday there were two feet of snow on the ground. He was delighted to step into an almost April day in Richmond, and kept talking about how happy our climate should make us here.

"Today it seems like Cannes or Monte Carlo," he said. "Although I am Russian and should be used to the cold, I do not like our Boston winters. I should love, if possible, to live in your Southern climate.

"It is not always like this, however, for on my first visit here in April seven years ago, when I had expected to arrive to blue skies and flowers everywhere, it was very, very cold.

"Richmond will like our program this evening," he said, "Mozart's and Tchaikovsky's symphonies and especially the Stravinsky."

Likes Audiences.

Dr. Koussevitzky likes the audiences he has had here, which he found most responsive. Philadelphia audiences, he says, he likes least of all, for he finds them more attuned to the martial music of Sousa's band than to that of a symphony orchestra.

Sanroma also remembers playing here some years ago, but his chief memory of the city lies in what he described as "that terrible auditorium," which, it developed, was the old city auditorium. When he was told of the new Mosque theatre, in which he is to play, he was delighted.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who by the way, is the only man ever to be awarded the honorary degree of doctor of laws at Harvard University, returned from a midwinter vacation last Sunday. He conducted Monday night, Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Boston.

On leaving here the orchestra will go to Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn for a concert at each place, before returning to Boston next Sunday.

The conductor and soloist were met at the station by T. Michaux Moody, manager of the Richmond Civic Music Association, whom Dr. Koussexitzky greeted like an old friend. They were taken to the Jefferson hotel, which they will make their headquarters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
CALL
FEB 1 - 1931

Hortense Husserl Triumphs.

Seldom before in the annals of American pianists has an artist risen to acknowledged virtuosity more spectacularly or in a briefer period than has Hortense Husserl, one of the finest performers of the present generation of younger pianists. Making her solo debut in Newark to one of the largest and most appreciative audiences that ever filled a local hall, then following that triumph with even greater success in New York, she attained the height of her pianistic career last week in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

Koussevitzky To Conduct At The Lyric

Concert Situation Here And Discouragements Met By It Bring Up Many Questions

Events Scheduled For Coming Weeks Regarded As Of Importance In The Season

Music This Week

TODAY

Maryland Casualty Auditorium, Treble Clef Club, 4 P. M.

Lord Baltimore Hotel, Cyril Zamanski, tenor, 4 P. M.

Jewish Educational Alliance, 1216 East Baltimore street, mixed recital, 8.30 P. M.

WEDNESDAY

Lyric Theater, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 8.30 P. M.

THURSDAY

Peabody Recital Hall, teachers' recital, 8.15 P. M.

FRIDAY

Peabody Auditorium, Carlo Zecchi, pianist, 4 P. M.

Lyric Theater, Schumann-Heink and Roxy Gang, 8.30 P. M.

SATURDAY

Emerson Hotel, Baltimore Music Club, members' recital, 2.30 P. M.

By HELEN S. TAYLOR

THE current month will not have as many musical attractions as the past one, but those scheduled are of primary importance. The concert situation this season in several ways has been very discouraging. Artists who in other cities are still attracting their full quotas of attendance are finding Baltimore unresponsive.

The attendance at symphony concerts, except in one or two instances, has not been full. Never in the history of concert-going have the boxes at the Lyric remained so consistently empty as this season, in a city which has long been regarded as very musical.

Whether this is due to a winter exodus of the initiate to warmer latitudes or is an argument that the individual artist is slowly losing his ability to draw more than a very limited crowd, which is not true elsewhere, no one seems to be able to answer, and all around, at concerts and elsewhere, one hears the same question, Why?

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The main event for the week will be the now annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its magnetic conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston orchestra has this year celebrated its golden jubilee, fifty years of brilliant and honorable service to music. During that time it has had many able and gifted directors, but no one of them has ever approximated the popularity of the present one.

It is true that we of the present have acquired a tendency to lionize our orchestra directors, who were taken more as a matter of course years back, but at least the attitude shows a step up in that we have acquired knowledge and therefore a greater appreciation of the value of the truly constructive leader to an orchestra.

HIS OPPORTUNITY

Dr. Koussevitzky had an extraordinarily favorable opportunity, in that his orchestra had practically to be rebuilt and its morale restored, so that he was able to do for it what Stokowski did for the Philadelphia Orchestra some years ago. Just how important that work was and the results it netted was very evident to anyone privileged to have heard the Beethoven festival in Washington early in December.

A similar and more pretentious one is planned for Boston in March, a Bach festival in memory of Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the organization fifty years ago and whose financial support enabled it to survive until it could run along unaided. The director has announced for Wednesday's concert, Strauss' Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53, in one movement; Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47; Prelude to Lohengrin and Ravel's choreographic poem, La Valse.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
FEB 1 1931

Boston Symphony Pays Third Visit To New York

Zecchi, Italian Pianist, Is Soloist This Week With Philharmonic-Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall next Friday evening, instead of the customary Thursday, when Serge Koussevitzky will devote his program to numbers infrequently heard here: Sir Edward Elgar's introduction and allegro for strings, Op. 47; Sibelius's seventh symphony, Op. 105, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." On Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat the Strauss work, and will also present Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, which was given last month in the Thursday evening series. The soloist again will be Jesus Maria Sanroma.

The Sibelius symphony, published in 1925, was played for the first time in America by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski in the spring of 1926. Its first New York performance was by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky on January 8, 1927, followed by two performances by the New York Symphony under Klemperer on January 13 and 16. It has not been played here since 1927.

The Boston Symphony's third Brooklyn concert will be given next Thursday night, February 5, instead of on Friday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
1931

CONDUCTORS AND PROGRAMS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Why does a conductor not take into account what other conductors have played or what he himself has played? At his last visit Serge Koussevitzky played Stravinsky's new "Capriccio," but not the Prokofieff symphony he had first announced. Now, for his next visit, he announces the "Capriccio" a second time, instead of letting us hear the Prokofieff at least once.

He also announces Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Sibelius's Seventh symphony (though he has played these works here and has not played others by the same composers). Giving so few concerts in New York, Mr. Koussevitzky should repeat only unfamiliar works that cannot be grasped at first hearing, so that we may hear as many as possible of the interesting works that he plays in Boston. If anything, then, he should repeat the Sibelius symphony, which is rarely heard and not easily grasped. Instead, he announces one performance of this work, and two of the Strauss, which is well known and not difficult!

A SUBSCRIBER.

New York, Jan. 27, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
FEB 1 1931

LAST CONCERT THIS TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make its final Washington appearance of this, its fiftieth anniversary season, with a concert at Constitution Hall on Tuesday afternoon, February 3, at 4:30 o'clock, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. This will constitute the third attraction in Mrs. Wilson-Greene's Philharmonic series.

For his final 1930-31 Washington concert, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen a program of great distinction and charm. It offers the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony in F minor (Opus 36) in four movements—I, Andante sostenuto, moderato con anima (in movements di valse); II, Andantino in modo do canzona; III, Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato; IV, Finale: Allegro con fucco. Elgar's introduction and allegro for string orchestra (Opus 47) will open the program, which will also include the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony appear here Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall on Friday at 8.30 instead of the usual Thursday evening, and on Saturday afternoon at 2.30.

At the Friday concert Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present Sir Edward Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Opus 47; the seventh and latest symphony of Sibelius, Opus 105, and Richard Strauss's Symphonia Domestica.

At the matinee concert Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which Koussevitzky has introduced to America and which he played at the evening concert of this orchestra's last visit, will be repeated. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist. The program will open with two preludes by Bach, which have been arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, and close with Strauss's Symphonia Domestica.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE
FEB 18 1931

First Conductor Of Hub Orchestra 81 Yrs. Old Today

London, Feb. 18. — (AP) — Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given to him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations.

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Co. orchestra in the same program given at his Boston jubilee concert.

CONDUCTORS AND PROGRAMS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Why does a conductor not take into account what other conductors have played or what he himself has played? At his last visit Serge Koussevitzky played Stravinsky's new "Capriccio," but not the Prokofieff symphony he had first announced. Now, for his next visit, he announces the "Capriccio" a second time, instead of letting us hear the Prokofieff at least once.

He also announces Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Sibelius's Seventh symphony (though he has played these works here and has not played others by the same composers). Giving so few concerts in New York, Mr. Koussevitzky should repeat only unfamiliar works that cannot be grasped at first hearing, so that we may hear as many as possible of the interesting works that he plays in Boston. If anything, then, he should repeat the Sibelius symphony, which is rarely heard and not easily grasped. Instead, he announces one performance of this work, and two of the Strauss, which is well known and not difficult!

A SUBSCRIBER.

New York, Jan. 27, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

Boston Symphony Director Eager for Concert Tonight

By KATHERINE WARREN.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the 110 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will play at 8:30 o'clock tonight at the Mosque theatre under the auspices of the Richmond Civic Music Association, arrived at 10:20 A. M. today at the Broad-Street station on their special train of six Pullmans and a baggage car, on which they left Boston last night.

Almost the last to alight were Dr. Koussevitzky and Jesus Maria Sanroma, the young pianist, who will be heard as soloist in the new capriccio by Stravinsky.

Dr. Koussevitzky is so tremendously enthused over the capriccio that he had hardly stepped from the train before he began talking about it.

"It is wonderful, wonderful," he said. "Our audience at Carnegie Hall was enthusiastic and nearly all of the New York critics united in praising it. You have a great new treat in store for you when you hear it this evening. I cannot tell you how remarkable it is."

Sanroma, although more quiet in manner, was equally enthused over the new composition.

The noted conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, was warmly clad in a fur-collared great coat with a heavy scarf wrapped tightly about his throat, for when he left Boston yesterday there were two feet of snow on the ground. He was delighted to step into an almost April day in Richmond, and kept talking about how happy our climate should make us here.

Continued on Page Nine.

Leaders of Boston Symphony Arrive

Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano soloist, were photographed by The News at the Broad-Street station, where they were welcomed on their arrival at 10:15 A. M. by T. Michaux Moody, manager of the Richmond Association. The orchestra will be heard this evening at the theatre, under the auspices of the association. Dr. Koussevitzky is shown shaking hands with Mr. Moody. [News Leader photo.]

DIRECTOR IS EAGER FOR MOSQUE EVENT

Continued From First Page.

"Today it seems like Cannes or Monte Carlo," he said. "Although I am Russian and should be used to the cold, I do not like our Boston winters. I should love, if possible, to live in your Southern climate.

"It is not always like this, however, for on my first visit here in April seven years ago, when I had expected to arrive to blue skies and flowers everywhere, it was very, very cold.

"Richmond will like our program this evening," he said, "Mozart's and Tchaikovsky's symphonies and especially the Stravinsky."

Likes Audiences.

Dr. Koussevitzky likes the audiences he has had here, which he found most responsive. Philadelphia audiences, he says, he likes least of all, for he finds them more attuned to the martial music of Sousa's band than to that of a symphony orchestra.

Sanroma also remembers playing here some years ago, but his chief memory of the city lies in what he described as "that terrible auditorium," which, it developed, was the old city auditorium. When he was told of the new Mosque theatre, in which he is to play, he was delighted.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who by the way, is the only man ever to be awarded the honorary degree of doctor of laws at Harvard University, returned from a midwinter vacation last Sunday. He conducted Monday night, Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Boston.

On leaving here the orchestra will go to Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn for a concert at each place, before returning to Boston next Sunday.

The conductor and soloist were met at the station by T. Michaux Moody, manager of the Richmond Civic Music Association, whom Dr. Koussexitzky greeted like an old friend. They were taken to the Jefferson hotel, which they will make their headquarters.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
CALL
FEB 1 - 1931

Hortense Husserl Triumphs.

Seldom before in the annals of American pianists has an artist risen to acknowledged virtuosity more spectacularly or in a briefer period than has Hortense Husserl, one of the finest performers of the present generation of younger pianists. Making her solo debut in Newark to one of the largest and most appreciative audiences that ever filled a local hall, then following that triumph with even greater success in New York, she attained the height of her pianistic career last week in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 2 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Play Mozart Symphony

Composed in 1788, Piece Is Regarded as Fine Example; Selection From Tchiakovsky Also Will Be Heard

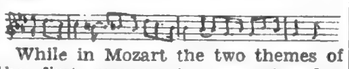
By George Harris.

A few weeks ago somebody asked me if orchestras ever played Mozart symphonies, which denoted rather pointedly that no orchestra had played one in Richmond for some time. The very next day I was informed that in its concert tonight at the Mosque we are to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play the Mozart Symphony in G. minor. I am sure that the performance tonight and our recollections of the American Opera Company's performances of "The Marriage of Figaro" will make us realize that Mozart is more than a name in musical history. And tonight there will be historical interest as well as musical enjoyment, for we are to hear also Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. The Mozart symphony, composed in 1788, is a fine example of the symphony in its earlier stages of development, and the Tchaikovsky, composed ninety years later, shows us the same form tremendously broadened out in the size of its various sections, in its orchestral effects and in its emotional content.

In thinking of Mozart's great musical creations one must not forget Haydn. Haydn is called "the father of the symphony," and it was he who rounded out the form that has been accepted ever since as the most effective in which to mould great musical works. This general scheme is easy to follow in the Mozart—and for that reason I give no musical quotations from it—and exists just as definitely, if possibly not quite so easy to follow, in the Tchaikovsky. The time of Haydn's long life included that of Mozart's short one; both lived in Vienna, and they met and admired each other greatly. In the history of music one must give the greater honor to Haydn, as he did more that was important in the development of the art; but Mozart had the more poetical creative genius, and from the point of view of beauty this symphony of Mozart is the culminating point, it seems to me, in the art of the two composers. Haydn rarely departed from conventional harmonic progressions, while Mozart was more daring with his harmonic color.

This form that in a way Haydn stadardized seems to have some psychological basis that makes it more successful than any other form in conveying to the listener a convincing impression of the emotions of the composer. It has been varied and it has been experimented with, but at least the skeleton outline of it is present in all successful compositions of larger form. This form is, first of all, a group of four pieces called movements. The first of these is the most serious, as a rule; it is often tempestuous and passionate, always fairly rapid, and on the whole is the most dramatic of the four movements. This first movement presents two themes, the first sturdy and the second more lyrical, a different key for the second accentuating the contrast; a less definite theme, sometimes based on material already used, brings the first part of the movement to a close. Then follows a section of about the same length, in which the material already presented is developed—one might say played with according to the whims of the composer. This leads back to repetition of the first part, all the themes reappearing in their original state, but in the same key this time, and this part of the movement is extened, so as to create a more satisfying close. Another important thing about the first movement is the slow introduction. In the period of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven it was rarely used, most symphonies beginning, as does this one by Mozart, with the first theme of the first movement straight off. The effect of the slow introduction is to hold the listener in suspense for a few moments, so that when the main body of the first movement begins it springs into being with greater energy. This effect is so valuable that the majority of the more modern symphonic writers have used the introduction, and we have a fine example of it in the Tchaikovsky we are to hear tonight. This begins with the following trumpet-call, several times repeated:

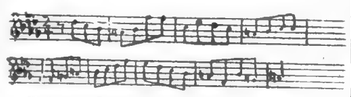
Then in what seems like silence one hears faintly uttered the first two notes of the theme to follow, sounded four times in hesitating rhythms. Then comes the first theme of the movement proper, which begins as follows:



While in Mozart the two themes of the first movement are parts of a continuos flow of musical thought, in Tchaikovsky they are divided into more distinct entities, and the second theme—the next musical quotation—is prepared for by a sort of suspense in the momentum of the music, just as the first theme was prepared for by the pause at the end of the introduction.

The general scheme of the movement is exactly the same as in the Mozart, except for the interpolation of the trumpet-call of the introduction in the development section and towards the end of the movement—but everything on a much larger scale. Each theme is developed almost as much on its first presentation as the themes in the Mozart are developed in the whole movement.

Second movements are usually slow, and have a contemplative or romantic character. The slow movement of the Mozart we are to hear is technically in sonata form, as is the first movement. This is unusual, as the slow movement is much more often written in a simpler scheme of alternating melodies. Although we have found Tchaikovsky more elaborate in the form of the first movement, this second part is done in the simplest form imaginable. It begins with this simple melody:



This and an answering melody are repeated, and then comes a second section, built up on this rhythmical figure:

The first part is then repeated, with an extension again, to bring the movement to a close.

The third movement is customarily a dance, or rather two dances, the first being repeated after the second. In the period of Mozart and Haydn this was in a deliberate 3-4 time, usually called a Minuet. Beethoven introduced a rhythm that was about three times as fast, and called it a scherzo, or joke, and this has been the usual mood of third movements ever since. In the Tchaikovsky the 3-4 rhythm is replaced by 2-4, but this does not remove the ideas of the scherzo. In this instance the humorous quality of the musical content is heightened by the orchestration. The first part is entirely for plucked strings, in the middle part of wind-instrument group alternates with a brass-instrument group, and the bowless string-players repeat their first part, the three groups coming to-geth when hearing the two symphonies that this treatment of the orchestra is great advance over that given it by Mozart. These themes and the first of the last movement are too complicated to quote, but are easy to grasp at once.

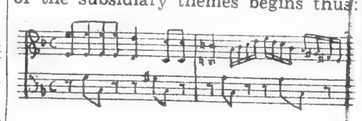
In the Haydn symphonies the last movement is usually in rondo form, which means a strikingly rhythmical melody which keeps reappearing in the same key, with less important musical ideas appearing between its repetitions. It is interesting that in the symphonies we are to hear tonight Mozart abandons this for sonata form, while Tchaikovsky adheres to it. The form Mobzart uses gives more opportunity for fascinating interweaving of voices in the development of his themes, while Tchaikovsky makes use of the rondo, with its frequent returning to the same key, to give a great sense of finality. The most important of the subsidiary themes begins thus:



Besides the development of the orchestra and the enlargement of all the sections of the symphonic form since the days of Mozart, a striking element that we find in Tchaikovsky is the repetition of a given musical thought in the different movements. We heard this in a pronounced way in the Cesar Frank Symphony last winter. Tchaikovsky uses only one theme this way, the trumpet-call of the slow intro-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS
FEB 3 -

Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

A MUSICAL event of the season will be the appearance at the Lyric Theatre tomorrow night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Before the season ends, Jascha Heifetz, the violinist, will play with the Symphony Orchestra at a pair of concerts. The chosen concerto is not yet announced. . . . Harriet Cohen, the English pianist, heard briefly at Harvard last autumn, is engaged for the Symphony Concerts next year—to take the solo-part in a new Concerto by Arnold Bax, held over from the current season.

KOUSSEVITZKY HEARD AGAIN

Conducts Boston Symphony In Three Modern Works.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, presented a program of modern music at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The three works on the list were chosen from as many countries, each composed by the dean of his school: Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro" for string orchestra, Op. 47; Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, with Jesús María Sanromá as the soloist, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," Op. 53. The Strauss music was also played by the orchestra Friday evening.

The music presented served once more to reveal the lyric gifts and splendid tone of the visitors, particularly in the infrequently heard Straussian forty-five-minute tonal history of connubial felicity and tribulation.

After the "Capriccio," the auditors recalled Mr. Sanromá, who played brilliantly and without notes on that occasion, and after the Strauss music the instrumentalists rose and shared the enthusiastic applause with the conductor.

Soloist With Noted Boston Symphony

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
FEB 3 - 1931

His Policy Under Fire

Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose policy of importing alien artists, while hundreds of citizen-musicians are out of work, was denounced yesterday.

JOBS TO ALIENS IN SYMPHONY IS DENOUNCED

More than 300 delegates of the Greek-American Protective Association yesterday passed a resolution to put the association on record as opposing the policy of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in importing alien artists while hundreds of citizen musicians are unemployed.

The resolution states, that for the past several months, musicians from Belgium, Austria and Czecho-Slovakia, and other European countries, have been imported by Dr. Koussevitzky, increasing the ranks of unemployed American-born artists.

The resolution says that the association regards the importation as unjust, unfair and unwarranted.

Copies of the resolution will be forwarded to Dr. Koussevitzky, and the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Richmond Times-Dispatch: Tuesday, February 3, 19
Music

By George Harris

The Boston Symphony Gives a Fine Concert.

We had our one Symphony Orchestra concert of the season last night at the Mosque, and for our one and only it was certainly a most satisfying one. First of all it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra that we heard, and, not only from its reputation for half a century, but also from our direct experience of it here in Richmond, it is a name that promises the very utmost of musical enjoyment. This great musical organization was brought here by the Richmond Civic Musical Association, and the choice of this orchestra is one that would have been made unanimously by the public, T. Michaux Moody, the manager, and the association.

After a program two years ago that did not entirely meet with favor in all quarters, the Boston organization has given us last year and this programs that have aroused enthusiasm from all types of music lovers, so that last night there was a building up of pleasure on the recollections of a year ago. If the Stravinsky Capriccio aroused in advance fears of something dangerously modern—dangerous because of the infrequency of such music in Richmond—that fear was dissipated in delight, perhaps alloyed for brief moments, when the piece was actually presented to us. Two symphonies were good solid food for those who starve for symphonic music, and they were so contrasted in harmonic methods and in emotional contest that they could not have given any sort of indigestion to the less musical. Mozart and Tchaikovsky!—as opposite poles as there could be, except that the modernism of the Stravinsky, which lay between them, swung the Tchaikovsky back into the more understandable realms of orchestral literature.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's simplicity and sincerity made him seek for no unusual effects in either of the two symphonies. The Mozart in its first and last movements was not taken at the fast tempo that has tempted some conductors, and the seriousness and tenderness of its thought came out the more eloquently. This great conductor's simplicity made the second and third movements speak for themselves: one of the qualities of the great artist is knowing what not to do.

The unnecessarily feared Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra by Stravinsky came next, and introduced to us a very wonderful young pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma. In earlier days concertos for piano and orchestra were much in vogue, but very few have been written recently. Formerly the piano was treated as a solo instrument that either was accompanied by the orchestra or played a sort of duet with it, only at moments seeming to become part of the orchestra. In this new composition that we heard last night the piano had very little to do alone, and was essentially an addition to orchestral coloring. It is doubtless quite as difficult to play as the average piano-concerto, and the audience by its applause showed that it appreciated this young man's fine playing, although his abilities were less obvious than they would have been in a concerto by Beethoven or by Liszt. The Capriccio is a real caprice of fancy, with its strange rhythms that resolve themselves at the end into something quite jazzy. There is an element in it of a sort of metamorphosis of classical musical thought into the language of modern musical expression, of which this jazz-like element is a logical part. There are harmonies that make one a little dizzy at times, but, strange as it is, there is an intangible beauty in it that made us lovers of the classics sit up an exclaim. It is not like the Ravel Bolero, which has very little to do with "modern" music, but considering "modern" music as a class this piece seems to me the most successful I have yet heard in fascinating the ear and teasing the imagination.

As I said, we swung back from this modernism to Tchaikovsky. His Fourth Symphony is a gorgeous work, possibly Tchaikovsky's greatest, and we had a stirring reading of it last night. It needs a great orchestra, which we had, and that combined with th musicianship of Dr. Koussevitzky is bound to make it successful. The dynamic forces and changes of tempo in the first movement carried one away, and if there is a place towards the end of the second movement that is always a trifle dull, there is so much else that is thrillingly interesting that one easily forgives it. A person following the orchestral score would realize the great difficulties of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES
FEB 3 -

* * *

Mrs. Hoover to Attend Concert

Mrs. Hoover will attend the Boston Symphony Concert this afternoon, having with her a party of guests.

* * *

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
FEB 2 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Play Mozart Symphony

Composed in 1788, Piece Is Regarded as Fine Example; Selection From Tchiakovsky Also Will Be Heard

By George Harris.

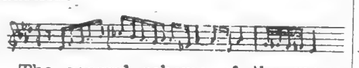
A few weeks ago somebody asked me if orchestras ever played Mozart symphonies, which denoted rather pointedly that no orchestra had played one in Richmond for some time. The very next day I was informed that in its concert tonight at the Mosque we are to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play the Mozart Symphony in G. minor. I am sure that the performance tonight and our recollections of the American Opera Company's performances of "The Marriage of Figaro" will make us realize that Mozart is more than a name in musical history. And tonight there will be historical interest as well as musical enjoyment, for we are to hear also Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. The Mozart symphony, composed in 1788, is a fine example of the symphony in its earlier stages of development, and the Tchaikovsky, composed ninety years later, shows us the same form tremendously broadened out in the size of its various sections, in its orchestral effects and in its emotional content.

In thinking of Mozart's great musical creations one must not forget Haydn. Haydn is called "the father of the symphony," and it was he who rounded out the form that has been accepted ever since as the most effective in which to mould great musical works. This general scheme is easy to follow in the Mozart—and for that reason I give no musical quotations from it—and exists just as definitely, if possibly not quite so easy to follow, in the Tchaikovsky. The time of Haydn's long life included that of Mozart's short one; both lived in Vienna, and they met and admired each other greatly. In the history of music one must give the greater honor to Haydn, as he did more that was important in the development of the art; but Mozart had the more poetical creative genius, and from the point of view of beauty this symphony of Mozart is the culminating point, it seems to me, in the art of the two composers. Haydn rarely departed from conventional harmonic progressions, while Mozart was more daring with his harmonic color.

This form that in a way Haydn stadardized seems to have some psychological basis that makes it more successful than any other form in conveying to the listener a convincing impression of the emotions of the composer. It has been varied and it has been experimented with, but at least the skeleton outline of it is present in all successful compositions of larger form. This form is, first of all, a group of four pieces called movements. The first of these is the most serious, as a rule; it is often tempestuous and passionate, always fairly rapid, and on the whole is the most dramatic of the four movements. This first movement presents two themes, the first sturdy and the second more lyrical, a different key for the second accentuating the contrast; a less definite theme, sometimes based on material already used, brings the first part of the movement to a close. Then follows a section of about the same length, in which the material already presented is developed—one might say played with according to the whims of the composer. This leads back to repetition of the first part, all the themes reappearing in their original state, but in the same key this time, and this part of the movement is extened, so as to create a more satisfying close. Another important thing about the first movement is the slow introduction. In the period of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven it was rarely used, most symphonies beginning, as does this one by Mozart, with the first theme of the first movement straight off. The effect of the slow introduction is to hold the listener in suspense for a few moments, so that when the main body of the first movement begins it springs into being with greater energy. This effect is so valuable that the majority of the more modern symphonic writers have used the introduction, and we have a fine example of it in the Tchaikovsky we are to hear tonight. This begins with the following trumpet-call, several times repeated:

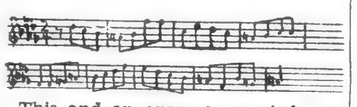
Then in what seems like silence one hears faintly uttered the first two notes of the theme to follow, sounded four times in hesitating rhythms. Then comes the first theme of the movement proper, which begins as follows:

While in Mozart the two themes of the first movement are parts of a continuos flow of musical thought, in Tchaikovsky they are divided into more distinct entities, and the second theme—the next musical quotation—is prepared for by a sort of suspense in the momentum of the music, just as the first theme was prepared for by the pause at the end of the introduction.



The general scheme of the movement is exactly the same as in the Mozart, except for the interpolation of the trumpet-call of the introduction in the development section and towards the end of the movement—but everything on a much larger scale. Each theme is developed almost as much on its first presentation as the themes in the Mozart are developed in the whole movement.

Second movements are usually slow, and have a contemplative or romantic character. The slow movement of the Mozart we are to hear is technically in sonata form, as is the first movement. This is unusual, as the slow movement is much more often written in a simpler scheme of alternating melodies. Although we have found Tchaikovsky more elaborate in the form of the first movement, this second part is done in the simplest form imaginable. It begins with this simple melody:

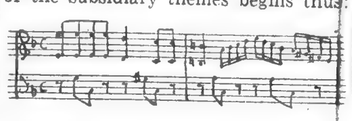


This and an answering melody are repeated, and then comes a second section, built up on this rhythmical figure:

The first part is then repeated, with an extension again, to bring the movement to a close.

The third movement is customarily a dance, or rather two dances, the first being repeated after the second. In the period of Mozart and Haydn this was in a deliberate 3-4 time, usually called a Minuet. Beethoven introduced a rhythm that was about three times as fast, and called it a scherzo, or joke, and this has been the usual mood of third movements ever since. In the Tchaikovsky the 3-4 rhythm is replaced by 2-4, but this does not remove the ideas of the scherzo. In this instance the humorous quality of the musical content is heightened by the orchestration. The first part is entirely for plucked strings, in the middle part of wind-instrument group alternates with a brass-instrument group, and the bowless string-players repeat their first part, the three groups coming together at the end. It will be obvious when hearing the two symphonies that this treatment of the orchestra is great advance over that given it by Mozart. These themes and the first of the last movement are too complicated to quote, but are easy to grasp at once.

In the Haydn symphonies the last movement is usually in rondo form, which means a strikingly rhythmical melody which keeps reappearing in the same key, with less important musical ideas appearing between its repetitions. It is interesting that in the symphonies we are to hear tonight Mozart abandons this for sonata form, while Tchaikovsky adheres to it. The form Mobzart uses gives more opportunity for fascinating interweaving of voices in the development of his themes, while Tchaikovsky makes use of the rondo, with its frequent returning to the same key, to give a great sense of finality. The most important of the subsidiary themes begins thus:



Besides the development of the orchestra and the enlargement of all the sections of the symphonic form since the days of Mozart, a striking element that we find in Tchaikovsky is the repetition of a given musical thought in the different movements. We heard this in a pronounced way in the Cesar Frank Symphony last winter. Tchaikovsky uses only one theme this way, the trumpet-call of the slow introduction, but even this gives a noticeable sense of unity to the whole composition.

I regret that I have had no means of obtaining any practical information about the composition by Stravinsky we are to hear tonight. It will be a new and interesting musical experience for us all.

Before the season ends, Jascha Heifetz, the violinist, will play with the Symphony Orchestra at a pair of concerts. The chosen concerto is not yet announced. . . . Harriet Cohen, the English pianist, heard briefly at Harvard last autumn, is engaged for the Symphony Concerts next year—to take the solo-part in a new Concerto by Arnold Bax, held over from the current season.

Trans. Feb 3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, presented a program of modern music at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The three works on the list were chosen from as many countries, each composed by the dean of his school: Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro" for string orchestra, Op. 47; Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, with Jesús María Sanromá as the soloist, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," Op. 53. The Strauss music was also played by the orchestra Friday evening.

The music presented served once more to reveal the lyric gifts and splendid tone of the visitors, particularly in the infrequently heard Straussian forty-five-minute tonal history of connubial felicity and tribulation.

After the "Capriccio," the auditors recalled Mr. Sanromá, who played brilliantly and without notes on that occasion, and after the Strauss music the instrumentalists rose and shared the enthusiastic applause with the conductor.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

A MUSICAL event of the season will be the appearance at the Lyric Theatre tomorrow night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Soloist With Noted Boston Symphony

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
FEB 2 1931

His Policy Under Fire

Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose policy of importing alien artists, while hundreds of citizen-musicians are out of work, was denounced yesterday.

JOBS TO ALIENS IN SYMPHONY IS DENOUNCED

More than 300 delegates of the Greek-American Protective Association yesterday passed a resolution to put the association on record as opposing the policy of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in importing alien artists while hundreds of citizen musicians are unemployed.

The resolution states, that for the past several months, musicians from Belgium, Austria and Czecho-Slovakia, and other European countries, have been imported by Dr. Koussevitzky, increasing the ranks of unemployed American-born artists.

The resolution says that the association regards the importation as unjust, unfair and unwarranted.

Copies of the resolution will be forwarded to Dr. Koussevitzky, and the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Richmond Times-Dispatch: Tuesday, February 3, 19

Music

By George Harris

The Boston Symphony Gives a Fine Concert.

We had our one Symphony Orchestra concert of the season last night at the Mosque, and for our one and only it was certainly a most satisfying one. First of all it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra that we heard, and, not only from its reputation for half a century, but also from our direct experience of it here in Richmond, it is a name that promises the very utmost of musical enjoyment. This great musical organization was brought here by the Richmond Civic Musical Association, and the choice of this orchestra is one that would have been made unanimously by the public, T. Michaux Moody, the manager, and the association.

After a program two years ago that did not entirely meet with favor in all quarters, the Boston organization has given us last year and this programs that have aroused enthusiasm from all types of music lovers, so that last night there was a building up of pleasure on the recollections of a year ago. If the Stravinsky Capriccio aroused in advance fears of something dangerously modern—dangerous because of the infrequency of such music in Richmond—that fear was dissipated in delight, perhaps alloyed for brief moments, when the piece was actually presented to us. Two symphonies were good solid food for those who starve for symphonic music, and they were so contrasted in harmonic methods and in emotional contest that they could not have given any sort of indigestion to the less musical. Mozart and Tchaikovsky!—as opposite poles as there could be, except that the modernism of the Stravinsky, which lay between them, swung the Tchaikovsky back into the more understandable realms of orchestral literature.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's simplicity and sincerity made him seek for no unusual effects in either of the two symphonies. The Mozart in its first and last movements was not taken at the fast tempo that has tempted some conductors, and the seriousness and tenderness of its thought came out the more eloquently. This great conductor's simplicity made the second and third movements speak for themselves: one of the qualities of the great artist is knowing what not to do.

The unnecessarily feared Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra by Stravinsky came next, and introduced to us a very wonderful young pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma. In earlier days concertos for piano and orchestra were much in vogue, but very few have been written recently. Formerly the piano was treated as a solo instrument that either was accompanied by the orchestra or played a sort of duet with it, only at moments seeming to become part of the orchestra. In this new composition that we heard last night the piano had very little to do alone, and was essentially an addition to orchestral coloring. It is doubtless quite as difficult to play as the average piano-concerto, and the audience by its applause showed that it appreciated this young man's fine playing, although his abilities were less abvious than they would have been in a concerto by Beethoven or by Liszt. The Capriccio is a real caprice of fancy, with its strange rhythms that resolve themselves at the end into something quite jazzy. There is an element in it of a sort of metamorphosis of classical musical thought into the language of modern musical expression, of which this jazz-like element is a logical part. There are harmonies that make one a little dizzy at times, but, strange as it is, there is an intangible beauty in it that made us lovers of the classics sit up an exclaim. It is not like the Ravel Bolero, which has very little to do with "modern" music, but considering "modern" music as a class this piece seems to me the most successful I have yet heard in fascinating the ear and teasing the imagination.

As I said, we swung back from this modernism to Tchaikovsky. His Fourth Symphony is a gorgeous work, possibly Tchaikovsky's greatest, and we had a stirring reading of it last night. It needs a great orchestra, which we had, and that combined with th musicianship of Dr. Koussevitzky is bound to make it successful. The dynamic forces and changes of tempo in the first movement carried one away, and if there is a place towards the end of the second movement that is always a trifle dull, there is so much else that is thrillingly interesting that one easily forgives it. A person following the orchestral score would realize the great difficulties of the third movement and the amazing ensemble with which this orchestra made them seem child's play. Although the last movement is slightly too repetitious, it ends in a blaze of glory such as only Tchaikovsky could create.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
FEB 3 1931

ENTHUSIASM SEEN AT MUSIC EVENT

Reception Given Boston Symphony Indicative of City's Advance.

By HELEN DE MOTTE.

Last night those Richmonders who live, musically speaking, from one symphony concert to another, were given a new lease on life with what has happily begun to seem an annual event—a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

Nothing is more indicative of the advance Richmond has made along musical lines than the reception given this orchestra and its program last night, when one recalls that in years not so far distant less than half a house at the old city auditorium was the utmost one could expect for a symphony concert by any of the great orchestras, and the attitude of the players toward the handful of enthusiasts was quite eloquent of their opinion of "the road." It was a mixture of amusement and contempt.

How gratifying, therefore, it was to see how alert, eager and attentive the men of the orchestra were last night, and with what evident pleasure they observed the enthusiasm of an audience that gave Mr. Koussevitsky a veritable ovation.

Three Schools of Thought.

The program was interesting, not only because it gave examples of three distinct schools of musical thought, but because it stimulated the perceptions of the audience with a rare quality of suggestion along the stream of musical evolution, from a period in which we can still feel the warm, living human quality in its delicate and definite formality, directly into our most ultra-modern contemporary musical thought, and then as a balance, led us back into the middle ground of the post-romantic period when the composers were definitely grappling with the problem of balance between emotional significance and the form of its expression in tone.

The first number was Mozart's G minor symphony, which Mr. Koussevitsky gave a reading that was scholarly in its meticulous modelling of phrase and delicate appreciation of nuance and shading—and, much more important, created an atmosphere of such beauty and charm that one felt nothing short of a whole evening of Mozart could satisfy.

It was a perfect gem—a complete entity, in which the singing strings and ethereal woodwind passages gratefully brought a restful sense of serenity and of the fragrance of life which seems t ohave vanished from the world. It was interesting, later in the program, to contrast the ingratiating warmth of tone heard in the strings during this symphony with the brittle staccati of the Stravinsky "Capriccio" and the brilliant, searching poignancy in the Tchaikovsky. One constantly thought of Schumann's remark about its "swaying Grecian grace."

The Stravinsky "Capriccio," which came next, inducted us at once into modern percussive orchestration. Even the piano, which was introduced as an integral part of the orchestra, was used, as far as its limitations allow, to obtain added percussion effects in its individual tonal quality. There was only an infrequent legato passage, its work being confined for the most part to rhythmic detached-legato passages of clear-cut concentrated pattern.

The continuous pulsing beat of the tympani gave it a nervous and stimulating effect, while the grouping of the players around the piano in almost a chamber orchestra effect, only being amplified now and then by the full orchestra, was an interesting example of modern tendency in orchestration. The clever young pianist was Jesus Marie Sanromo, a Mexican.

Then came Tchaikovsky's "Fourth Symphony," to many in the audience undoubtedly the climax of the program. It is probably his best symphonic work and certainly the one he loved most. It is, he says, really a reflection of Beethoven's "Fifth" so far as the central idea is concerned, and "there is not a single bar which I have not truly felt and which is not an echo of my most intimate, spiritual life." This central idea is that Fate, an invisible force, checks our aspirations towards happiness before they reach their goal, watches jealously lest our peace and bliss should be complete and cloudless, hanging like a sword of Damocles over our heads to embitter our soul.

In the second and third movements he depicts the effort of the individual to turn from reality and lost himself in dreams, but Fate interposes and he is driven hither and thither until engulfed by the sea. Happiness does not exist—then, be glad in others' gladness.

As read by Mr. Koussevitsky last night, it was possible to visualize the whole bitter concept of life's futility, even to be lost a little in the dreams and then to hear with a shudder the Fate theme calling at the end. Tchaikovsky's orchestration is brilliant in this symphony. The brass section was light, we felt, for certain passages in the first and last movements, but nothing could have been lovelier than the quality of the woodwind choir in this symphony, and we felt that we had never heard such beautiful French horns.

So much could be said about this program and the various aspects of orchestral study it suggested, but time and space—the twin evil genii of the critic—prevent further consideration. It was notable from every aspect, and a suffusion within which the musician will dwell with continuing delight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS
FEB 3 - 1931

Symphony Concert Is Planned

Boston Orchestra to Appear at Lyric Recital Tomorrow

One of the most important concerts of the musical season is that to be given at the Lyric tomorrow evening, when Sergei Koussewitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its only appearance in Baltimore this year, under the management of Mrs. Wilson Greene.

The symphony of the evening is Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," while included further on the program are Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and Ravel's dance poem, "La Valse."

Not content to rest with the success of the Beethoven festival in Washington in December, a Bach festival is being planned by the orchestra heads for March, to be given in Boston in memory of Colonel Higginson, who founded the organization 50 years ago.

Three nationally known musicians will appear on the program to be presented by the Curtis Institute, with the Curtis Symphony Orchestra, at the concert at the Lyric on Sunday evening next, February 8.

The orchestra will give the second Brahms Symphony, under the baton of Emil Mlynarski. Joseph Levine will play the Tschaikowsky concerto in B flat minor for piano and orchestra, which latter will be led by Sylvan Levin in Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "Die Toteninsel."

Natalie Bodenskaya will sing Mimi's Aria from "Boheme," and the orchestra will close with Strauss' "Don Juan" and the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride."

H. A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Music and

Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky led his men with obvious enthusiasm through the Elgar "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47," which is pleasingly lyrical in its most Welch moments, but fails to inspire with any determination. This was followed by the Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin," played at a snail's pace, and neither so good nor so bad as to warrant any particular comment. Which in turn was followed by the Ravel "La Valse," choregraphic poem, in which for the first time the musicians seemed to assemble their very all. This last, in fact, seemed to wake up the audience to a considerable degree, allowing it to wander animatedly during the 10 minutes' intermission and come back refreshed for the Tchaikowsky opus.

This latter, although not precisely a crowning event for any afternoon, was presented with all the melodic insistence and beauty of expression that Koussevitzky can summon. Especially in the "andantino" movement, when the great conductor presented himself and his musicians in the best light of the afternoon. All of which made a very worthy closing to a worthy program, in which, however, the excitements of musical wit seem to have been at a minimum.

E. de S. M.

crepancies, the program was neither as spirited as this outfit has offered nor as spirited as one could wish for.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT FOR THIS SEASON

The more I see and watch the batonic results of M. Serge Koussevitsky, the more am I impressed with his professionalism, his pride of bearing, his classic manners before his complement of men. Further, he is not an untrained master of pantomime and when he fuses himself into the opening bars of a glowing number, the music feels his presence and follows him through.

This was excitingly true when he honored his countryman, Peter Tchaikovsky, yesterday at Constitution Hall, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played its final seasonal program under the presentation of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The Tchaikovsky opus in question was Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, composed when the Russian was edging toward middle life; when he was forgetting his youth, conjuring pictures of old age and remembering scenes from his more mobile days. What Koussevitsky made of the symphony was just that: A sharp and clear cycle of pictures and emotions, quite exquisitely painted, authentically proportioned. A Russian lending unusual talent to a racial companion; a Russian quite as gifted, fully as much the real artist.

Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra," which opened the program as something of a tribute to Wales, a work filled with nostalgia and the charm of the Welsh hills, is nothing monumental. Rather is it average Elgar, without the often alluring melodic quality with which he endowed many of his works. As for the "Lohengrin" prelude, I was not aware the orchestra was doing half as well by it as Koussevitsky himself; orchestrally, a little half-hearted; directorially, a stalwart Russian feeling great music in his mental recesses.

For undiluted romantic effect and tonal coloring—recalling the much-touted nuances of Debussy and the moderns who followed his musical credo—Maurice Ravel's "La Valse" was a gleaming spotlight on the Koussevitzky menu. Old Vienna in theme; super-George Gershwin in treatment. (A high compliment to Mr. Gershwin, I appreciate, but the analogy is not as far-fetched as at first appears.)

Ravel in this orchestral gem is all artist, performing as might a musical Ruth Draper: He takes the sort of thing Franz Lehar sentimentalizes and transmutes it, via his genius and instrumental control, into a dance design that dazzles, soothes, lulls you for a moment, then flees its way within a maze of tonal lights.

FRANK BAER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Bach, Elgar On Program

Boston Symphony Will Give Concerts Here on Friday and Saturday.

At the Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall next Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, the Two Preludes of Bach will introduce the Friday program, and the Introduction and Allegro of Elgar will introduce the Saturday program.

The programs, as revised, will therefore be as follows:

Friday Evening, February 6.

Bach-Pick-Mangiagalli..Two Preludes
Sibelius.....Symphony No. 7
Strauss.....Symphonia Domestica

Saturday, Afternoon, February 7.

Elgar.....Introduction and Allegro
Stravinsky
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra
Strauss.....Symphonia Domestica

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
FEB 4 - 1931

MUSIC

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony lifts a concert to great heights and Koussevitzky and Boston men revel in its free, lovely music

By RUTH HOWELL

THE music of Ravel and Tschaikowsky awakened a lethargic audience, used to the calmness of recital music, and accustomed to giving their attention to personalities as much as to music, and sent it into prolonged and wholehearted applause yesterday afternoon.

It was Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra which brought us the music and, with the completion of the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony, the concert became one of the best of the year.

Koussevitzky took the early part of his program calmly. He played a new thing for strings, by Edward Elgar. It was pleasant, and showed some nice musical phrases for the gentleness of strings, but it had little to offer that was climatic—and little emotional interest. Thus Elgar's series of music portraits remains the best of his compositions we've heard.

The Russian conductor led the Lohengrin prelude with infinite care and found great beauty in it. His interpretation was subtle, and the piece's emotionalism was never blatant. Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," amazed the listeners, with its broken rhythms and its wild instrumentation; but they liked its themes and the swing it had, and with another hearing, they would have enjoyed its abandon.

But the Tschaikowsky symphony had all the endearing elements—rhythm, melody, tricks of instrumentation, loudnesses, sweet softnesses, and it was sincerely grasped; a well nigh perfect performance was rewarded with sincere applause. Koussevitzky was pleased; he was pleased all the way thru, for he obviously loves the music and enjoys leading it.

The pizzicato scherzo was played without a flaw. The freedom of the finale had full play in his reading, and its rich beauties and recurrent themes were sent soaring to the highest reaches of the hall. It was a great piece of work, and cleared the air after the misty Wagner and the beclouded Ravel, like the brilliant sun after a storm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY STARS WITH BATON

There was only one sad note about the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall yesterday afternoon, and that was that this was the final appearance of that organization here this season.

Perhaps it was because of this, but at any rate the dynamic conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and the musicians arose to new heights and gave a most perfectly balanced program.

The large audience realized it, too, and there was a tremendous ovation as the final number, the delightful Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 and F Minor, was ended.

For an intelligent rendition of Tchailkovsky there is necessary intelligence by the conductor, otherwise the music is rather insipid. And yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky made this number a thing of fire, a thing of the greatest charm.

Especially noteworthy was the third movement with the strings played pizzicato to the background of woodwinds and brasses.

It seemed that nothing could mar the beauty of the program. Even the much abused Lohengrin Prelude was done with grace. And jumping from the old to the new, the orchestra gave Ravel's fantastic, fiery "La Valse" immediately after the Wagner number.

Ravel is a thing that grows on one, and Dr. Koussevitzky gave a perfect reading of the score. Elgar's Introduction and Allegro served to complete a program that was packed with enjoyment.

G. E. B. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
FEB 4 1931

Mrs. Hoover Attends Symphony Concert

Mrs. Hoover attended the Boston Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon and had with her a party of guests who were Mrs. Guy D. Goff, Mrs. Herbert Hoover, jr., Miss Susan Dyer and Mrs. Duer McMullin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN

Music

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will give its only Baltimore concert of the season at the Lyric at 8.30 o'clock this evening. The eminent conductor announces that Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" will be the principal item on the program, which also is to include Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra"; the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

Baronets and Clarinets

SPEAKING of baronets, Sir Wilmott and Lady Lewis were at the Boston Symphony yesterday. So was Mrs. Hoover, and Mrs. Trubee Davison, with her three boys, and Mrs. Demarest Lloyd, and a strange veiled lady in a box—in case you're interested.

After the concert was over Sir Wilmott dashed under stage to greet a clarinet player in the orchestra who owns an island with three trees on it, next to the Lewis summer home in Maine.

Ah, to be a clarinet player in the Maine woods!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 4 - 1931

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has transposed the opening numbers of the programs to be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, February 6 and 7, in Carnegie Hall. The revised lists are: For Friday, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, Sibelius's seventh symphony and Strauss's Symphonia Domestica; for Saturday, Elgar's introduction and allegro, Op. 47, for strings; Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, with J. M. Sanroma as soloist, and the Symphonia Domestica.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

FEB 3 1931

ENTHUSIASM SEEN AT MUSIC EVENT

Reception Given Boston Symphony Indicative of City's Advance.

By HELEN DE MOTTE.

Last night those Richmonders who live, musically speaking, from one symphony concert to another, were given a new lease on life with what has happily begun to seem an annual event—a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

Nothing is more indicative of the advance Richmond has made along musical lines than the reception given this orchestra and its program last night, when one recalls that in years not so far distant less than half a house at the old city auditorium was the utmost one could expect for a symphony concert by any of the great orchestras, and the attitude of the players toward the handful of enthusiasts was quite eloquent of their opinion of "the road." It was a mixture of amusement and contempt.

How gratifying, therefore, it was to see how alert, eager and attentive the men of the orchestra were last night, and with what evident pleasure they observed the enthusiasm of an audience that gave Mr. Koussevitsky a veritable ovation.

Three Schools of Thought.

The program was interesting, not only because it gave examples of three distinct schools of musical thought, but because it stimulated the perceptions of the audience with a rare quality of suggestion along the stream of musical evolution, from a period in which we can still feel the warm, living human quality in its delicate and definite formality, directly into our most ultra-modern contemporary musical thought, and then as a balance, led us back into the middle ground of the post-romantic period when the composers were definitely grappling with the problem of balance between emotional significance and the form of its expression in tone.

The first number was Mozart's G minor symphony, which Mr. Koussevitsky gave a reading that was scholarly in its meticulous modelling of phrase and delicate appreciation of nuance and shading—and, much more important, created an atmosphere of such beauty and charm that one felt nothing short of a whole evening of Mozart could satisfy.

It was a perfect gem—a complete entity, in which the singing strings and ethereal woodwind passages gratefully brought a restful sense of serenity and of the fragrance of life which

REPOSSESSED SALE

We Are Selling These Repossesed Ca
at less than the unpaid balance. Con see for yourself the unusual bargain

PAY BY WEEK OR MONTH

'28 OAKLAND SEDAN ---------$2
'26 PACKARD COUPE ---------$3
'27 NASH ROADSTER ---------$1
'27 ESSEX COUPE ---------$11
'29 FORD SEDAN ---------$2
'29 FORD ROADSTER ---------$11
'27 OAKLAND COACH ---------$1
'29 FORD ROADSTER ---------$2
REO TRUCK ---------$
'28 ERSKINE COACH ---------$1
'28 CHRYSLER COUPE ---------$1
'28 FORD ROADSTER ---------$1
'28 FORD COACH ---------$21
'28 WHIPPET CABRIOLET ---------$1
'27 ESSEX COACH ---------$
'27 DODGE COUPE ---------$

Kirkman & Motor Co. Inc.

th in in th w
St li
T of "s ca m
E di cl li pe to in be rh cl ty

gave it a nervous and stimulating effect, while the grouping of the players around the piano in almost a chamber orchestra effect, only being amplified now and then by the full orchestra, was an interesting example of modern tendency in orchestration. The clever young pianist was Jesus Marie Sanromo, a Mexican.

Then came Tchaikovsky's "Fourth Symphony," to many in the audience undoubtedly the climax of the program. It is probably his best symphonic work and certainly the one he loved most. It is, he says, really a reflection of Beethoven's "Fifth" so far as the central idea is concerned, and "there is not a single bar which I have not truly felt and which is not an echo of my most intimate, spiritual life." This central idea is that Fate, an invisible force, checks our aspirations towards happiness before they reach their goal, watches jealously lest our peace and bliss should be complete and cloudless, hanging like a sword of Damocles over our heads to embitter our soul.

In the second and third movements he depicts the effort of the individual to turn from reality and lost himself in dreams, but Fate interposes and he is driven hither and thither until engulfed by the sea. Happiness does not exist—then, be glad in others' gladness.

As read by Mr. Koussevitsky last

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

FEB 3 - 1931

Symphony Concert Is Planned

Boston Orchestra to Appear at Lyric Recital Tomorrow

One of the most important concerts of the musical season is that to be given at the Lyric tomorrow evening, when Sergei Koussewitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its only appearance in Baltimore this year, under the management of Mrs. Wilson Greene.

The symphony of the evening is Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," while included further on the program are Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and Ravel's dance poem, "La Valse."

Not content to rest with the success of the Beethoven festival in Washington in December, a Bach festival is being planned by the orchestra heads for March, to be given in Boston in memory of Colonel Higginson, who founded the organization 50 years ago.

Three nationally known musicians will appear on the program to be presented by the Curtis Institute, with the Curtis Symphony Orchestra, at the concert at the Lyric on Sunday evening next, February 8.

The orchestra will give the second Brahms Symphony, under the baton of Emil Mlynarski. Joseph Levine will play the Tschaikowsky concerto in B flat minor for piano and orchestra, which latter will be led by Sylvan Levin in Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem "Die Tote[illegible]."

Natalie Bodenskaya will sing Mimi's Aria from "Boheme," and the orchestra will close with Strauss' "Don Juan" and the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride."

H. A. E. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Music and

Reviews and News

Boston Orchestra
At Constitution Hall.

YESTERDAY afternoon the Boston Orchestra came back after its strenuous week of Beethoven of not so long ago and played Tchaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony" and compositions by Elgar, Wagner and Ravel.

Serge Koussevitzky.

For some reason, whether due to a distinctly subdued audience of only moderate size or to more temperamental discrepancies, the program was neither as spirited as this outfit has offered nor as spirited as one could wish for.

Dr. Koussevitzky led his men with obvious enthusiasm through the Elgar "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47," which is pleasingly lyrical in its most Welch moments, but fails to inspire with any determination. This was followed by the Wagner prelude to "Lohengrin," played at a snail's pace, and neither so good nor so bad as to warrant any particular comment. Which in turn was followed by the Ravel "La Valse," choreographic poem, in which for the first time the musicians seemed to assemble their very all. This last, in fact, seemed to wake up the audience to a considerable degree, allowing it to wander animatedly during the 10 minutes' intermission and come back refreshed for the Tchaikowsky opus.

This latter, although not precisely a crowning event for any afternoon, was presented with all the melodic insistence and beauty of expression that Koussevitzky can summon. Especially in the "andantino" movement, when the great conductor presented himself and his musicians in the best light of the afternoon. All of which made a very worthy closing to a worthy program, in which, however, the excitements of musical wit seem to have been at a minimum.

E. de S. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT FOR THIS SEASON

The more I see and watch the batonic results of M. Serge Koussevitzky, the more am I impressed with his professionalism, his pride of bearing, his classic manners before his complement of men. Further, he is not an untrained master of pantomime and when he fuses himself into the opening bars of a glowing number, the music feels his presence and follows him through.

This was excitingly true when he honored his countryman, Peter Tchaikovsky, yesterday at Constitution Hall, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played its final seasonal program under the presentation of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. The Tchaikovsky opus in question was Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, composed when the Russian was edging toward middle life; when he was forgetting his youth, conjuring pictures of old age and remembering scenes from his more mobile days. What Koussevitsky made of the symphony was just that: A sharp and clear cycle of pictures and emotions, quite exquisitely painted, authentically proportioned. A Russian lending unusual talent to a racial companion; a Russian quite as gifted, fully as much the real artist.

Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra," which opened the program as something of a tribute to Wales, a work filled with nostalgia and the charm of the Welsh hills, is nothing monumental. Rather is it average Elgar, without the often alluring melodic quality with which he endowed many of his works. As for the "Lohengrin" prelude, I was not aware the orchestra was doing half as well by it as Koussevitsky himself; orchestrally, a little half-hearted; directorially, a stalwart Russian feeling great music in his mental recesses.

For undiluted romantic effect and tonal coloring—recalling the much-touted nuances of Debussy and the moderns who followed his musical credo—Maurice Ravel's "La Valse" was a gleaming spotlight on the Koussevitzky menu. Old Vienna in theme; super-George Gershwin in treatment. (A high compliment to Mr. Gershwin, I appreciate, but the analogy is not as far-fetched as at first appears.)

Ravel in this orchestral gem is all artist, performing as might a musical Ruth Draper: He takes the sort of thing Franz Lehar sentimentalizes and transmutes it, via his genius and instrumental control, into a dance design that dazzles, soothes, lulls you for a moment, then flees its way within a maze of tonal lights.

FRANK BAER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Bach, Elgar On Program

Boston Symphony Will Give Concerts Here on Friday and Saturday.

At the Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall next Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, the Two Preludes of Bach will introduce the Friday program, and the Introduction and Allegro of Elgar will introduce the Saturday program.

The programs, as revised, will therefore be as follows:

Friday Evening, February 6.

Bach–Pick–Mangiagalli..Two Preludes
Sibelius.....Symphony No. 7
Strauss.....Symphonia Domestica

Saturday, Afternoon, February 7.

Elgar.....Introduction and Allegro
Stravinsky
Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra.
Strauss.....Symphonia Domestica.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

FEB 4 - 1931

MUSIC

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony lifts a concert to great heights and Koussevitzky and Boston men revel in its free, lovely music

By RUTH HOWELL

THE music of Ravel and Tschaikowsky awakened a lethargic audience, used to the calmness of recital music, and accustomed to giving their attention to personalities as much as to music, and sent it into prolonged and wholehearted applause yesterday afternoon.

It was Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra which brought us the music and, with the completion of the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony, the concert became one of the best of the year.

Koussevitzky took the early part of his program calmly. He played a new thing for strings, by Edward Elgar. It was pleasant, and showed some nice musical phrases for the gentleness of strings, but it had little to offer that was climatic, and little emotional interest. Thus Elgar's series of music portraits remains the best of his compositions we've heard.

The Russian conductor led the Lohengrin prelude with infinite care and found great beauty in it. His interpretation was subtle, and the piece's emotionalism was never blatant. Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," amazed the listeners, with its broken rhythms and its wild instrumentation; but they liked its themes and the swing it had, and with another hearing, they would have enjoyed its abandon.

But the Tschaikowsky symphony had all the endearing elements—rhythm, melody, tricks of instrumentation, loudnesses, sweet softnesses, and it was sincerely grasped; a well nigh perfect performance was rewarded with sincere applause. Koussevitzky was pleased; he was pleased all the way thru, for he obviously loves the music and enjoys leading it.

The pizzicato scherzo was played without a flaw. The freedom of the finale had full play in his reading, and its rich beauties and recurrent themes were sent soaring to the highest reaches of the hall. It was a great piece of work, and cleared the air after the misty Wagner and the beclouded Ravel, like the brilliant sun after a storm.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY STARS WITH BATON

There was only one sad note about the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall yesterday afternoon, and that was that this was the final appearance of that organization here this season.

Perhaps it was because of this, but at any rate the dynamic conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and the musicians arose to new heights and gave a most perfectly balanced program.

The large audience realized it, too, and there was a tremendous ovation as the final number, the delightful Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 and F Minor, was ended.

For an intelligent rendition of Tchailkovsky there is necessary intelligence by the conductor, otherwise the music is rather insipid. And yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky made this number a thing of fire, a thing of the greatest charm.

Especially noteworthy was the third movement with the strings played pizzicato to the background of woodwinds and brasses.

It seemed that nothing could mar the beauty of the program. Even the much abused Lohengrin Prelude was done with grace. And jumping from the old to the new, the orchestra gave Ravel's fantastic, fiery "La Valse" immediately after the Wagner number.

Ravel is a thing that grows on one, and Dr. Koussevitzky gave a perfect reading of the score. Elgar's Introduction and Allegro served to complete a program that was packed with enjoyment.

G. E. B. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 4 1931

Mrs. Hoover Attends Symphony Concert

Mrs. Hoover attended the Boston Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon and had with her a party of guests who were Mrs. Guy D. Goff, Mrs. Herbert Hoover, jr., Miss Susan Dyer and Mrs. Duer McMullin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN

Music

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will give its only Baltimore concert of the season at the Lyric at 8.30 o'clock this evening. The eminent conductor announces that Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" will be the principal item on the program, which also is to include Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra"; the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

Baronets and Clarinets

SPEAKING of baronets, Sir Wilmott and Lady Lewis were at the Boston Symphony yesterday. So was Mrs. Hoover, and Mrs. Trubee Davison, with her three boys, and Mrs. Demarest Lloyd, and a strange veiled lady in a box—in case you're interested.

After the concert was over Sir Wilmott dashed under stage to greet a clarinet player in the orchestra who owns an island with three trees on it, next to the Lewis summer home in Maine.

Ah, to be a clarinet player in the Maine woods!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 4 - 1931

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has transposed the opening numbers of the programs to be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, February 6 and 7, in Carnegie Hall. The revised lists are: For Friday, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, Sibelius's seventh symphony and Strauss's Symphonia Domestica; for Saturday, Elgar's introduction and allegro, Op. 47, for strings; Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, with J. M. Sanroma as soloist, and the Symphonia Domestica.

128

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAM

FEB 4 - [illegible]

The programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Friday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall have been revised as follows:—Friday, two preludes (Bach-Pick-Mangiagalli), seventh symphony (Sibelius) and the "Symphonia Domestica" (Strauss); Saturday, "Introduction and Allegro" (Elgar), capriccio for piano and orchestra (Stravinsky) and the "Symphonia Domestica" (Strauss).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

FEB - [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has transposed the opening numbers of the programs to be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky Friday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The revised lists are: For Friday, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, Sibelius's seventh symphony and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica"; for Saturday, Elgar's introduction and allegro, Op. 47, for strings; Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, with J. M. Sanroma as soloist, and the "Symphonia Domestica."

Boston Symphony Heard In Concert At Lyric Theater

Works Of Elgar, Strauss And Ravel Mark Program Under Leadership Of Serge Koussevitzky

Baltimore Feb 5

Usually to be counted upon to present the new or at least the unfamiliar in such guise that his orchestra's appearance becomes a reference date, Serge Koussevitzky, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared at the Lyric last night in its only concert to be given here this season. On his program were Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47, and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

The strings of the Boston Orchestra are notably fine, and showed to great advantage in the Elgar work which has choice passages for viola and cellos. The title is applicable to the main theme, the allegro motif, the work as a whole following the general outlines of the symphonic form, and is both dignified and melodious. Mr. Koussevitzky is at his best when he is most serious as he was in the Elgar and in the Prelude to Lohengrin.

The Prelude never seems so transcendently lovely as when given in concert form. Minus the distractions of stage presentation, there is time really to listen to the music which never fails to make the listener react emotionally, when played in the manner of the Bostonians. Not even the slight scratch of the first violin on the last high note could undo its rapt charm.

A big leap from Wagner to Ravel's La Valse and Mr. Koussevitzky again demonstrated his versatility in the Frenchman's graphic as well as choreographic poem, which he read with tremendous grace and abandon amounting almost to the orgiastic in the final hectic pages. M'sieu Ravel is a magician when it comes to piling up climaxes.

In Strauss' so-called Symphonia Domestica, which he has put into the form of a tone-poem, his best-loved medium and which back in 1903 included four saxaphones in the scoring, one was prepared for the sane, restful, happy moods of the first parts, but could not divine that when the composer reached the third part, the Adagio, he would go off into a rhapsodical and philosophical dissertation before concluding.

The orchestra's and, no less, the director's share in the performance of it made it the outstanding feature of a very fine concert. H. S. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

Mme. Matzenauer

Margaret Matzenauer has been secured by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its Bach festival week beginning March 22. Fraser Gange, baritone, and Amy Evans, soprano, will also be heard.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

FEB 5 - 1931

Boston Symphony Charms Music Lovers at Lyric

It was a pleasure to enter the Lyric last evening, and find the once-so-familiar graded platforms arranged upon the stage, as favored by the tradition of the Boston Symphony, with a great bass fiddles silhouetted high above all.

And the state of things was no less satisfying when Dr. Serge Koussevitsky stepped upon the conductor's stand, to lead his men into the agreeable score of Sir Elward Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra," which opened the program.

USES STRING ONLY

This composition, as the name proclaims, makes use only of the strings, a device making for the development of a very gracious tone color, especially when founded on so charming a theme as Sir Edward has found to enlarge upon.

This was followed by that music of all else in the world the most magical the prelude to "Lohengrin." From the first mysterious bell-like notes of the opening violins, joined gradually by their full choir, and the other components of the orchestra, the performance grew to its climax of almost unbearable ecstasy, returning eventually to the solitary violins from which sprang the entire composition.

In definite contrast was the Ravel choreographic poem, "La Valse," which preceded the intermission. This was a highly interesting piece of orchestration, as the mists—of memory, we infer—before our gaze were gradually torn away to disclose the dancers in a court ballroom of the fifties.

Just a glimpse or two at first, then more and more clearly we saw them until at last the crowded ballroom was open before us, and we might even hear the laughter of the waltzing crowd.

The "Domestic Symphony" of Richard Strauss, now past its twenty-seventh anniversary of first production, was, no doubt, the featured element of the evening.

FEATURE OF EVENING

Though written in one movement, the four subdivisions are so clearly marked as to provide little difficulty in following: The husband's themes, easy-going, dreamy and fiery; the wives' themes, lively, gay and gracious; the simple child motif, leading into the scherzo, suggestive of happy family life, the striking of the hour, and the cradle song.

Quite the most important and successful part of the work is the love scene, with the violins and cellos carrying two glorious themes, followed by the fantastic beauty of the "dreams."

These are interrupted by the striking of seven o'clock in the morning, and a lively day begins, leading to a climastic final of great vivacity, the brasses vying with the violins in presenting their story, the whole accented in effective fashion by the drums and tympani.

Dr. Koussevitsky conducted this varied and stimulating program with that fine taste and sensitive imagination, essential elegance of manner finely directed virility whcih has made his work synonymous with the superlative of its gind. H. A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky's devotion to modern music found expression again last evening when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the second metropolitan performance of Strawinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Spanish pianist, was the soloist with the orchestra in its third concert of the season at the Academy of Music.

It seems to us too bad that Mr. Sanroma's talent had to be restricted to an exhibition of that which he was required to do last night. The pianist was a good clean technician when the music gave him cause to be. There were also perceptible, through the limited means by which he was able to display them, a deliberate attack, conscientious application to his task and a fine command of the keyboard. But his abilities cannot in any fairness be measured when he must content himself with setting down, among other things, a disconnected succession of chords followed by spurts of single tones, one of which is sustained as a dissonnat organ point while the orchestra prepares to indulge in contrasting polyphony. What Strawinsky means in this capriccio is something entirely beyond us. Its confused, opposing rhythms, an impoverishment of thematic material, the utter nonsense of what discursive inferences we could draw, all adduce to the conclusion that here is a Strawinsky out of all bounds, out of all proportion to himself.

Mr. Koussevitzky's other, sturdier modern ventures, in which he is so much at home and therefore so excellent, were the Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra (Op. 47) of Elgar and the Ravel orchestral transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," the former a brilliant, beautiful example of tonal structure, the latter a lovely descriptive suite in a lovelier Ravelian setting. They furnished adequate recompense even for the inanition one was obliged to bear with at Igor Strawinsky's hands.

B. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB [illegible] 1931

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

KOUSSEVITSKY GOES RUSSIAN

Making his third visit of the season to Brooklyn, Serge Koussevitsky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night in an almost all-Russian program. Evidently proceeding on the assumption that New York likes specialization—viz. Mr. Toscanini, Mr. Molinari and the Italian school—Mr. Koussevitsky abandoned his methods of the past and confined his sphere of action to the field wherein he held forth for so many seasons.

Of the three numbers which he elected to offer Brooklynites, only one was the creation of a non-Slav and the conductor proceeded to render this in typical Russian manner. Elgar's introduction and allegro for string orchestra, which is really a concerto grosso of the Handelian era, was the curtain-raiser and Stravinsky and Moussorgsky followed.

The Elgar work is said to be of Welsh extraction in that it is builded upon a folk tune of that race. Mr. Koussevitsky, however, chose to conceal these antecedents and permitted his own Russian influence to color both the Anglicanism of the composer and the Welsh origin of the work.

And he delighted in the Stravinsky "Capriccio" which followed. Jesus Maria Sanroma was at the piano in this brilliant bit of superficiality, which revealed that Stravinsky, after proceeding in the footsteps of Bach for a time, has gone back to the days of "Le Sacre" and is again the inconoclast, sterile in his ideas but skilled in the particular orchestral manipulation which he affects. Vigorous, dazzling and romantic the poem scintillates in tumultuous gaiety, and yet, when all is over, one has merely the memory of fireworks that flashed across the sky but left not even one whiff of acrid smoke. It is the agile composer at work; here the pianoforte is an integral part of the orchestra and it performs its far from minor part in the pyrotechnical display which the master-ringman has staged. It is showmanship, it is theatrical and its beauty is all of this sort. And yet, in content, it is shallow and [illegible] though the structure,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB [illegible] 1931

Music of the Day

UNDER the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last evening at Carnegie Hall. The music performed was for the most part unfamiliar, though none of it was new, and included the Italian Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangements for strings of two preludes by Bach (one of them a paraphrase rather than a transcription), the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius and the Symphonia Domestica of Richard Strauss. A more interesting program has not been presented at any orchestral concert of the season, and to Mr. Koussewitsky a vote of thanks is due, as much for the relief afforded from the incessant repetition of a few familiar works to which we are accustomed as for his revivals of those neglected masterpieces to which the greater portion of the evening was devoted: the Sibelius and the Strauss symphonies.

Sibelius' Seventh (and until the present his last) Symphony was first heard in New York five or six seasons ago. It was introduced to us at that time by Mr. Koussewitsky, though subsequent performances of it were given during the same Winter by the New York Symphony Orchestra, of which Otto Klemperer was at that time guest-conductor. In the interval since then it has not been played in this city, sharing the disregard which has been the lot of other of the Sibelius symphonies. Yet it is, as one realized afresh last evening, an original, a powerful and an affecting work—music profoundly subjective and curiously intense in feeling, music that reveals a lofty but acute sensibility, susceptible to the impress only of sublimated emotions, yet to these reacting forcefully and passionately. Last evening it was heard in a performance whose sustained eloquence of tone offset to some degree a certain unclarity of articulation—for there were times when it seemed obvious that Mr. Koussewitsky failed to perceive the music's design, subordinating essential to inessential details.

The Strauss Symphonica Domestica—a treasurable work, despite its many weaknesses and redundancies—was brilliantly played. Here the pattern lies more upon the surface, more easily accessible to Mr. Koussewitsky's eye, and was in consequence more clearly set forth.

E. M.

N. Y. TELEGRAM

FEB 7 - [illegible]

Sibelius' Music Finely Played

Boston's Orchestra Delights Audience.

Conspicuous on the program of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at Carnegie Hall last night was the seventh symphony of Jan Sibelius. Pick-Mangiagalli's transcriptions for string orchestra of two preludes by Bach and Richard's "Symphonia Domestica" completed the offerings.

If the noble work of the Finnish composer is an example of plenary inspiration, the interpretation vouchsafed it by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men was of a similar exalted plane. The reading was sympathetic, remarkable as much for its breadth and majestic movement as for the clean tranparency of its lyric outlines.

The first of the Pick-Mangiagalli versions of the Bach preludes is the more satisfactory—the orchestration is simple and sensuous, and no effort is made to embellish irreverently the sad and tender melody. The second is more elaborate in counterpoint and development and does not give the illusion of an original orchestral creation. The performance of these was luminous and brilliant.

The boisterous, though glittering, household blandishments of the "Symphonia Domestica" shone with particular brightness and stunning effect under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton, but the petty tonal pleasantries of Strauss' family life were like the loves and differences of garrulous fireflies beside the eternal forces of nature that play in the grim, indigenous music of Sibelius.

Meanwhile another "Madama Butterfly" was presented at the Metropolitan Opera House, and over at the little concert hall of the Barbizon-Plaza Ann Luckey, soprano, offered a variety of lyrics in Italian, German, French and English.

L. R.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

FEB [illegible]

High Notes of the MUSIC WORLD

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

THIS seems to be the season of the year for the pianists. Last Sunday and again last night distinguished performers upon the keyboard contributed their talents to the concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, and last night also a fine pianist adorned the stage of the Academy of Music as soloist with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky's Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The pianist in question was Jesus Maria Sanroma, presumably a Mexican, assuredly a good-looking youth and most emphatically a delightful pianist. His piece was the Capriccio, for piano and orchestra, by Stravinsky, and a good time was had by all, except possibly the conductor himself. Certainly Mr. Sanroma seemed to be enjoying himself, and he showed no sign of fatigue upon the close of the long piece, while the members of the orchestra seemed to be as enthusiastic about the player as the audience.

Our own personal programme note, pencilled upon the margin during the performance, indicates that the Capriccio was crazy but enjoyable. It is Stravinsky—plus, with everything that goes with Stravinsky. There seemed to be no rhyme or reason to it, certainly no particular rhythm, and at times it appeared that the pianist was merely beating time with ten of his fingers and two arms pumping like pistons. And yet it was wholly enjoyable. But how on earth one goes about composing such a piece is one of life's mysteries, and an equally great secret is how one can conduct it at all.

The main orchestral number was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," transcribed for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. One of the composer's great friends was a painter, and when he died Moussorgsky attended an exhibition of his works. He later wrote a piano piece describing the paintings on the wall, which Ravel has orchestrated. The number was one of the most delightful and melodious pieces we have ever heard; stimulating, exciting and in spots even thrilling. The final section, "The Great Gate at Kiev," is one of the most majestic pieces of Russian music we can recall.

The opening number was Sir Edward Edgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestras." It was very pretty and melodious, but it is the sort of music you hear and eenjoy and applaud and forget.

he read the work last night, the Bostonian leader prizes his possession. And rightly so, for the Basque is superseded by the Slav. Ravel has but placed the pieces in the realm of the orchestra and has refrained from tingeing the arrangement with his own ideas. The result is glorified Russia, not of the period of the Revolution, but in the time of the Czar. Moussorgsky has painted in musical tones the exhibition of portraits created by his friend, Victor Hartmann. And Ravel, in his transcription, has used the orchestra to reveal in larger measure these same pictures. Intensified and glorified, the Hartmann collection is exalted because of the two musical painters. Here is descriptive music that genuinely describes. Here is Russia in all its bizzare panoply, its superstitions, its ancient glory, its Slavonic heritage. And the kaleidoscope, in the Ravel setting, becomes not a muddled portrait but a series of finely etched paintings.

Mr. Koussevitsky read the work with an elan that was inspiring in its scope.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

[illegible] 1931

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its third evening concert of the season in New York last evening, devoting the entire program to numbers infrequently heard in that city. Included in the works given was the unique "Seventh Symphony" of Jean Sibelius, and "Symphonica Domestica" by Strauss. This afternoon Dr Koussevitsky is repeating the Strauss work, and is also offering the "Cappticcio" for piano and orchestra by Stravinsky.

* * *

128

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAM

FEB 4 - 1931

The programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Friday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall have been revised as follows:—Friday, two preludes (Bach-Pick-Mangiagalli), seventh symphony (Sibelius) and the "Symphonia Domestica" (Strauss); Saturday, "Introduction and Allegro" (Elgar), capriccio for piano and orchestra (Stravinsky) and the "Symphonia Domestica" (Strauss).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

FEB [illegible] 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has transposed the opening numbers of the programs to be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky Friday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The revised lists are: For Friday, two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, Sibelius's seventh symphony and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica"; for Saturday, Elgar's introduction and allegro, Op. 47, for strings; Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, with J. M. Sanroma as soloist, and the "Symphonia Domestica."

Boston Symphony Heard In Concert At Lyric Theater

Works Of Elgar, Strauss And Ravel Mark Program Under Leadership Of Serge Koussevitzky

Baltimore Feb 5

Usually to be counted upon to present the new or at least the unfamiliar in such guise that his orchestra's appearance becomes a reference date, Serge Koussevitzky, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared at the Lyric last night in its only concert to be given here this season. On his program were Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47, and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

The strings of the Boston Orchestra are notably fine, and showed to great advantage in the Elgar work which has choice passages for viola and cellos. The title is applicable to the main theme, the allegro motif, the work as a whole following the general outlines of the symphonic form, and is both dignified and melodious. Mr. Koussevitzky is at his best when he is most serious as he was in the Elgar and in the Prelude to Lohengrin.

The Prelude never seems so transcendently lovely as when given in concert form. Minus the distractions of stage presentation, there is time really to listen to the music which never fails to make the listener react emotionally, when played in the manner of the Bostonians. Not even the slight scratch of the first violin on the last high note could undo its rapt charm.

A big leap from Wagner to Ravel's La Valse and Mr. Koussevitzky again demonstrated his versatility in the Frenchman's graphic as well as choreographic poem, which he read with tremendous grace and abandon amounting almost to the orgiastic in the final hectic pages. M'sieu Ravel is a magician when it comes to piling up climaxes.

In Strauss' so-called Symphonia Domestica, which he has put into the form of a tone-poem, his best-loved medium and which back in 1903 included four saxaphones in the scoring, one was prepared for the sane, restful, happy moods of the first parts, but could not divine that when the composer reached the third part, the Adagio, he would go off into a rhapsodical and philosophical dissertation before concluding.

The orchestra's and, no less, the director's share in the performance of it made it the outstanding feature of a very fine concert. H. S. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

Mme. Matzenauer

Margaret Matzenauer has been secured by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its Bach festival week beginning March 22. Fraser Gange, baritone, and Amy Evans, soprano, will also be heard.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

FEB 5 - 1931

Boston Symphony Charms Music Lovers at Lyric

It was a pleasure to enter the Lyric last evening, and find the once-so-familiar graded platforms arranged upon the stage, as favored by the tradition of the Boston Symphony, with a great bass fiddles silhouetted high above all.

And the state of things was no less satisfying when Dr. Serge Koussevitsky stepped upon the conductor's stand, to lead his men into the agreeable score of Sir Elward Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra," which opened the program.

USES STRING ONLY

This composition, as the name proclaims, makes use only of the strings, a device making for the development of a very gracious tone color, especially when founded on so charming a theme as Sir Edward has found to enlarge upon.

This was followed by that music of all else in the world the most magical the prelude to "Lohengrin." From the first mysterious bell-like notes of the opening violins, joined gradually by their full choir, and the other components of the orchestra, the performance grew to its climax of almost unbearable ecstasy, returning eventually to the solitary violins from which sprang the entire composition.

In definite contrast was the Ravel choreographic poem, "La Valse," which preceded the intermission. This was a highly interesting piece of orchestration, as the mists—of memory, we infer—before our gaze were gradually torn away to disclose the dancers in a court ballroom of the fifties.

Just a glimpse or two at first, then more and more clearly we saw them until at last the crowded ballroom was open before us, and we might even hear the laughter of the waltzing crowd.

The "Domestic Symphony" of Richard Strauss, now past its twenty-seventh anniversary of first production, was, no doubt, the featured element of the evening.

FEATURE OF EVENING

Though written in one movement, the four subdivisions are so clearly marked as to provide little difficulty in following: The husband's themes, easy-ging, dreamy and fiery; the wifes' themes, lively, gay and gracious; the simple child motif, leading into the scherzo, suggestive of happy family life, the striking of the hour, and the cradle song.

Quite the most important and successful part of the work is the love scene, with the violins and cellos carrying two glorious themes, followed by the fantastic beauty of the "dreams."

These are interrupted by the striking of seven o'clock in the morning, and a lively day begins, leading to a climastic final of great vivacity, the brasses vying with the violins in presenting their story, the whole accented in effective fashion by the drums and tympani.

Dr. Koussevitsky conducted this varied and stimulating program with that fine taste and sensitive imagination, essential elegance of manner finely directed virility whcih has made his work synonymous with the superlative of its gind. H. A. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky's devotion to modern music found expression again last evening when he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the second metropolitan performance of Strawinsky's Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the Spanish pianist, was the soloist with the orchestra in its third concert of the season at the Academy of Music.

It seems to us too bad that Mr. Sanroma's talent had to be restricted to an exhibition of that which he was required to do last night. The pianist was a good clean technician when the music gave him cause to be. There were also perceptible, through the limited means by which he was able to display them, a deliberate attack, conscientious application to his task and a fine command of the keyboard. But his abilities cannot in any fairness be measured when he must content himself with setting down, among other things, a disconnected succession of chords followed by spurts of single tones, one of which is sustained as a dissonnat organ point while the orchestra prepares to indulge in contrasting polyphony. What Strawinsky means in this capriccio is something entirely beyond us. Its confused, opposing rhythms, an impoverishment of thematic material, the utter nonsense of what discursive inferences we could draw, all adduce to the conclusion that here is a Strawinsky out of all bounds, out of all proportion to himself.

Mr. Koussevitzky's other, sturdier modern ventures, in which he is so much at home and therefore so excellent, were the Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra (Op. 47) of Elgar and the Ravel orchestral transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," the former a brilliant, beautiful example of tonal structure, the latter a lovely descriptive suite in a lovelier Ravelian setting. They furnished adequate recompense even for the inanition one was obliged to bear with at Igor Strawinsky's hands.

B. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

FEB [illegible] 1931

[illegible] and Joralemon Streets, in the Borough of Brooklyn, County of Kings, City and State of New York, on the 13th day of February, 1931, at 12 o'clock noon of that day, the premises directed by the said judgment to be sold and therein described as follows: Lot 81 in Block 4806 in Section 15, as shown on the tax map of the Borough of Brooklyn, County of Kings, as said map was on or about the 15th day of March, 1924.
—Dated, January 23rd, 1931.

J. HUNTER LACK, Referee.
ALFRED NAGELBERG, Esq., Attorney for Plaintiff, 26 Court Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. 1-23-6-5

SUPREME COURT, KINGS COUNTY —Rosbro Holding Corporation, plaintiff against Louisiana Building Corporation et al., defendants.—In pursuance of a judgment of foreclosure and sale duly made and entered in the above entitled action and bearing date the 19th day of January, 1931, I, the undersigned, the referee in said judgment named, will sell at public auction to the highest bidder

The pianist in question was Jesus Maria Sanroma, presumably a Mexican, assuredly a good-looking youth and most emphatically a delightful pianist. His piece was the Capriccio, for piano and orchestra, by Stravinsky, and a good time was had by all, except possibly the conductor himself. Certainly Mr. Sanroma seemed to be enjoying himself, and he showed no sign of fatigue upon the close of the long piece, while the members of the orchestra seemed to be as enthusiastic about the player as the audience.

Our own personal programme note, pencilled upon the margin during the performance, indicates that the Capriccio was crazy but enjoyable. It is Stravinsky—plus, with everything that goes with Stravinsky. There seemed to be no rhyme or reason to it, certainly no particular rhythm, and at times it appeared that the pianist was merely beating time with ten of his fingers and two arms pumping like pistons. And yet it was wholly enjoyable. But how on earth one goes about composing such a piece is one of life's mysteries, and an equally great secret is how one can conduct it at all.

The main orchestral number was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," transcribed for orchestra by Maurice Ravel. One of the composer's great friends was a painter, and when he died Moussorgsky attended an exhibition of his works. He later wrote a piano piece describing the paintings on the wall, which Ravel has orchestrated. The number was one of the most delightful and melodious pieces we have ever heard; stimulating, exciting and in spots even thrilling. The final section, "The Great Gate at Kiev," is one of the most majestic pieces of Russian music we can recall.

The opening number was Sir Edward Edgar's "Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestras." It was very pretty and melodious, but it is the sort of music you hear and eenjoy and applaud and forget.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB [illegible] 1931

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

KOUSSEVITSKY GOES RUSSIAN

Making his third visit of the season to Brooklyn, Serge Koussevitsky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last night in an almost all-Russian program. Evidently proceeding on the assumption that New York likes specialization—viz. Mr. Toscanini, Mr. Molinari and the Italian school—Mr. Koussevitsky abandoned his methods of the past and confined his sphere of action to the field wherein he held forth for so many seasons.

Of the three numbers which he elected to offer Brooklynites, only one was the creation of a non-Slav and the conductor proceeded to render this in typical Russian manner. Elgar's introduction and allegro for string orchestra, which is really a concerto grosso of the Handelian era, was the curtain-raiser and Stravinsky and Moussorgsky followed.

The Elgar work is said to be of Welsh extraction in that it is builded upon a folk tune of that race. Mr. Koussevitsky, however, chose to conceal these antecedents and permitted his own Russian influence to color both the Anglicanism of the composer and the Welsh origin of the work.

And he delighted in the Stravinsky "Capriccio" which followed. Jesus Maria Sanroma was at the piano in this brilliant bit of superficiality, which revealed that Stravinsky, after proceeding in the footsteps of Bach for a time, has gone back to the days of "Le Sacre" and is again the inconoclast, sterile in his ideas but skilled in the particular orchestral manipulation which he affects. Vigorous, dazzling and romantic the poem scintillates in tumultuous gaiety, and yet, when all is over, one has merely the memory of fireworks that flashed across the sky but left not even one whiff of acrid smoke. It is the agile composer at work; here the pianoforte is an integral part of the orchestra and it performs its far from minor part in the pyrotechnical display which the master-ringman has staged. It is showmanship, it is theatrical and its beauty is all of this sort. And yet, in content, it is shallow and transparent though the structure, from its external aspect, is not hard to gaze upon. Mr. Koussevitsky read it with the abandon and zeal of a Toscanini adoring a Respighian output.

But it remained for the Moussorgsky poem, "Pictures at an Exhibition," for the Russian conductor to reach the zenith of his powers. Mr. Koussevitsky presented the Ravel arrangement of these piano pieces. If memory is aright, this edition was offered New Yorkers comparatively recently, although your reviewer missed hearing the work.

According to the informative Mr. Hale, the arrangement was made especially for Mr. Koussevitsky and is his personal property. Judging by the ardor with which he read the work last night, the Bostonian leader prizes his possession. And rightly so, for the Basque is superseded by the Slav. Ravel has but placed the pieces in the realm of the orchestra and has refrained from tingeing the arrangement with his own ideas. The result is glorified Russia, not of the period of the Revolution, but in the time of the Czar. Moussorgsky has painted in musical tones the exhibition of portraits created by his friend, Victor Hartmann. And Ravel, in his transcription, has used the orchestra to reveal in larger measure these same pictures. Intensified and glorified, the Hartmann collection is exalted because of the two musical painters. Here is descriptive music that genuinely describes. Here is Russia in all its bizzare panoply, its superstitions, its ancient glory, its Slavonic heritage. And the kaleidoscope, in the Ravel setting, becomes not a muddled portrait but a series of finely etched paintings.

Mr. Koussevitsky read the work with an elan that was inspiring in its scope.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

[illegible] 7 - 1931

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its third evening concert of the season in New York last evening, devoting the entire program to numbers infrequently heard in that city. Included in the works given was the unique "Seventh Symphony" of Jean Sibelius, and "Symphonica Domestica" by Strauss. This afternoon Dr Koussevitsky is repeating the Strauss work, and is also offering the "Cappticcio" for piano and orchestra by Stravinsky.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB [illegible] 1931

Music of the Day

UNDER the direction of Serge Koussewitsky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last evening at Carnegie Hall. The music performed was for the most part unfamiliar, though none of it was new, and included the Italian Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangements for strings of two preludes by Bach (one of them a paraphrase rather than a transcription), the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius and the Symphonia Domestica of Richard Strauss. A more interesting program has not been presented at any orchestral concert of the season, and to Mr. Koussewitsky a vote of thanks is due, as much for the relief afforded from the incessant repetition of a few familiar works to which we are accustomed as for his revivals of those neglected masterpieces to which the greater portion of the evening was devoted: the Sibelius and the Strauss symphonies.

Sibelius' Seventh (and until the present his last) Symphony was first heard in New York five or six seasons ago. It was introduced to us at that time by Mr. Koussewitsky, though subsequent performances of it were given during the same Winter by the New York Symphony Orchestra, of which Otto Klemperer was at that time guest-conductor. In the interval since then it has not been played in this city, sharing the disregard which has been the lot of other of the Sibelius symphonies. Yet it is, as one realized afresh last evening, an original, a powerful and an affecting work—music profoundly subjective and curiously intense in feeling, music that reveals a lofty but acute sensibility, susceptible to the impress only of sublimated emotions, yet to these reacting forcefully and passionately. Last evening it was heard in a performance whose sustained eloquence of tone offset to some degree a certain unclarity of articulation—for there were times when it seemed obvious that Mr. Koussewitsky failed to perceive the music's design, subordinating essential to inessential details.

The Strauss Symphonica Domestica—a treasurable work, despite its many weaknesses and redundancies—was brilliantly played. Here the pattern lies more upon the surface, more easily accessible to Mr. Koussewitsky's eye, and was in consequence more clearly set forth.

E.M.C.

N. Y. TELEGRAM

FEB 7 - 1931

Sibelius' Music Finely Played

Boston's Orchestra Delights Audience.

Conspicuous on the program of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at Carnegie Hall last night was the seventh symphony of Jan Sibelius. Pick-Mangiagalli's transcriptions for string orchestra of two preludes by Bach and Richard's "Symphonia Domestica" completed the offerings.

If the noble work of the Finnish composer is an example of plenary inspiration, the interpretation vouchsafed it by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men was of a similar exalted plane. The reading was sympathetic, remarkable as much for its breadth and majestic movement as for the clean tranparency of its lyric outlines.

The first of the Pick-Mangiagalli versions of the Bach preludes is the more satisfactory—the orchestration is simple and sensuous, and no effort is made to embellish irreverently the sad and tender melody. The second is more elaborate in counterpoint and development and does not give the illusion of an original orchestral creation. The performance of these was luminous and brilliant.

The boisterous, though glittering, household blandishments of the "Symphonia Domestica" shone with particular brightness and stunning effect under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton, but the petty tonal pleasantries of Strauss' family life were like the loves and differences of garrulous fireflies beside the eternal forces of nature that play in the grim, indigenous music of Sibelius.

Meanwhile another "Madama Butterfly" was presented at the Metropolitan Opera House, and over at the little concert hall of the Barbizon-Plaza Ann Luckey, soprano, offered a variety of lyrics in Italian, German, French and English.

L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Koussevitzky Revives the "Domestic Symphony" With Boston's Orchestra

Third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Bach....Two Preludes (arranged for orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli).
2. Symphony No 7.....Sibelius
3. Symphonia Domestica.....Strauss

WE DO not hear the "Domestic Symphony" of Strauss very often these days. Perhaps the work made a bad reputation for itself a quarter century ago, when Strauss was telling interviewers that he wished the symphony to be listened to "purely as music," while at the same time he authorized official descriptions which revealed the fact that the work was based upon an exceedingly detailed program: that it pictured a day in his family life, the fugue at the end "representing papa, mamma and the baby."

When it was observed that this final fugue, ostensibly devoted to the semi-humorous portrayal of a domestic idyl, made the Battle Scene from "Ein Heldenleben" sound like a berceuse, the musical public may have concluded that this was a variety of musical horseplay for which it had little use.

* * *

Whatever the reason, the "Domestic Symphony" has not prospered in this country. In Germany, where the national conception of humor differs somewhat from ours, the work is much more frequently heard. Yet whenever one listens patiently and attentively to this score, as we did last night during Mr. Koussevitzky's devoted performance of it, the conviction is forced upon us that this singular composition, despite its clowning and its occasional tastelessness, its thick-witted, thick-fingered jocosity, its gargantuan fatuities, is disconcertingly streaked with greatness.

* * *

For Strauss is better than his word. It has happened before. He is often, by intention, an intellectual vulgarian; but his wayward, perverse, incalculable genius betrays him, and he gives us, despite himself, poetry and loveliness.

He is capable of recording in the score of the "Domestic Symphony," at the end of the Introduction, those celebrated parental comparisons regarding the Baby. Not content with illustrating the episode musically, he must needs print, above the emphatic, upward-leaping figure in the clarinets and muted trumpets, this verbal notation: "Die Tanten: 'Ganz der Papa!'" and above the uncompromising downward leap of the trombone, horns and woodwind, the words: "Die Onkels: 'Ganz die Mama!'"

* * *

Yet shortly after, he is to give us one of the most exquisite of cradle-songs—music of enamoring caressiveness and sweetness and poetic charm; and, in the Adagio (the so-called "Love Scene") a passage which he has never, perhaps, excelled for quiet intensity and truth of feeling: those three pages that follow the poco calando, with their

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducted last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert

interwoven utterances of fervor and tenderness, and the little snatch of folksong at the close of the section which yields us a glimpse into all that is most lovable and persuasive in the German imagination.

* * *

A work sustained at this level, with humor to match the poetry and homeliness to match the beauty—music all of a piece, music continuously fine and costly in texture—would have been a masterpiece, would have been a worthy companion piece to the "Siegfried Idyl." But it took the marvelous Wagner to turn domesticity into attar of poetry; to concentrate the whole of parental and conjugal happiness into twenty minutes of unflawed musical loveliness and consummate art.

One must not ask too much of Strauss—even of the rare, unique Strauss of a quarter-century ago, the Strauss who has passed.

* * *

It was a pleasure to hear the "Domestica" again, and one is grateful to Mr. Koussevitzky for undertaking the enormous labor of its preparation and performance. He gave us some beautiful playing in the course of it—especially in the finest pages of the Adagio, and the audience, apparently forgetting ancient anti-Straussian prejudices, acclaimed him warmly after the deed was done.

* * *

The Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, despite its moments of impressiveness, does not wear so well as its two immediate predecessors. When are we to listen again to the noble, magnificent Fifth? Perhaps Mr. Toscanini may be minded to let us hear it. And why has no conductor revived the stripped and drastic and extraordinary Fourth, unheard here since the distant days of Muck?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

FEB 7 1931

Other Music

By OSCAR THOMPSON

Boston Symphony Orchestra—"Flying Dutchman"

BACH, Sibelius and Strauss were the concomitants of Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestral collation last night in Carnegie Hall, when the Bostonians played their usual Thursday night concert a day behind schedule. Pick-Mangiagalli, the Czech-Italian who contributed a ballet some seasons back to the Metropolitan repertory—"Il Carillon Magico" by name—also had a finger in the repast, since he it was who orchestrated, deftly enough, the two Preludes which bespoke Father Bach. Sibelius was drawn upon for his Seventh Symphony, music of depth and noble sonorities, less somber than much of his orchestral writing, but none the less heroic. The modest contribution of Strauss was his "Symphonia Domestica," of which it may be enough to say in the year 1931 that papa and mama were there and baby had its bath. All this music was played well enough to mitigate a fugitive wish that some of it could have been played even better.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

FEB 7 1931

Boston Orchestra Plays Sibelius Symphony

By IRVING WEIL.

Serge Koussevitzky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall last night for its third visit of the season and gave the subscribers an evening of music that required about as much concentration as any audience has to give. He presented not the customary single symphony, but two of them; and both, moreover, were the type that play through without pause. The program otherwise held only two preludes of Bach in orchestrations by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli.

The two symphonies were the Seventh of the Finn, Jan Sibelius, and the "Domestica" of Richard Strauss. Mr. Koussevitzky has played them both before, but never on the same evening. However, Strauss's musical account of a twenty-four-hour day in his own family circle with its curiously minute disclosures that descend even to the detail of spanking the baby, was something of a relaxation after Sibelius's profound gravity.

SIBELIUS'S LATEST.

The Sibelius symphony is his latest and was completed only some five years ago. At the time he had reached the age of 60, and a great deal had happened in the musical world since his emergence as a figure of international import. A great deal had also happened in his own development. For one thing, he had abandoned the type of composition that was essentially Finnish in its almost strictly national significance. The Seventh Symphony, like at least two that preceded it, is absolute music.

Sibelius here seems to have ab-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 7

'FLYING DUTCHMAN' SUNG WITH WAGNER-DAYLIGHT CYCLE ON

By GRENA BENNETT.

Symphony Concert

There was interesting music-making at Carnegie Hall last night by the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sergei Koussevitzky arranged and presented a program that was well contrasted, containing classic German music according to Bach, modern Finnish music according to Sibelius, and modern German music according to Strauss. The original program listed a composition by Elgar but at the last moment the Bach number was substituted for it.

This last named was the opening work and consisted of two preludes, both scored for strings, one slow and majestic, the other buoyant and spontaneous. Each was played with mastery, the inner voices manifested with clarity of outline, the poliphony managed with equability in its tonal weaving. The one fault was in the preponderance of tone from the bass viols in fortissimo passages. The eight monstrous instruments, which usually blend with the full orchestra, growled their massive diapasons into the mixture of violins, violas and 'cellos almost overwhelming their gentle sounds.

Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, played without pause, was introduced to America nearly five years ago by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Like the earlier symphonies by the same prolific composer, the seventh pays an occasional debt to the folk music of the North. These elemental tunes are incorporated into episodes of varying moods, impressively scored, dextrously developed; elaborated and resolved with imagination and erudition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

FEB 7 1931

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitsky Offers Sibelius, Strauss and Bach Works in Third Program of Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The date was one day later than usual because the Philharmonic had the hall the previous night. Mr. Koussevitzky treated his audience to a compact program. There were two preludes of Bach, arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli, the seventh symphony of Sibelius and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." The Italian composer had made two excellent transcriptions of Bach, discreet, tasteful and thoroughly respectful in style. They were played with a high finish by the Bostonians.

The Sibelius work was first per[illegible] formed here on January 9, 1927, by the men who played it last evening. It is not the kind of music which immediately enlightens the public mind, nor is it likely ever to fire the public soul. It is profoundly introspective and in its manner of speech slow, sober and, one might say, almost hieratic. One is conscious of the brooding of a noble mind, fed upon the solemn splendors of stern mountains and far spaces. In such music there is nothing of the voluptuous enchantment of passionate utterance, nothing of the obvious excitements of vigorous rhythms and clangorous climaxes.

Sibelius composes on broad lines, but with elemental materials. He begins the symphony with an ascending scale proclaimed with a nobility of instrumentation which gives the fullest value to this fundamental musical idea. All through the work, which is in one movement, this scale in various garbs runs as the infinite line of an endless perspective. Such a clearly formed and logically thought piece of composition could have been created only by a master musical mind. But the mournful beauty of this fathomless meditation is not for the sudden appreciation of the multitude. Whether in time and with repetitions it will bore its way down into the general human understanding is not for us to conjecture. Probably it will be better understood twenty years hence, and then all music lovers may perchance say with Bruennhilde, "Alles ward mir nun klar."

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the symphony a reading of fine and human perception. All the dignity and feeling of the composition were liberated and the proportions of the score were admirably exhibited. The orchestra had opportunity to display that opulent sonority and celestial clarity of tone for which the Boston organization is noted.

The chronicler did not remain to listen once again to Richard Strauss's distended version of "Home, Sweet Home." The eminent German master attained the peak of his autobiographical publication when he produced the score of "A Hero's Life." The leading man in the domestic symphony is no more than a self-satisfied papa who regards himself as a person of heroic dimensions because his wife has blossomed into motherhood. There are millions of papas and most of them spoil their children. The babe in the Strauss symphony has to be duly spanked. The best pages are those which paint Mr. Strauss in the act of composing. That was inevitable. But there is none too much of good music in this extract from a family diary.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

FEB 7 1931

Enjoy Matinee Dutchman" at Met

phony Orchestra enraptured a sizable audience with a regally magnificent envisagement of a program consisting of two Preludes of Bach, arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli; the Seventh Symphony, by Sibelius, and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Dofestica." This was far and away the finest orchestral playing the Bostonians or any other visiting organization has vouchsafed here this season. The tone was marvelously rich and pure in every department. How firm, velvety and sensitive a body of strings can be was first disclosed in the brace of items for bowed instruments devised by Pick-Mangiagalli. His transcriptions of the Prelude to Bach's D Minor Organ Fugua and the Prelude of the E Major Violin Partita were both nobly performed. The former proved the more satisfactory of the two compositions in their new garb. As the organ prelude is without pedal in the original and nowhere suggests change of registration, it was easily transferred to the strings without loss of character. Its solemn, introspective mood was wonderfully brought out by Mr. Koussevitzky, who gave it a memorably poetic reading. For the other prelude, Mr. Mangiagalli had to introduce counterpoint of his own invention, and it was not happily managed. While the first violins negotiated the original solo part in unison, the other strings kept up a rather scrappy and disjointed accompaniment, which refused to blend with the melody. But the virtuosity of the interpretation was startling. Kreisler and other violinists make a show piece of the difficult solo number. But here was the entire aggregation of first fiddles accomplishing the same feat simultaneously. No wonder the audience was thrilled.

The great treat of the evening was the superb unfolding of the Sibelius symphony, which had not been heard here since 1927, when it was given its local premiere by the same conductor, and also enjoyed two presentations under Mr. Klemperer. As the Sibelius opus parts company with the traditional symphonic form in its one lengthy movement of many varied sections, there is something cryptic about it for the [illegible]e listener. But it is hard to understand how anyone present yesterday could fail to appreciate the extraordinary beauties of the composition, its fertility of invention, individuality and intense poesy. A profound debt of gratitude is owed Mr. Koussevitzky reviving this splendid creation. e trusts he will repeat it here soon. acquaint the public further not y with the symphony but his dery of it, which must be reckoned ng the major achievements of the ical year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

FEB 7 1931

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Carnegie Hall, 8:30

Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47.....Elgar
Symphony No. 7.....Sibelius
Symphonia Domestica.....Strauss

The visit of the Bostonians to Carnegie Hall last night brought no modernist shocker for a change. Is it possible that no new symphony, overture, concerto grosso or suite was born since the orchestra played here last?

But notwithstanding the absence of a hot-off-the-griddle masterpiece, last night's fare was pretty distinguished—at least in the matter of celebrated names. Bach, Sibelius and Strauss should make a dependable trio for a musical evening. But unfortunately there was a catch in the Bach preludes, and the music that Mr. Koussevitzky selected from Strauss and Sibelius was not the happiest representation of the stature of either of these two musicians.

The Bach pieces, an organ prelude in D minor and the popular prelude in E major from the third partita for violin, appeared last night in transcription for string orchestra by Mr. Pick-Mangiagalli. The music of Bach is such an inexhaustible quarry that transcribing it for one thing or another has taken on the proportions of a racket. There can be, of course, nothing illegitimate about the practice, and Bach himself was not above indulging in it. The only test of a transcription is its success. Mr. Pick-Mangiagalli succeeded, I thought, in transferring the organ prelude to the strings. The violin prelude did not fare as well, perhaps because the transcriber was called upon to devise Bachian counterpoint under the original fiddle part, an invention which distracted one's interest from the sweep of the melodic line and kept it jumping from one string section to another.

The seventh symphony of Sibelius, for all its characteristic, sunless orchestration, and its many pages of epic music, is a wandering composition, which for the most part offers one only meager clues to its structure and its emotions. Perhaps many repetitions of the work would disclose its musical story. Indeed, signs are not wanting that Sibelius is at last coming into his own, and it is not impossible that in a few years from now his seventh symphony will be played as frequently as Stravinsky's "Sacre." When that happens it may prove to be a composition of importance, beautiful, concise and understandable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Koussevitzky Revives the "Domestic Symphony" With Boston's Orchestra

Third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Bach....Two Preludes (arranged for orchestra by Pick-Manglagalli).
2. Symphony No 7.....Sibelius
3. Symphonia Domestica.....Strauss

WE DO not hear the "Domestic Symphony" of Strauss very often these days. Perhaps the work made a bad reputation for itself a quarter-century ago, when Strauss was telling interviewers that he wished the symphony to be listened to "purely as music," while at the same time he authorized official descriptions which revealed the fact that the work was based upon an exceedingly detailed program: that it pictured a day in his family life, the fugue at the end "representing papa, mamma and the baby."

When it was observed that this final fugue, ostensibly devoted to the semi-humorous portrayal of a domestic idyl, made the Battle Scene from "Ein Heldenleben" sound like a berceuse, the musical public may have concluded that this was a variety of musical horseplay for which it had little use.

* * *

Whatever the reason, the "Domestic Symphony" has not prospered in this country. In Germany, where the national conception of humor differs somewhat from ours, the work is much more frequently heard. Yet whenever one listens patiently and attentively to this score, as we did last night during Mr. Koussevitzky's devoted performance of it, the conviction is forced upon us that this singular composition, despite its clowning and its occasional tastelessness, its thick-witted, thick-fingered jocosity, its gargantuan fatuities, is disconcertingly streaked with greatness.

* * *

For Strauss is better than his word. It has happened before. He is often, by intention, an intellectual vulgarian; but his wayward, perverse, incalculable genius betrays him, and he gives us, despite himself, poetry and loveliness.

He is capable of recording in the score of the "Domestic Symphony," at the end of the Introduction, those celebrated parental comparisons regarding the Baby. Not content with illustrating the episode musically, he must needs print, above the emphatic, upward-leaping figure in the clarinets and muted trumpets, this verbal notation: "Die Tanten: 'Ganz der Papa!'" and above the uncompromising downward leap of the trombone, horns and woodwind, the words: "Die Onkels: 'Ganz die Mama!'"

* * *

Yet shortly after, he is to give us one of the most exquisite of cradle-songs—music of enamoring caressiveness and sweetness and poetic charm; and, in the Adagio (the so-called "Love Scene") a passage which he has never, perhaps, excelled for quiet intensity and truth of feeling: those three pages that follow the poco calando, with their

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducted last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert

interwoven utterances of fervor and tenderness, and the little snatch of folksong at the close of the section which yields us a glimpse i to all that is most lovable and persuasive in the German imagination.

* * *

A work sustained at this level, with humor to match the poetry and homeliness to match the beauty—music all of a piece, music continuously fine and costly in texture—would have been a masterpiece, would have been a worthy companion piece to the "Siegfried Idyl." But it took the marvelous Wagner to turn domesticity into attar of poetry; to concentrate the whole of parental and conjugal happiness into twenty minutes of unflawed musical loveliness and consummate art.

One must not ask too much of Strauss—even of the rare, unique Strauss of a quarter-century ago, the Strauss who has passed.

* * *

It was a pleasure to hear the "Domestica" again, and one is grateful to Mr. Koussevitzky for undertaking the enormous labor of its preparation and performance. He gave us some beautiful playing in the course of it—especially in the finest pages of the Adagio, and the audience, apparently forgetting ancient anti-Straussian prejudices, acclaimed him warmly after the deed was done.

* * *

The Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, despite its moments of impressiveness, does not wear so well as its two immediate predecessors. When are we to listen again to the noble, magnificent fifth? Perhaps Mr. Toscanini may be minded to let us hear it. And why has no conductor revived the stripped and drastic and extraordinary Fourth, unheard here since the distant days of Muck?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

FEB 7 1931

Other Music

By OSCAR THOMPSON

Boston Symphony Orchestra—"Flying Dutchman"

BACH, Sibelius and Strauss were the concomitants of Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestral collation last night in Carnegie Hall, when the Bostonians played their usual Thursday night concert a day behind schedule. Pick-Mangiagalli, the Czech-Italian who contributed a ballet some seasons back to the Metropolitan repertory—"Il Carillion Magico" by name—also had a finger in the repast, since he it was who orchestrated, deftly enough, the two Preludes which bespoke Father Bach. Sibelius was drawn upon for his Seventh Symphony, music of depth and noble sonorities, less somber than much of his orchestral writing, but none the less heroic. The modest contribution of Strauss was his "Symphonia Domestica," of which it may be enough to say in the year 1931 that papa and mamma were there and baby had its bath. All this music was played well enough to mitigate a fugitive wish that some of it could have been played even better.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

FEB 7 1931

Boston Orchestra Plays Sibelius Symphony

By IRVING WEIL.

Serge Koussevitzky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall last night for its third visit of the season and gave the subscribers an evening of music that required about as much concentration as any audience has to give. He presented not the customary single symphony, but two of them; and both, moreover, were the type that play through without pause. The program otherwise held only two preludes of Bach in orchestrations by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli.

The two symphonies were the Seventh of the Finn, Jan Sibelius, and the "Domestica" of Richard Strauss. Mr. Koussevitzky has played them both before, but never on the same evening. However, Strauss's musical account of a twenty-four-hour day in his own family circle with its curiously minute disclosures that descend even to the detail of spanking the baby, was something of a relaxation after Sibelius's profound gravity.

SIBELIUS'S LATEST.

The Sibelius symphony is his latest and was completed only some five years ago. At the time he had reached the age of 60, and a great deal had happened in the musical world since his emergence as a figure of international import. A great deal had also happened in his own development. For one thing, he had abandoned the type of composition that was essentially Finnish in its almost strictly national significance. The Seventh Symphony, like at least two that preceded it, is absolute music.

Sibelius here seems to have absorbed many of the innovations that originated with other composers in other parts of Europe, to have winnowed the valid from the freakish, and to have bent them all to his own purposes with the authentic touch of genius. The result bears his own stamp and his alone. Its economy of means is spare and austere, but this seems to make its eloquence all the more striking. The symphony is music that is still strange, but its power is unmistakable.

The orchestra played the work with a splendid virtuosity, but its performance bore certain characteristics in Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment that, one should say, scattered emphasis a bit unduly here and there. The Strauss "Domestica" served the conduc-

[illegible] better in this one slow and majestic, the other buoyant and spontaneous. Each was played with mastery, the inner voices manifested with clarity of outline, the poliphony managed with equability in its tonal weaving. The one fault was in the preponderance of tone from the bass viols in fortissimo passages. The eight monstrous instruments, which usually blend with the full orchestra, growled their massive diapasons into the mixture of violins, violas and 'cellos almost overwhelming their gentle sounds.

Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, played without pause, was introduced to America nearly five years ago by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Like the earlier symphonies by the same prolific composer, the seventh pays an occasional debt to the folk music of the North. These elemental tunes are incorporated into episodes of varying moods, impressively scored, dextrously developed; elaborated and resolved with imagination and erudition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

FEB 7 - 1931

tique

Driver Asks e Now Antiques

e Many of Him in the er Man Essays a Not ow Answer.

formed here on January 9, 1927, by the men who played it last evening. It is not the kind of music which immediately enlightens the public mind, nor is it likely ever to fire the public soul. It is profoundly introspective and in its manner of speech slow, sober and, one might say, almost hieratic. One is conscious of the brooding of a noble mind, fed upon the solemn splendors of stern mountains and far spaces. In such music there is nothing of the voluptuous enchantment of passionate utterance, nothing of the obvious excitements of vigorous rhythms and clangorous climaxes.

Sibelius composes on broad lines, but with elemental materials. He begins the symphony with an ascending scale proclaimed with a nobility of instrumentation which gives the fullest value to this fundamental musical idea. All through the work, which is in one movement, this scale in various garbs runs as the infinite line of an endless perspective. Such a clearly formed and logically thought piece of composition could have been created only by a master musical mind. But the mournful beauty of this fathomless meditation is not for the sudden appreciation of the multitude. Whether in time and with repetitions it will bore its way down into the general human understanding is not for us to conjecture. Probably it will be better understood twenty years hence, and then all music lovers may perchance say with Bruennhilde, "Alles ward mir nun frei."

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the symphony a reading of fine and human perception. All the dignity and feeling of the composition were liberated and the proportions of the score were admirably exhibited. The orchestra had opportunity to display that opulent sonority and celestial clarity of tone for which the Boston organization is noted.

The chronicler did not remain to listen once again to Richard Strauss's distended version of "Home, Sweet Home." The eminent German master attained the peak of his autobiographical publication when he produced the score of "A Hero's Life." The leading man in the domestic symphony is no more than a self-satisfied papa who regards himself as a person of heroic dimensions because his wife has blossomed into motherhood. There are millions of papas and most of them spoil their children. The babe in the Strauss symphony has to be duly spanked. The best pages are those which paint Mr. Strauss in the act of composing. That was inevitable. But there is none too much of good music in this extract from a family diary.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. WORLD

FEB 7 1931

Lovers o Wagner Enjoy Matinee Of "The Flying Dutchman" at Met

Bohnen Hea as Daland in First of An al Cycle of Compos s Works

By Noe raus

With "The Flyin Dutchman" as torch bearer of the eries, the Metropolitan's annual agner cycle got under way yesterda afternoon to the manifest delight of large houseful of that composer' eager votaries. This was the first f ival of the kind under the Gattian egime to include the important early work, a welcome addition made poss le by the recent revival of the opera on the Broadway boards.

The only new fea re of yesterday's performance was th Daland provided by Mr. Bohnen, w se conception of Senta's parent di ered vitally from that of his predec sor, Mr. Andresen. Mr. Bohnen appe d in the role with Barbara Kemp a Bayreuth in 1914, and, therefore, h interpretation had the ring of aut rity. Unlike Mr. Andresen, he ob ed the composer's injunction-agai dragging the part into the realm comedy. His Daland was a car lly sustained portrayal, so free f mannerism and excess that it once took its place among the mo ingratiating characterizations t basso has offered here. He mad he old salt a genial soul, but secre e, crafty and shrewd. Avarice gleam from his eyes and cunning sho through his smile. This was pl sibly the father who would barter off his daughter to a stranger w hout compunction or an sense of rong doing—in other words, precise the type Wagner had in mind. Mr. ohnen's voice was in excellent con ion and he sang as well as he act . As the Dutchman, Mr. Schorr su gested more potently the ominous ose than the inward anguish of the hasuerus of the seas. His vocalism t roughout was of the superior sort expected from him. Mme. Jeritza e ted strange sounds which, technic ly speaking, had nothing to do th real singing, nor was her sense pitch any too accurate, im ersonation of Senta was e n vertheless, reaching its climax in tha superb bit of business when she fi t meets the Dutchman which man es to convey surprise, fear and stasy in a single gesture. Mr. Laubenthal again shouted his way t rough Erik's music. The score was gi en a spirited reading by Bodanzky but he permitted the orchestra to do a good deal of undistinguished work.

At night in Carnegie Mall, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Botson Symphony Orchestra enraptured a sizable audience with a regally magnificent envisagement of a program consisting of two Preludes of Bach, arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli; the Seventh Symphony, by Sibelius, and Richard Strauss's "Symphonia Dofestica." This was far and away the finest orchestral playing the Bostonians or any other visiting organization has vouchsafed here this season. The tone was marvelously rich and pure in every department. How firm, velvety and sensitive a body of strings can be was first disclosed in the brace of items for bowed instruments devised by Pick-Mangiagalli. His transcriptions of the Prelude to Bach's D Minor Organ Fugua and the Prelude of the E Major Violin Partita were both nobly performed. The former proved the more satisfactory of the two compositions in their new garb. As the organ prelude is without pedal in the original and nowhere suggests change of registration, it was easily transferred to the strings without loss of character. Its solemn, introspective mood was wonderfully brought out by Mr. Koussevitzky, who gave it a memorably poetic reading. For the other prelude, Mr. Mangiagalli had to introduce counterpoint of his own invention, and it was not happily managed. While the first violins negotiated the original solo part in unison, the other strings kept up a rather scrappy and disjointed accompaniment, which refused to blend with the melody. But the virtuosity of the interpretation was startling. Kreisler and other violinists make a show piece of the difficult solo number. But here was the entire ag egation of first fiddles accomplishing the same feat simultaneously. No wonder the audience was thrilled.

The great treat of the evening was the superb unfolding of the Sibelius symphony, which had not been heard here since 1927, when it was given its local premiere by the same conductor, and also enjoyed two presentations under Mr. Klemperer. As the Sibelius opus parts company with the traditional symphonic form in its one lengthy movement of many varied sections, there is something cryptic about it for the e listener. But it is hard to understand how anyone present yesterday could fail to appreciate the extraordinary beauties of the composition, its fertility of invention, individuality and intense poesy. A profound debt of gratitude is owed Mr. Koussevitzky for reviving this splendid creation. One trusts he will repeat it here soon, to acquaint the public further not only with the symphony but his delivery of it, which must be reckoned among the major achievements of the musical year.

Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47.....Elgar
Symphony No. 7.....Sibelius
Symphonia Domestica.....Strauss

The visit of the Bostonians to Carnegie Hall last night brought no modernist shocker for a change. Is it possible that no new symphony, overture, concerto grosso or suite was born since the orchestra played here last?

But notwithstanding the absence of a hot-off-the-griddle masterpiece, last night's fare was pretty distinguished—at least in the matter of celebrated names. Bach, Sibelius and Strauss should make a dependable trio for a musical evening. But unfortunately there was a catch in the Bach preludes, and the music that Mr. Koussevitzky selected from Strauss and Sibelius was not the happiest representation of the stature of either of these two musicians.

The Bach pieces, an organ prelude in D minor and the popular prelude in E major from the third partita for violin, appeared last night in transcription for string orchestra by Mr. Pick-Mangiagalli. The music of Bach is such an inexhaustible quarry that transcribing it for one thing or another has taken on the proportions of a racket. There can be, of course, nothing illegitimate about the practice, and Bach himself was not above indulging in it. The only test of a transcription is its success. Mr. Pick-Mangiagalli succeeded, I thought, in transferring the organ prelude to the strings. The violin prelude did not fare as well, perhaps because the transcriber was called upon to devise Bachian counterpoint under the original fiddle part, an invention which distracted one's interest from the sweep of the melodic line and kept it jumping from one string section to another.

The seventh symphony of Sibelius, for all its characteristic, sunless orchestration, and its many pages of epic music, is a wandering composition, which for the most part offers one only meager clues to its structure and its emotions. Perhaps many repetitions of the work would disclose its musical story. Indeed, signs are not wanting that Sibelius is at last coming into his own, and it is not impossible that in a few years from now his seventh symphony will be played as frequently as Stravinsky's "Sacre." When that happens it may prove to be a composition of importance, beautiful, concise and understandable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 8 1931

CAREER OF CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER

The Evolution of a Modern Master—His Sympathies With and Expression of His Age—His Distinguished and Solitary Art

By OLIN DOWNES.

CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER celebrated his seventieth birthday on the 30th of January. Forthwith the Boston Symphony Orchestra and now the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra observe the event by performances of Loeffler's music. Next Thursday and Friday New York hears the "Pagan Poem" for piano and orchestra. Next Friday and Saturday Boston will hear the "Canticum Fratris Solis" (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice and orchestra and the "Pagan Poem," with Heinrich Gebhard, in both cities, as the pianist. In Cleveland last Thursday night Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation" had its first performance, a work he was commissioned to write for the opening of Severance Hall. And some music reviewers are writing articles, tributes and other forms of homage to Mr. Loeffler.

This article is neither tribute nor homage, because neither of these two things are needed. These words are in the nature of protest. Why, instead of kind words for a composer whose place will be established by his music and not by any words of contemporaries, do we not hear more of Mr. Loeffler's compositions?

A few of these have been played frequently. But the same lamentable lack of curiosity concerning other compositions of Loeffler is shown by our orchestras and conductors that is shown toward the sum of the work of most creative artists, even those of high reputation and attainment. If a composer does not go down into the marts of trade, or propagandize shamelessly and persistently for himself, the musical organizations and the public in general remain content with one work or another which has happened to attract popular attention. The rest of the composer's output, unless he has an aggressive publisher to act for him, will in the course of human nature await the discoverers of future years. The product of an artist of Mr. Loeffler's achievement should be known to the public in its entirety. It is only in this way that comprehensive knowledge and understanding of a composer's creative purposes can be obtained.

* * *

It is possible that Mr. Loeffler, who is a law unto himself, is partly responsible for his comparatively small showing on concert platforms. He is known to his intimates as an extremely fastidious—sometimes we wonder if he is not morbidly fastidious—and self-critical workman. He may look upon this or that composition as unrepresentative, and he may deliberately discourage conductors when they come in quest of a new or unfamiliar work to put on their programs. It is known that more than one score, finished after long days and nights of labor, has remained in his desk, never to see the light. So that the chief culprit in the case may be the man of simple life and ways, well acquainted in various cities, and yet, in actual truth, the very solitary Charles Martin Loeffler. But scores there are, some of them virtually unknown, and a conductor bent upon their exposition would find a way to them.

The major compositions of Loeffler immediately recalled by this writer as having been played in New York in the last six years are "La Bonne Chanson" and the "Pagan Poem," both given repeated performances; "La Mort de Tintagiles," recently played by Mr. Hadley's Manhattan Symphony Orchestra; the "Canticum Fratris Solis," for soprano and orchestra; the noble quartet, "Music for Four Stringed Instruments," inspired by the death of Victor Chapman in the war, played here by the Flonzaleys before their disbandment, and the choral "Ode for One Who Fell in Battle." This is probably not a full list, but it represents the principal aspects of Loeffler's music for the local public.

Where is the "Villanelle du Diable," after Rollinat? Where is the symphony "Hora Mystica" (1917) for orchestra and male chorus, a work which asks the utmost of conductor and executants, and is one of the most characteristic scores that Loeffler has produced? When this work was first performed in Boston in 1917 it was enigmatic to reviewers and public alike. Opinion was divided about it. The forces required for its adequate representation, the wholly mystical and impersonal character of the music, are not the things that make for immediate effect with audiences. In the perspective of time this notable score may prove one of the most distinctive in the category of Loeffler's compositions, or it may be seen as a spiritual adventure of a modern master which did not completely materialize in tone.

We would like to hear it again. We would like to hear again the five superb settings of Irish poems for tenor and orchestra, composed, if memory serves, for, and at any rate, brilliantly sung at Boston Symphony concerts by John McCormack in 1922. We want to know better the "Music for Four Stringed Instruments," and also would fain hear some of Mr. Loeffler's earlier compositions for quartet and for various chamber music combinations. No doubt these compositions of earlier vintage would show influences of another period. Possibly, again, Mr. Loeffler has ruthlessly drawn his pencil through them. But, we repeat, we would like to know.

* * *

We would then be in a position to gain at least a partial perspective of the music of the composer of unique gifts and tendencies, and we would behold Loeffler as a creative artist standing clearly forth against the background of the modern musical movement.

What is Loeffler's relation to this movement? To this period? He has been, and is, in it, but he is not, and never was, wholly of it. The influences of his early formative years were various. Born at Mulhouse, in Alsace, he was taken as a child to Russia, later to Hungary. He is familiar with the folk-music of both countries, and in later years he was impressed by the chant of both Greek and Roman Churches. In 1875 he was in Switzerland, where he stayed two years, laying the foundations of a professional violinist's career. He studied the violin with Joachim in Berlin and Massart in Paris, and composition with famous French and German teachers. He had orchestral experience with Pasdeloup in Paris, in the private orchestra of Baron Paul von Derweis at Nice and Lugano. In New York, in 1881, he played under Theodore Thomas and Leopold Damrosch, and the following year went to Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which had the honor of giving many of the first performances of his works as they came from his pen. From 1885 till 1903 he shared the first violin desk of the Boston Orchestra with Franz Kneisel, the concertmaster. He then retired from the orchestra to devote himself to teaching and composition. Since 1910 Mr. Loeffler has lived on his farm at Medfield, and his life has been a plain one, devoted principally to creative work and a few favored pupils and companions.

* * *

When he came to America he brought with him an unusually wide experience and background and a culture exceptional among musicians—exceptional at least until those days of the late nineteenth century which saw the intimacy that developed between composers and men in other arts and letters in Paris. The significant consequence of that association, the group of composers headed by Debussy and d'Indy, then known as the modern French school. With the music of this period in France, and with musical associations of childhood years in Russia, Loeffler was deeply imbued. With modern literature, especially French literature and certain of the English and Irish poets and the American, Poe, he was especially sympathetic. The predilection of modern French composers of the Debussyan wing for modal harmony and for impressionistic effect was also felt by Loeffler, not in the spirit of imitation but with the consciousness of a young musician, coming from post-Wagnerian France, in a poetic and impressionable stage of development.

But Loeffler was never completely an impressionist, nor was he ever an unconditional Debussyite. His admiration for that master was passionate, but it was one phase of his receptivity and eclecticism. By the side of his inevitable response to the beauty to which Debussy pointed the way, witness Loeffler's devotion to plain chant and his profound admiration for the line, the form, of the austere and anti

The works
tively and c
ed by Loeffl to write a mu
ing now fro of his early the magnifice chestra of "L
Loeffler's ear token a very youthful, ro
Mort de Tint
the terror and in Maeterlin
the flavor of the drama.
way: The Tintagiles," drama and spiritually ne
than he is to
It is the ro night and th
than that of which inspir

The date of the first vers was 1898. "L in which, wh
there might Berlioz, is ho fantasy, a de preceded. In there is not technical pro respective of spiration in a anticipation music which nounced to emphasis of classic and almost a vol
ism in the emotional v
music.

And here habits of disc before it is so, to estimat
as a compos to attempt to lines of his p

"La Bonne
laine, and "L
came in 1902,
1907. Since appears to h direction of from dramat for his work passes. The indication o
Four Stringe and, as an tistic aims, the course has kept cle affectation spirit of so poraries. Wh of rhythm a from romant since arrive says nothing purified and trends of th been felt in scores of oth transfigured music. He i tive musician pression of t within, and fads and sh from outside ning of his has retaine scorn of che his possibly and the pas mystery of h himself. He the professed period. He ha
he has let his terms of his terious art of

NEW YORK TIMES, February 7, 1931

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD AT ITS BEST

Brilliant Concert Brings Forth Sibelius's Unfamiliar Seventh Symphony.

BACH PRELUDES AS OPENING

Strauss's "Domestica" Completes List of Koussevitzky's Offerings to Enthusiastic Audience.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The unsurpassed and seldom equaled Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave an extremely brilliant concert last night in Carnegie Hall. Not often has the writer heard as fine a performance from this orchestra, at any time in its career. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a superb ensemble of virtuosi. For its string section alone it would be pre-eminent, but its brass and wind choirs are now of almost equal quality and balance. Not only this: Mr. Koussevitzky has sensitized the orchestra until it is a model of flexibility and fineness of texture.

Last night this magnificent instrument glowed with beauty and color; the sheer tonal qualities of the playing would have bestowed significance upon the music. The audience, deeply impressed by the performance, applauded and cheered.

No new works were introduced at this concert, but the program had matter of uncommon interest. It opened with two Bach preludes, as arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, followed by the unfamiliar and unique symphony of Sibelius—his seventh—and finally with the Strauss "Sinfonia Domestica." One might have asked, after music of the rare distinctions of Sibelius, Why the performance of the Domestica? which is one of the more bourgeois and heavy-footed of Strauss's scores. The explanation was two-fold. Strauss's music is more effective in the sheerly exterior sense than that of Sibelius, and more familiar to the public, while Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of Strauss minimized his vulgarities and long-windedness and glorified those pages—and there are many—in which the Straussian lyricism and the sheer richness of the Strauss style are most conspicuously present.

Bach Preludes Beautifully Played.

The Bach preludes, admirably contrasted, were prophetic of the quality of the evening. The first prelude was played with a simplicity, a lack of unnecessary dynamic contrast, a sustainment of melodic line and mood ideally appropriate to the music. The string choir, having distinguished itself here, then displayed a fire and virtuosity of which any solo violinist could have been proud. This music was to the advantage of the symphony which followed, since the Sibelius of the seventh symphony, in contrast to the youthful composer of earlier works, is a musician of pure line and of sheerly musical intent, and therefore not out of place after Bach.

The Seventh symphony is a very striking example of the evolution of Sibelius's art. The style of the early symphonies, which are beginning to grow popular, was romantic and, one would say, panoramic. Back of the passion and strength of the music was the landscape element—the sounds of the North, its sternness and desolation, its mists and lowering skies. There were also the long, simple melodies which formed the backbone of the symphonic structure.

Sibelius in a New Light.

Now, the symphony heard last night is all melody, but of how different a kind than the splendid outbursts of the first symphonies or the tone-poems "En saga"! All the paraphernalia of those previous scores, imposing and heroic as it was, has been discarded. So, likewise, has the heavy orchestration of the earlier works. From Sibelius's Fourth Symphony onward there is an amazing purification of style—no dramatic gestures, no heaven-defying tragedy or alarms of battle, but sheer beauty for beauty's sake—pure music, obeying its own laws, following inner principles of its own being, and the whole molded in masterly form and design.

Sibelius, in this late work, uses only the simplest phrases. He seems to search for the plainest motives, the most transparent harmonies, the clearest arrangement of ideas. His scoring is largely for the strings. And instead of a symphony built in great blocks of tone you have one which is almost a string quartet in the fineness of its facture and the interweaving of its parts.

The Seventh Symphony is in one movement, with prodigious adjustment of the details of the form. There is symphonic statement and recapitulation; there are elements of the different movements of the classic symphony, but there are a closeness of development and an inter-relation of the smallest fragments of the score which grow more impressive with every hearing.

This is Sibelius, the master, in the most intimate communion with nature, oblivious of the world, thinking out loud. It is scarcely courage for him to be so independent and careless, for these traits are merely his inborn characteristics! A composer has actually been found who wants to compose and, outside of that, does not care. And while vociferous young men of today have been talking about "abstract" form and music disassociated from poetry or other "romantic" elements, Sibelius has quietly and masterfully been writing it: music which instinctively expresses the modern spirit, but with what a noble simplicity, reticence and utter disregard of compromise!

Ovation for the Performers.

It was obvious that this symphony last night puzzled a part of the audience, while the other part applauded long and persistently, recalling Mr Koussevitzky until the orchestra rose to bow with him.

It should be said here that it is hard to think of the Sibelius Seventh Symphony performed with more technical precision and sensitiveness of nuance, and more fidelity to its deepest inner spirit, than were shown on this occasion. As for Sibelius himself, who is as far ahead of public taste in these late works as his earlier scores were ahead of the audiences of thirty years ago, he can afford to await the complete recognition which he is sure to receive.

The performance of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," as we have said, was little short of a glorification of that work. Presented in such a light, it was impossible to sustain long and logically held objections to it. The plentitude of melody and the endless richness of Strauss's counterpoint last night were simply irresistible, if only for the splendor and virtuosity of the orchestra's playing.

What is one to do with this Strauss? What right has a composer to go suburban, to foist on an audience the private life of his household from evening to dawn, inclusive, and succeed in making music.

It is all very well to say that the proceeding is in bad taste—which is true—and that it cannot be done. Unfortunately for the argument, it is done. It may not be done with the distinction that pertains to an "Eulenspiegel" or "Don Quixote," but in the same "Sinfonia domestica" there is page upon page of exulting, kindling music, and there is such bravura of counterpoint that when it is expounded as last night the listener was welling up in him a tendency to shout "Hurrah." The proof of the music was in the performance. No wonder that this was followed by a demonstration.

THIS CLIPPIN
W YORK TIMES
FEB 8 1931

CAREER OF CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER

The Evolution of a Modern Master—His Sympathies With and Expression of His Age—His Distinguished and Solitary Art

By OLIN DOWNES.

CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER celebrated his seventieth birthday on the 30th of January. Forthwith the Boston Symphony Orchestra and now the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra observe the event by performances of Loeffler's music. Next Thursday and Friday New York hears the "Pagan Poem" for piano and orchestra. Next Friday and Saturday Boston will hear the "Canticum Fratris Solis" (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice and orchestra and the "Pagan Poem," with Heinrich Gebhard, in both cities, as the pianist. In Cleveland last Thursday night Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation" had its first performance, a work he was commissioned to write for the opening of Severance Hall. And some music reviewers are writing articles, tributes and other forms of homage to Mr. Loeffler.

This article is neither tribute nor homage, because neither of these two things are needed. These words are in the nature of protest. Why, instead of kind words for a composer whose place will be established by his music and not by any words of contemporaries, do we not hear more of Mr. Loeffler's compositions?

A few of these have been played frequently. But the same lamentable lack of curiosity concerning other compositions of Loeffler is shown by our orchestras and conductors that is shown toward the sum of the work of most creative artists, even those of high reputation and attainment. If a composer does not go down into the marts of trade, or propagandize shamelessly and persistently for himself, the musical organizations and the public in general remain content with one work or another which has happened to attract popular attention. The rest of the composer's output, unless he has an aggressive publisher to act for him, will in the course of human nature await the discoverers of future years. The product of an artist of Mr. Loeffler's achievement should be known to the public in its entirety. It is only in this way that comprehensive knowledge and understanding of a composer's creative purposes can be obtained.

* * *

It is possible that Mr. Loeffler, who is a law unto himself, is partly responsible for his comparatively small showing on concert platforms. He is known to his intimates as an extremely fastidious—sometimes we wonder if he is not morbidly fastidious—and self-critical workman. He may look upon this or that composition as unrepresentative, and he may deliberately discourage conductors when they come in quest of a new or unfamiliar work to put on their programs. It is known that more than one score, finished after long days and nights of labor, has remained in his desk, never to see the light. So that the chief culprit in the case may be the man of simple life and ways, well acquainted in various cities, and yet, in actual truth, the very solitary Charles Martin Loeffler. But scores there are, some of them virtually unknown, and a conductor bent upon their exposition would find a way to them.

The major compositions of Loeffler immediately recalled by this writer as having been played in New York in the last six years are "La Bonne Chanson" and the "Pagan Poem," both given repeated performances; "La Mort de Tintagiles," recently played by Mr. Hadley's Manhattan Symphony Orchestra; the "Canticum Fratris Solis," for soprano and orchestra; the noble quartet, "Music for Four Stringed Instruments," inspired by the death of Victor Chapman in the war, played here by the Flonzaleys before their disbandment, and the choral "Ode for One Who Fell in Battle." This is probably not a full list, but it represents the principal aspects of Loeffler's music for the local public.

Where is the "Villanelle du Diable," after Rollinat? Where is the symphony "Hora Mystica" (1917) for orchestra and male chorus, a work which asks the utmost of conductor and executants, and is one of the most characteristic scores that Loeffler has produced? When this work was first performed in Boston in 1917 it was enigmatic to reviewers and public alike. Opinion was divided about it. The forces required for its adequate representation, the wholly mystical and impersonal character of the music, are not the things that make for immediate effect with audiences. In the perspective of time this notable score may prove one of the most distinctive in the category of Loeffler's compositions, or it may be seen as a spiritual adventure of a modern master which did not completely materialize in tone.

We would like to hear it again. We would like to hear again the five superb settings of Irish poems for tenor and orchestra, composed, if memory serves, for, and at any rate, brilliantly sung at Boston Symphony concerts by John McCormack in 1922. We want to know better the "Music for Four Stringed Instruments," and also would fain hear some of Mr. Loeffler's earlier compositions for quartet and for various chamber music combinations. No doubt these compositions of earlier vintage would show influences of another period. Possibly, again, Mr. Loeffler has ruthlessly drawn his pencil through them. But, we repeat, we would like to know.

* * *

We would then be in a position to gain at least a partial perspective of the music of the composer of unique gifts and tendencies, and we would behold Loeffler as a creative artist standing clearly forth against the background of the modern musical movement.

What is Loeffler's relation to this movement? To this period? He has been, and is, in it, but he is not, and never was, wholly of it. The influences of his early formative years were various. Born at Mulhouse, in Alsace, he was taken as a child to Russia, later to Hungary. He is familiar with the folk-music of both countries, and in later years he was impressed by the chant of both Greek and Roman Churches. In 1875 he was in Switzerland, where he stayed two years, laying the foundations of a professional violinist's career. He studied the violin with Joachim in Berlin and Massart in Paris, and composition with famous French and German teachers. He had orchestral experience with Pasdeloup in Paris, in the private orchestra of Baron Paul von Derweis at Nice and Lugano. In New York, in 1881, he played under Theodore Thomas and Leopold Damrosch, and the following year went to Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which had the honor of giving many of the first performances of his works as they came from his pen. From 1885 till 1903 he shared the first violin desk of the Boston Orchestra with Franz Kneisel, the concertmaster. He then retired from the orchestra to devote himself to teaching and composition. Since 1910 Mr. Loeffler has lived on his farm at Medfield, and his life has been a plain one, devoted principally to creative work and a few favored pupils and companions.

* * *

When he came to America he brought with him an unusually wide experience and background and a culture exceptional among musicians—exceptional at least until those days of the late nineteenth century which saw the intimacy that developed between composers and men in other arts and letters in Paris. The significant consequence of that association, the group of composers headed by Debussy and d'Indy, then known as the modern French school. With the music of this period in France, and with musical associations of childhood years in Russia, Loeffler was deeply imbued. With modern literature, especially French literature and certain of the English and Irish poets and the American, Poe, he was especially sympathetic. The predilection of modern French composers of the Debussyan wing for modal harmony and for impressionistic effect was also felt by Loeffler, not in the spirit of imitation but with the consciousness of a young musician, coming from post-Wagnerian France, in a poetic and impressionable stage of development.

But Loeffler was never completely an impressionist, nor was he ever an unconditional Debussyite. His admiration for that master was passionate, but it was one phase of his receptivity and eclecticism. By the side of his inevitable response to the beauty to which Debussy pointed the way, witness Loeffler's devotion to plain chant and his profound admiration for the line, the form, of the austere and anti-

The works
tively and co
ed by Loeffle
to write a mu
ing now from of his early the magnificer chestra of "L Loeffler's earl token a very youthful, ro
Mort de Tint
the terror and in Maeterlinc
the flavor of the drama.
way: The Tintagiles," drama and spiritually ne
than he is to
It is the rom night and the than that of t which inspires

The date of the first vers was 1898. "L in which, wh
there might Berlioz, is, ho fantasy, a de preceded. In there is not o technical proc respective of t spiration in a anticipation
music which nounced toda emphasis of li classic and a almost a volte
ism in the emotional vig
music.

And here habits of discu before it is so, to estimate as a compose to attempt to lines of his pr

"La Bonne
laine, and "L
came in 1902,
1907. Since appears to ha direction of ab from dramatic or for his works, wi passes. The "Hora indication of this,
Four Stringed Instrum and, as an earnest indi tistic aims, even more sig the course of this progres has kept clear of all the cynk affectation and the mate spirit of so many of his co poraries. While the young men of rhythm and line, and music fr from romantical dross, Loeffler, lon since arrived at similar conclusions, says nothing, but writes singularly purified and masterly music. The trends of the last fifty years have been felt in his scores as in the scores of others, but they have been transfigured and alembicated in his music. He is one of the representative musicians of an age, but his expression of that age has come from within, and not, as an imitation of fads and shibboleths of the hour, from outside. From the very beginning of his creative career Loeffler has retained his conscience, his scorn of cheap or bad workmanship, his possibly extreme fastidiousness, and the passionate worship of the mystery of beauty which is part of himself. He has not had to follow the professed musical leaders of his period. He has kept his own counsel; he has let his period come to him, in terms of his own soul, and the mysterious art of music.

Philharmonic This Week.

NEW YORK TIMES, February 7, 1931

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD AT ITS BEST

Brilliant Concert Brings Forth Sibelius's Unfamiliar Seventh Symphony.

BACH PRELUDES AS OPENING

Strauss's "Domestica" Completes List of Koussevitzky's Offerings to Enthusiastic Audience.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The unsurpassed and seldom equaled Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave an extremely brilliant concert last night in Carnegie Hall. Not often has the writer heard as fine a performance from this orchestra, at any time in its career. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a superb ensemble of virtuosi. For its string section alone it would be pre-eminent, but its brass and wind choirs are now of almost equal quality and balance. Not only this: Mr. Koussevitzky has sensitized the orchestra until it is a model of flexibility and fineness of texture.

Last night this magnificent instrument glowed with beauty and color; the sheer tonal qualities of the playing would have bestowed significance upon the music. The audience, deeply impressed by the performance, applauded and cheered.

No new works were introduced at this concert, but the program had matter of uncommon interest. It opened with two Bach preludes, as arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, followed by the unfamiliar and unique symphony of Sibelius—his seventh—and finally with the Strauss "Sinfonia Domestica." One might have asked, after music of the rare distinctions of Sibelius, Why the performance of the Domestica? which is one of the more bourgeois and heavy-footed of Strauss's scores. The explanation was two-fold. Strauss's music is more effective in heerly exterior sense than that of and more familiar to the
Mr. Koussevitzky's readinimized his vulgari-ss and glorified many—in nd the re

nalia of those previous scores, imposing and heroic as it was, has been discarded. So, likewise, has the heavy orchestration of the earlier works. From Sibelius's Fourth Symphony onward there is an amazing purification of style—no dramatic gestures, no heaven-defying tragedy or alarms of battle, but sheer beauty for beauty's sake—pure music, obeying its own laws, following inner principles of its own being, and the whole molded in masterly form and design.

Sibelius, in this late work, uses only the simplest phrases. He seems to search for the plainest motives, the most transparent harmonies, the clearest arrangement of ideas. His scoring is largely for the strings. And instead of a symphony built in great blocks of tone you have one which is almost a string quartet in the fineness of its facture and the interweaving of its parts.

The Seventh Symphony is in one movement, with prodigious adjustment of the details of the form. There is symphonic statement and recapitulation; there are elements of the different movements of the classic symphony, but there are a closeness of development and an inter-relation of the smallest fragments of the score which grow more impressive with every hearing.

This is Sibelius, the master, in the most intimate communion with nature, oblivious of the world, thinking out loud. It is scarcely courage for him to be so independent and careless, for these traits are merely his inborn characteristics! A composer has actually been found who wants to compose and, outside of that, does not care. And while vociferous young men of today have been talking about "abstract" form and music disassociated from poetry or other "romantic" elements, Sibelius has quietly and masterfully been writing it: music which instinctively expresses the modern spirit, but with what a noble simplicity, reticence and utter disregard of compromise!

Ovation for the Performers.

It was obvious that this symphony last night puzzled a part of the audience, while the other part applauded long and persistently, recalling Mr Koussevitzky until the orchestra rose to bow with him.

It should be said here that it is hard to think of the Sibelius Seventh Symphony performed with more technical precision and sensitiveness of nuance, and more fidelity to its deepest inner spirit, than were shown this occasion. As for Sibelius him-is as far ahead of public late works as his earlier of the audiences of can afford to ition which

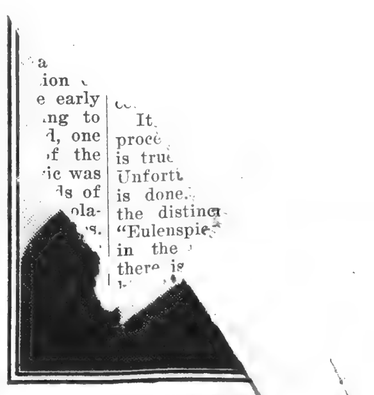
Gin-



© New York Times

Elsa Hilger, 'Cello Soloi
Concert of the Juilliard Gradu
School Orchestra.

"Canticum Fratris Solis," with Povla
Frijsh as soloist.

THIS CLIPPI
W YORK TIMES
FEB 8 1931

CAREER OF CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER

The Evolution of a Modern Master—His Sympathies With and Expression of His Age—His Distinguished and Solitary Art

By OLIN DOWNES.

CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER celebrated his seventieth birthday on the 30th of January. Forthwith the Boston Symphony Orchestra and now the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra observe the event by performances of Loeffler's music. Next Thursday and Friday New York hears the "Pagan Poem" for piano and orchestra. Next Friday and Saturday Boston will hear the "Canticum Fratris Solis" (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice and orchestra and the "Pagan Poem," with Heinrich Gebhard, in both cities, as the pianist. In Cleveland last Thursday night Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation" had its first performance, a work he was commissioned to write for the opening of Severance Hall. And some music reviewers are writing articles, tributes and other forms of homage to Mr. Loeffler.

This article is neither tribute nor homage, because neither of these two things are needed. These words are in the nature of protest. Why, instead of kind words for a composer whose place will be established by his music and not by any words of contemporaries, do we not hear more of Mr. Loeffler's compositions?

A few of these have been played frequently. But the same lamentable lack of curiosity concerning other compositions of Loeffler is shown by our orchestras and conductors that is shown toward the sum of the work of most creative artists, even those of high reputation and attainment. If a composer does not go down into the marts of trade, or propagandize shamelessly and persistently for himself, the musical organizations and the public in general remain content with one work or another which has happened to attract popular attention. The rest of the composer's output, unless he has an aggressive publisher to act for him, will in the course of human nature await the discoverers of future years. The product of an artist of Mr. Loeffler's achievement should be known to the public in its entirety. It is only in this way that comprehensive knowledge and understanding of a composer's creative purposes can be obtained.

* * *

It is possible that Mr. Loeffler, who is a law unto himself, is partly responsible for his comparatively small showing on concert platforms. He is known to his intimates as an extremely fastidious—sometimes we wonder if he is not morbidly fastidious—and self-critical workman. He may look upon this or that composition as unrepresentative, and he may deliberately discourage conductors when they come in quest of a new or unfamiliar work to put on their programs. It is known that more than one score, finished after long days and nights of labor, has remained in his desk, never to see the light. So that the chief culprit in the case may be the man of simple life and ways, well acquainted in various cities, and yet, in actual truth, the very solitary Charles Martin Loeffler. But scores there are, some of them virtually unknown, and a conductor bent upon their exposition would find a way to them.

The major compositions of Loeffler immediately recalled by this writer as having been played in New York in the last six years are "La Bonne Chanson" and the "Pagan Poem," both given repeated performances; "La Mort de Tintagiles," recently played by Mr. Hadley's Manhattan Symphony Orchestra; the "Canticum Fratris Solis," for soprano and orchestra; the noble quartet, "Music for Four Stringed Instruments," inspired by the death of Victor Chapman in the war, played here by the Flonzaleys before their disbandment, and the choral "Ode for One Who Fell in Battle." This is probably not a full list, but it represents the principal aspects of Loeffler's music for the local public.

Where is the "Villanelle du Diable," after Rollinat? Where is the symphony "Hora Mystica" (1917) for orchestra and male chorus, a work which asks the utmost of conductor and executants, and is one of the most characteristic scores that Loeffler has produced? When this work was first performed in Boston in 1917 it was enigmatic to reviewers and public alike. Opinion was divided about it. The forces required for its adequate representation, the wholly mystical and impersonal character of the music, are not the things that make for immediate effect with audiences. In the perspective of time this notable score may prove one of the most distinctive in the category of Loeffler's compositions, or it may be seen as a spiritual adventure of a modern master which did not completely materialize in tone.

We would like to hear it again. We would like to hear again the five superb settings of Irish poems for tenor and orchestra, composed, if memory serves, for, and at any rate, brilliantly sung at Boston Symphony concerts by John McCormack in 1922. We want to know better the "Music for Four Stringed Instruments," and also would fain hear some of Mr. Loeffler's earlier compositions for quartet and for various chamber music combinations. No doubt these compositions of earlier vintage would show influences of another period. Possibly, again, Mr. Loeffler has ruthlessly drawn his pencil through them. But, we repeat, we would like to know.

* * *

We would then be in a position to gain at least a partial perspective of the music of the composer of unique gifts and tendencies, and we would behold Loeffler as a creative artist standing clearly forth against the background of the modern musical movement.

What is Loeffler's relation to this movement? To this period? He has been, and is, in it, but he is not, and never was, wholly of it. The influences of his early formative years were various. Born at Mulhouse, in Alsace, he was taken as a child to Russia, later to Hungary. He is familiar with the folk-music of both countries, and in later years he was impressed by the chant of both Greek and Roman Churches. In 1875 he was in Switzerland, where he stayed two years, laying the foundations of a professional violinist's career. He studied the violin with Joachim in Berlin and Massart in Paris, and composition with famous French and German teachers. He had orchestral experience with Pasdeloup in Paris, in the private orchestra of Baron Paul von Derweis at Nice and Lugano. In New York, in 1881, he played under Theodore Thomas and Leopold Damrosch, and the following year went to Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which had the honor of giving many of the first performances of his works as they came from his pen. From 1885 till 1903 he shared the first violin desk of the Boston Orchestra with Franz Kneisel, the concertmaster. He then retired from the orchestra to devote himself to teaching and composition. Since 1910 Mr. Loeffler has lived on his farm at Medfield, and his life has been a plain one, devoted principally to creative work and a few favored pupils and companions.

* * *

When he came to America he brought with him an unusually wide experience and background and a culture exceptional among musicians—exceptional at least until those days of the late nineteenth century which saw the intimacy that developed between composers and men in other arts and letters in Paris. The significant consequence of that association, the group of composers headed by Debussy and d'Indy, then known as the modern French school. With the music of this period in France, and with musical associations of childhood years in Russia, Loeffler was deeply imbued. With modern literature, especially French literature and certain of the English and Irish poets and the American, Poe, he was especially sympathetic. The predilection of modern French composers of the Debussyan wing for modal harmony and for impressionistic effect was also felt by Loeffler, not in the spirit of imitation but with the consciousness of a young musician, coming from post-Wagnerian France, in a poetic and impressionable stage of development.

But Loeffler was never completely an impressionist, nor was he ever an unconditional Debussyite. His admiration for that master was passionate, but it was one phase of his receptivity and eclecticism. By the side of his inevitable response to the beauty to which Debussy pointed the way, witness Loeffler's devotion to plain chant and his profound admiration for the line, the form, of the austere and anti-impressionistic d'Indy.

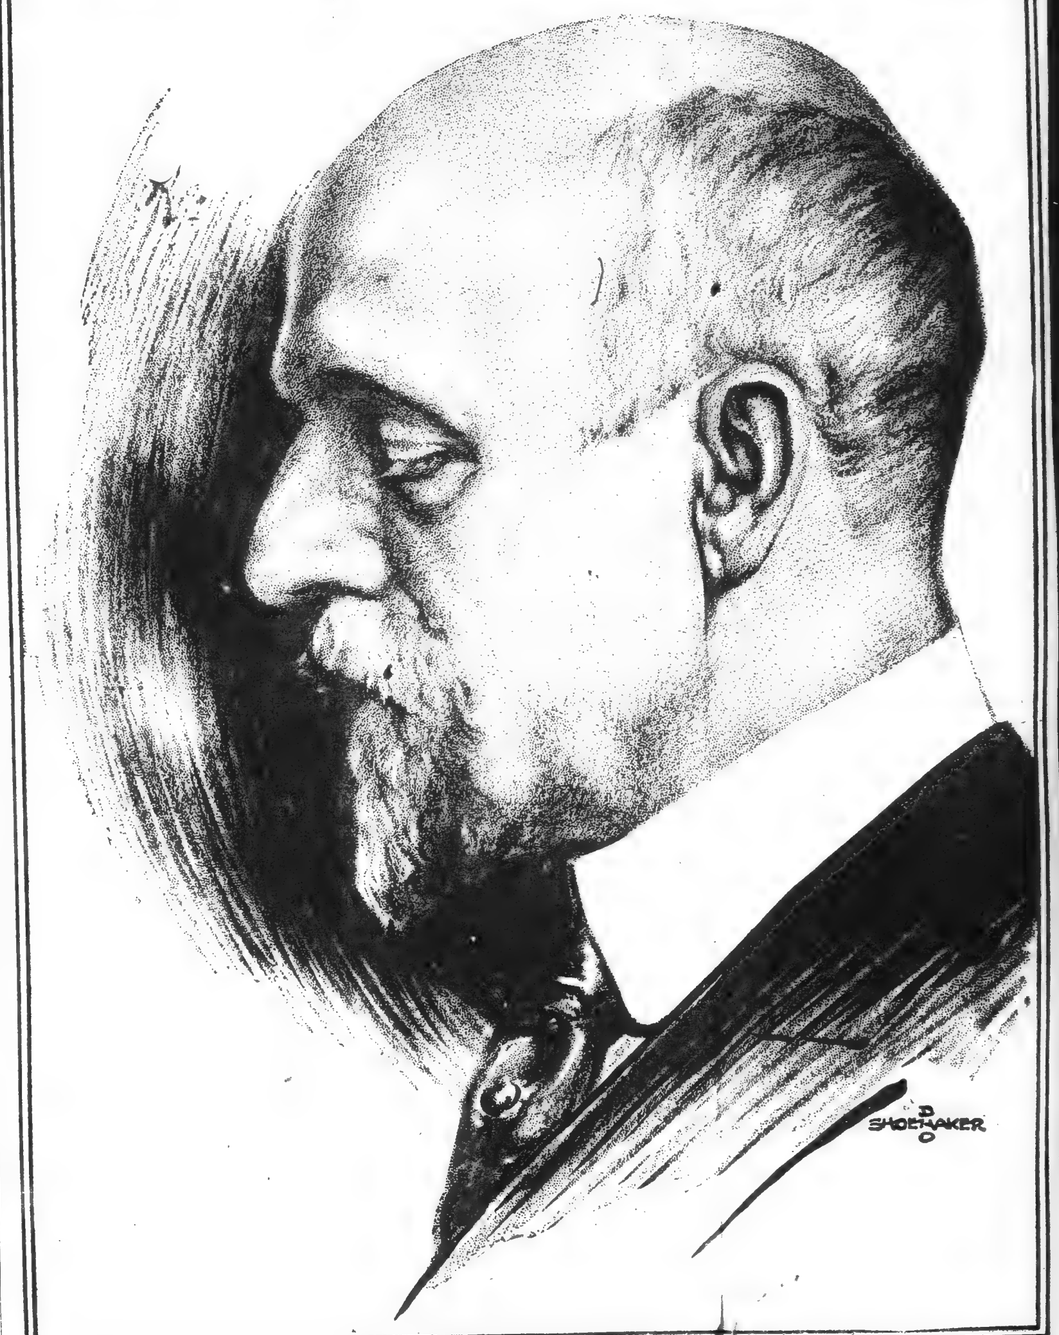
The works of d'Indy were attentively and comprehendingly regarded by Loeffler, who then proceeded to write a music of his own. Speaking now from the memory of some of his early chamber music and the magnificent evocations of the orchestra of "La Mort de Tintagiles," Loeffler's early phase appears to betoken a very beautiful flowering of youthful, romantic feeling. "La Mort de Tintagiles" has for us less the terror and the note of the macabre in Maeterlinck's text than it has the flavor of a romanticist's view of the drama. Let us put it another way: The Loeffler of "Mort de Tintagiles," with all its mystery, drama and orchestral splendor, is spiritually nearer "Der Freischütz" than he is to "Pelléas et Mélisande"! It is the romantic apprehension of night and the night's terror rather than that of the mystic or symbolist, which inspires these pages.

The date of "Mort de Tintagiles," the first version of the tone poem, was 1898. "La Villanelle du Diable," in which, when it is heard today, there might be a distant echo of Berlioz, is, however, in its irony and fantasy, a departure from what had preceded. In the "Pagan Poem" there is not only a greatly enriched technical procedure, but—a fact irrespective of the classic source of inspiration in an Eclogue of Vergil—an anticipation of the tendencies in music which have only become pronounced today. That is, a new emphasis of line and rhythm, a more classic and architectural spirit, and almost a volte-face from impressionism in the developments and the emotional vigor and glow of the music.

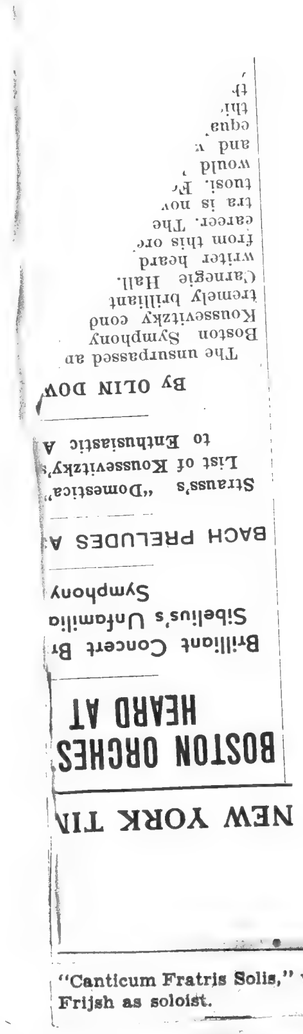
* * *

And here we are, inveterate in habits of discussion, attempting, long before it is possible or wise to do so, to estimate Mr. Loeffler's position as a composer! But after all, only to attempt to designate certain main lines of his progress.

"La Bonne Chanson," after Verlaine, and "La Villanelle du Diable" came in 1902, the "Pagan Poem" in 1907. Since that time Mr. Loeffler appears to have gone more in the direction of absolute music and away from dramatic or poetical inspirations for his works, with every year that passes. The "Hora Mystica" was one indication of this, the "Music for Four Stringed Instruments" another, and, as an earnest indication of artistic aims, even more significant. In the course of this progress Loeffler has kept clear of all the cynicism, the affectation and the materialistic spirit of so many of his contemporaries. While the young men prate of rhythm and line, and music freed from romantical dross, Loeffler, long since arrived at similar conclusions, says nothing, but writes singularly purified and masterly music. The trends of the last fifty years have been felt in his scores as in the scores of others, but they have been transfigured and alembicated in his music. He is one of the representative musicians of an age, but his expression of that age has come from within, and not, as an imitation of fads and shibboleths of the hour, from outside. From the very beginning of his creative career Loeffler has retained his conscience, his scorn of cheap or bad workmanship, his possibly extreme fastidiousness, and the passionate worship of the mystery of beauty which is part of himself. He has not had to follow the professed musical leaders of his period. He has kept his own counsel; he has let his period come to him, in terms of his own soul, and the mysterious art of music.



Charles Martin Loeffler. Whose "Pagan Poem" Will Be Played by Philharmonic This Week.



"Canticum Fratris Solis," with Povla Frijsh as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Strauss Group Interpreted

Two Bach Preludes Are Given on Boston Symphony Concert Program.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky came back to Carnegie Hall Friday evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This time the Russian maestro carried in his bag neither a new symphony of Roussel nor his characteristic readings of Tchaikowsky. On the contrary, he devoted himself to Sibelius and Richard Strauss, with two Bach preludes serving to begin the program.

Unlike our own town's group of official symphonists, the Bostonians have not come to suffer the distraction of changing conductors with the coming of each new moon; hence they have attained a singularly rare sense of unity and cooperation, like the football team (not to speak it profanely) that has played with the same coach each successive season.

Fills Current Demand

It was fulfilling a current demand when the orchestra set to work on Sibelius' seventh symphony. Indeed, this does not give us the Finnish genius at his best, but it certainly is a piece of contrapuntal skill worthy of one of the first symphony orchestras of our land. The immense, sweeping, epic, theme never escaped from Dr. Koussevitsky's grasp. He seemed to understand what each mark stood for, and there was hardly a phrase whose mould would not have suited this rugged, uncompromising composer who seems to utter here with Ibsen's Brand, "All or Nothing!"

Richard Strauss' tone-poems have received hereabouts a goodly portion of several symphonic programs. Dr. Koussevitsky represented him Friday evening with a work not so familiar with American audiences, namely, the "Symphonia Domestica." With his accustomed ingenuousness (recall "A Hero's Career," in which Herr Strauss permits muted trumpets to announce themes from his previous works, making it plain to all that he is the distraught Werther of the composition) Strauss announced to a London critic before he had published this work that it was a tone-picture of a day in his family life. Most any other composer would have bluffed a credulous public into believing that he was depicting the ideal conjugal pair, denying any personal element.

Private Affairs

Those of us who boast of polite manners have always wondered why Strauss has taken so many pages of excellent organ-point to tell us his private affairs, in which we are not half so interested as we are in his music. But since he tells it with a superb power for orchestration and no secrecy as to its sources (we detected a new scoop!—an operatic theme which appears to be something of a satire on his wife's singing talents, she being Pauline de Ahna, the chanteuse) well, then, let the pipes puff away.

As Mencken phrases it, writing of Frank Harris, "He is free from the vanity of modesty," which fits Strauss to the toe tips. And Dr. Koussevitsky conducted the work in a manner which makes us feel that in the Strauss household the tone-poet wears the pants!

—A. L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE

FEB 8 - 1931

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought his Boston Symphony orchestra to New York for its third pair of concerts this season, playing in Carnegie hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. At the first concert, the program included Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, the Seventh and latest symphony of Sibelius, and the Richard Strauss "Symphonia Domestica." For today's concert, Dr. Koussevitzky played the Stravinsky piano concerto with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and two preludes by Bach and the Strauss work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

FEB 8 1931

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, continuing their visit in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, gave us a single item of "novelty" upon which to focus what musical curiosity we could muster on such a preoccupied afternoon. This was an introduction and allegro for string orchestra by Sir Edward Elgar, a replacement on the classic front for those orchestral transcriptions from Bach played the evening before.

Any conclusive comment upon the Elgar music does not seem possible at this time. We would prefer to hear it again. It isn't so very new at that—not nearly as pristine and arousing as Richard Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, heard so seldom nowadays that it has become almost an innovation. Mr. Koussevitzky, repeating it yesterday, gave the Strauss scenario a finely etched but vivid performance. Herr Strauss meanders a bit and nods in his dramatic labors, but it is a work worthy of more frequent attention.

Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma again was the soloist in Stravinsky's rather windy and inane Capriccio. The audience's approval of Mr. Sanroma was whole-hearted, but opinions were scattered as to the merits of the Stravinsky effusion.

N.Y. WORLD
FEB. 8 Mu

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, continuing their visit in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, gave us a single item of "novelty" upon which to focus what musical curiosity we could muster on such a preoccupied afternoon. This was an introduction and allegro for string orchestra by Sir Edward Elgar, a replacement on the classic front for those orchestral transcriptions from Bach played the evening before.

Any conclusive comment upon the Elgar music does not seem possible at this time. We would prefer to hear it again. It isn't so very new at that—not nearly as pristine and arousing as Richard Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, heard so seldom nowadays that it has become almost an innovation. Mr. Koussevitzky, repeating it yesterday, gave the Strauss scenario a finely etched but vivid performance. Herr Strauss meanders a bit and nods in his dramatic labors, but it is a work worthy of more frequent attention.

Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma again was the soloist in Stravinsky's rather windy and inane Capriccio. The audience's approval of Mr. Sanroma was whole-hearted, but opinions were scattered as to the merits of the Stravinsky effusion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

1931

KOUSSEVITZKY HEARD AGAI

Conducts Boston Symphony Three Modern Works.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr Serge Koussevitzky conducting, pr sented a program of modern mus at Carnegie Hall yesterday afte noon. The three works on the li were chosen from as many countrie each composed by the dean of h school: Elgar's "Introduction an Allegro" for string orchestra, Op. 47 Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for pian and orchestra, with Jesús Marí Sanromá as the soloist, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," Op. 53. The Strauss music w-- also played by the orchestra Friday evening.

The music presented served once more to reveal the lyric gifts and splendid tone of the visitors, particularly in the infrequently heard Straussian forty-five-minute tonal history of connubial felicity and tribulation.

After the "Capriccio," the auditors recalled Mr. Sanromá, who played brilliantly and without notes on that occasion, and after the Strauss music the instrumentalists rose and shared the enthusiastic applause with the conductor.

N. Y. JOURNAL

FEB 9 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY, PHILHARMONIC PLAY

Both the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony Orchestras gave concerts over the week-end. Bernardino Molinari led the former yesterday at Carnegie Hall in repetitions from earlier programs, including the Beethoven C-minor symphony. Serge Koussevitzky directed the visitors, also chiefly in repetitions, but varied by Sir Edward Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro." Large audiences attended both concerts in spite of the weather.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

1931

Boston Orchestra Offers Second Concert of Week

Carnegie Hall Program Includes Sanroma as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its second concert of the week in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky's program was given over to compositions by three distinguished contemporary composers: the Introduction and Allegro, Op. 47, for string orchestra, of Elgar; Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." The Stravinsky work was introduced to local audiences on the occasion of the orchestra's last previous visit here. The soloist then, as yesterday, was Jesus Maria Sanroma. The Strauss symphony was part of last Thursday night's Boston Symphony program.

Elgar's Introduction and Allegro dates from 1905 and is based on a pseudo Welsh theme. It is undisturbing and mildly agreeable music which adds little to the composer's stature. It was well played, though not without some cloudiness in the fugato passages. The Stravinsky Capriccio, too, is one of the Russian master's lesser contributions. Mr. Sanroma again played with aplomb and elegance. After these somewhat trivial pieces, the Strauss "Domestica" loomed large. It was brilliantly and persuasively set forth. The applause was moderated.

J. D. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

1931

A MUSICAL INDICTMENT

A REPORTER of Richmond claims to have elicited an opinion from the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which fails to fit the facts. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is quoted to the effect that Philadelphia audiences are "more attuned to the martial music of Sousa's band than to that of a symphony orchestra."

How may the truth be determined in a matter of such moment? We submit two arguments that must be considered, even at the expense of a distinguished musician's standing as a critic of sound judgment. Philadelphia, though tuned to martial music, sponsors the finest symphony orchestra in America. Secondly, this city is not content with a single instrument of symphonic music but has recently welcomed a new orchestral organization which proposes to play something besides martial marches to appreciative audiences. And there may be added the testimony of last summer's concerts in Robin Hood Dell, which were every whit as well patronized by Philadelphians as Sousa and his band in Willow Grove Park.

There is no need to deprecate the taste for the sounding brass, the drum and cymbals and the rousing rhythms of a full-blown band. These also make music which can lift the hair, stir the soul and shake the diaphragm. But it is very near to nonsense to say that Philadelphia likes nothing else or that its tastes are "attuned" to a more popular and less esthetic pitch than those of other cities. Not even Boston has the right to think or say so.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

1931

A CORRECTION

[Telegram]

To the Editor of the Evening Ledger:

Sir—Statements attributed to me editorial EVENING LEDGER February nine incorrect. I saw no reporters and gave no interviews in Richmond. Will greatly appreciate correction.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Boston, Mass.

The editorial in question was based on an alleged interview published in a Richmond newspaper, which included the statements quoted. To "add artistic verisimilitude" the article was accompanied by photographs. We regret that the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was misquoted and misrepresented, and that we were misled by an apparently authentic interview.—The Editor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

1931

Other Music

Boston Symphony, Roxy Concert and Segovia's Guitar

THE excellent playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon had the curious effect of revealing the relative inferiority of three compositions of three contemporary composers.

The first was Elgar's Introduction and Allegro, Op. 47, for String Orchestra. This is a work nicely wrought and pleasant to hear and wholly unexciting. To Ernest Newman, formerly a "guest" music critic for this newspaper, Sir Edward Elgar remarked that the main theme was a pseudo-Welsh tune, which came to him as a result of hearing some singing at a distance in Wales. The work is dedicated to a friend, Professor S. S. Sanford, Yale University. The orchestration is centered on a string quartet and there are solo parts, all taken with distinction on Saturday.

The Stravinsky Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra was the second number. This had been played at a recent concert by the Boston visitors, and again the soloist was Jesus Maria Sanroma. Here also the impression was that soloist and orchestra were giving a prodigiously expert performance of a piece extremely brilliant and vigorous, although of no large importance.

The third number was the Strauss Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53. More orchestral opulence here, and plenty to interest, if indeed little to enthrall, an audience.

The fifth "dollar" concert at the ...eatre yesterday morning was ... some of the mightiest ... Wagner's greatest ... a large audience ... much

THIS CLIPPING FR...
NEW YORK SUN

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Stravinsky's Work

The tonal splendors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again resounded through Carnegie Hall Saturday, when Dr. Koussevitzky gave the organization's matinee concert and with a large audience in attendance. The program comprised Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro" for string orchestra, opus 47, first announced for Friday evening's concert, but finally not played; Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist, and the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss, which was repeated from the orchestra's program of the evening before.

The Stravinsky work, which Mr. Koussevitzky had introduced to America, was given in New York by his orchestra last month at its evening concert, with Mr. Sanroma, then as now, the pianist. The Elgar introduction and allegro, which is seldom heard here, was composed a quarter of a century and more ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 14 1931

Bach Festival To Be Held In Boston on March 24-29

College Societies to Participate in Symphony Program

As a special feature of its fiftieth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Bach festival under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, through the following Sunday, March 29. The program for March 25 will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder, Major Henry L. Higginson. Bliss Perry will deliver a memorial address.

Participants with the Boston Symphony in this festival include the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata Club of Boston; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Regina Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

Bach's B minor Mass is scheduled both for March 24 and 28. On March 25, besides Professor Perry's address, the program includes organ and harpsichord numbers. On March 26 the second Brandenburg concerto, first orchestral suite, D minor piano concerto and the Magnificat will be heard; on the afternoon of March 27 the third orchestral suite, concerto for two violins and cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit." On Saturday evening, March 28, the cantatas "Christus lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein feste Burg," fifth Brandenburg concerto and piano numbers will be performed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 14 1931

Boston Will Have Bach Music Series

Symphony Orchestra to Celebrate Half Century Season With Festival Opening March 24

A Bach festival to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Programs.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the Festival on Tuesday (March 24), and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, Soprano, Margaret Matzenauer, Mezzo-Soprano, Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, Baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for Two Violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D. minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory, and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Anniversary Year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
Saturday Theatre Review

BACH FESTIVAL WILL BE HELD IN BOSTON ON MARCH 24-29

College Societies to Participate in Symphony Program

As a special feature of its fiftieth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Bach festival under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, through the following Sunday, March 29. The program for March 25 will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder, Major Henry L. Higginson. Bliss Perry will deliver a memorial address.

Participants with the Boston Symphony in this festival include the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata, of Boston; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Regina Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

Bach's B minor Mass is scheduled both for March 24 and 28. On March 25, Besides Professor Perry's address, the program includes organ and harpsichord numbers. On March 26 the second Brandenburg concerto, first orchestral suite, D minor piano concerto and the Magnificat will be heard; on the afternoon of March 27 the third orchestral suite, concerto for two violins and cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit." On Saturday evening, March 28, the cantatas "Christus lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein feste Burg," fifth Brandenburg concerto and piano numbers will be performed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

1931

Strauss Group Interpreted

Two Bach Preludes Are Given on Boston Symphony Concert Program.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky came back to Carnegie Hall Friday evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This time the Russian maestro carried in his bag neither a new symphony of Roussel nor his characteristic readings of Tchaikowsky. On the contrary, he devoted himself to Sibelius and Richard Strauss, with two Bach preludes serving to begin the program.

Unlike our own town's group of official symphonists, the Bostonians have not come to suffer the distraction of changing conductors with the coming of each new moon; hence they have attained a singularly rare sense of unity and cooperation, like the football team (not to speak it profanely) that has played with the same coach each successive season.

Fills Current Demand

It was fulfilling a current demand when the orchestra set to work on Sibelius' seventh symphony. Indeed, this does not give us the Finnish genius at his best, but it certainly is a piece of contrapuntal skill worthy of one of the first symphony orchestras of our land. The immense, sweeping, epic, theme never escaped from Dr. Koussevitsky's grasp. He seemed to understand what each mark stood for, and there was hardly a phrase whose mould would not have suited this rugged, uncompromising composer who seems to utter here with Ibsen's Brand, "All or Nothing!"

Richard Strauss' tone-poems have received hereabouts a goodly portion of several symphonic programs. Dr. Koussevitsky represented him Friday evening with a work not so familiar with American audiences, namely, the "Symphonia Domestica." With his accustomed ingenuousness (recall "A Hero's Career," in which Herr Strauss permits muted trumpets to announce themes from his previous works, making it plain to all that he is the distraught Werther of the composition) Strauss announced to a London critic before he had published this work that it was a tone picture of a day in his family life. Most any other composer would have bluffed a credulous public into believing that he was depicting the ideal conjugal pair, denying any personal element.

Private Affairs

Those of us who boast of polite manners have always wondered why Strauss has taken so many pages of excellent organ-point to tell us his private affairs, in which we are not half so interested as we are in his music. But since he tells it with a superb power for orchestration and no secrecy as to its sources (we detected a new scoop!—an operatic theme which appears to be something of a satire on his wife's singing talents, she being Pauline de Ahna, the chanteuse) well, then, let the pipes puff away.

As Mencken phrases it, writing of Frank Harris, "He is free from the vanity of modesty," which fits Strauss to the toe tips. And Dr. Koussevitsky conducted the work in a manner which makes us feel that in the Strauss household the tone-poet wears the pants!

—A. L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE

FEB 8 - 1931

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought his Boston Symphony orchestra to New York for its third pair of concerts this season, playing in Carnegie hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. At the first concert, the program included Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, the Seventh and latest symphony of Sibelius, and the Richard Strauss "Symphonia Domestica." For today's concert, Dr. Koussevitzky played the Stravinsky piano concerto with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and two preludes by Bach and the Strauss work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. MORN. WORLD

FEB 8 1931

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, continuing their visit in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, gave us a single item of "novelty" upon which to focus what musical curiosity we could muster on such a preoccupied afternoon. This was an introduction and allegro for string orchestra by Sir Edward Elgar, a replacement on the classic front for those orchestral transcriptions from Bach played the evening before.

Any conclusive comment upon the Elgar music does not seem possible at this time. We would prefer to hear it again. It isn't so very new at that—not nearly as pristine and arousing as Richard Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, heard so seldom nowadays that it has become almost an innovation. Mr. Koussevitzky, repeating it yesterday, gave the Strauss scenario a finely etched but vivid performance. Herr Strauss meanders a bit and nods in his dramatic labors, but it is a work worthy of more frequent attention.

Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma again was the soloist in Stravinsky's rather windy and inane Capriccio. The audience's approval of Mr. Sanroma was whole-hearted, but opinions were scattered as to the merits of the Stravinsky effusion.

N.Y. WORLD
FEB. 8 - Mu

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, continuing their visit in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, gave us a single item of "novelty" upon which to focus what musical curiosity we could muster on such a preoccupied afternoon. This was an introduction and allegro for string orchestra by Sir Edward Elgar, a replacement on the classic front for those orchestral transcriptions from Bach played the evening before.

Any conclusive comment upon the Elgar music does not seem possible at this time. We would prefer to hear it again. It isn't so very new at that—not nearly as pristine and arousing as Richard Strauss's Symphonia Domestica, heard so seldom nowadays that it has become almost an innovation. Mr. Koussevitzky, repeating it yesterday, gave the Strauss scenario a finely etched but vivid performance. Herr Strauss meanders a bit and nods in his dramatic labors, but it is a work worthy of more frequent attention.

Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma again was the soloist in Stravinsky's rather windy and inane Capriccio. The audience's approval of Mr. Sanroma was whole-hearted, but opinions were scattered as to the merits of the Stravinsky effusion.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

1931

KOUSSEVITZKY HEARD AGAI

Conducts Boston Symphony Three Modern Works.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr Serge Koussevitzky conducting, pr sented a program of modern mus at Carnegie Hall yesterday afte noon. The three works on the li were chosen from as many countrie each composed by the dean of h school: Elgar's "Introduction an Allegro" for string orchestra, Op. 47 Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for pian and orchestra, with Jesús Marí Sanromá as the soloist, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," Op. 53. The Strauss music w-- also played by the orchestra Friday evening.

The music presented served once more to reveal the lyric gifts and splendid tone of the visitors, particularly in the infrequently heard Straussian forty-five-minute tonal history of connubial felicity and tribulation.

After the "Capriccio," the auditors recalled Mr. Sanromá, who played brilliantly and without notes on that occasion, and after the Strauss music the instrumentalists rose and shared the enthusiastic applause with the conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

FEB 9 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY,
PHILHARMONIC PLAY

Both the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony Orchestras gave concerts over the week-end. Bernardino Molinari led the former yesterday at Carnegie Hall in repetitions from earlier programs, including the Beethoven C-minor symphony. Serge Koussevitzky directed the visitors, also chiefly in repetitions, but varied by Sir Edward Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro." Large audiences attended both concerts in spite of the weather.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

1931

Boston Orchestra Offers Second Concert of Week

Carnegie Hall Program Includes Sanroma as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its second concert of the week in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky's program was given over to compositions by three distinguished contemporary composers: the Introduction and Allegro, Op. 47, for string orchestra, of Elgar; Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, and Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica." The Stravinsky work was introduced to local audiences on the occasion of the orchestra's last previous visit here. The soloist then, as yesterday, was Jesus Maria Sanroma. The Strauss symphony was part of last Thursday night's Boston Symphony program.

Elgar's Introduction and Allegro dates from 1905 and is based on a pseudo Welsh theme. It is undisturbing and mildly agreeable music which adds little to the composer's stature. It was well played, though not without some cloudiness in the fugato passages. The Stravinsky Capriccio, too, is one of the Russian master's lesser contributions. Mr. Sanroma again played with aplomb and elegance. After these somewhat trivial pieces, the Strauss "Domestica" loomed large. It was brilliantly and persuasively set forth. The applause was moderate.

J. D. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

1931

A MUSICAL INDICTMENT

A REPORTER of Richmond claims to have elicited an opinion from the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which fails to fit the facts. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is quoted to the effect that Philadelphia audiences are "more attuned to the martial music of Sousa's band than to that of a symphony orchestra."

How may the truth be determined in a matter of such moment? We submit two arguments that must be considered, even at the expense of a distinguished musician's standing as a critic of sound judgment. Philadelphia, though tuned to martial music, sponsors the finest symphony orchestra in America. Secondly, this city is not content with a single instrument of symphonic music but has recently welcomed a new orchestral organization which proposes to play something besides martial marches to appreciative audiences. And there may be added the testimony of last summer's concerts in Robin Hood Dell, which were every whit as well patronized by Philadelphians as Sousa and his band in Willow Grove Park.

There is no need to deprecate the taste for the sounding brass, the drum and cymbals and the rousing rhythms of a full-blown band. These also make music which can lift the hair, stir the soul and shake the diaphragm. But it is very near to nonsense to say that Philadelphia likes nothing else or that its tastes are "attuned" to a more popular and less esthetic pitch than those of other cities. Not even Boston has the right to think or say so.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

MAR 2 1931

A CORRECTION

[Telegram]

To the Editor of the Evening Ledger:

Sir—Statements attributed to me editorial EVENING LEDGER February nine incorrect. I saw no reporters and gave no interviews in Richmond. Will greatly appreciate correction.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Boston, Mass.

The editorial in question was based on an alleged interview published in a Richmond newspaper, which included the statements quoted. To "add artistic verisimilitude" the article was accompanied by photographs. We regret that the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was misquoted and misrepresented, and that we were misled by an apparently authentic interview.—The Editor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

1931

Other Music

Boston Symphony, Roxy Concert and Segovia's Guitar

THE excellent playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon had the curious effect of revealing the relative inferiority of three compositions of three contemporary composers.

The first was Elgar's Introduction and Allegro, Op. 47, for String Orchestra. This is a work nicely wrought and pleasant to hear and wholly unexciting. To Ernest Newman, formerly a "guest" music critic for this newspaper, Sir Edward Elgar remarked that the main theme was a pseudo-Welsh tune, which came to him as a result of hearing some singing at a distance in Wales. The work is dedicated to a friend, Professor S. S. Sanford, Yale University. The orchestration is centered on a string quartet and there are solo parts, all taken with distinction on Saturday.

The Stravinsky Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra was the second number. This had been played at a recent concert by the Boston visitors, and again the soloist was Jesus Maria Sanroma. Here also the impression was that soloist and orchestra were giving a prodigiously expert performance of a piece extremely brilliant and vigorous, although of no large importance.

The third number was the Strauss Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53. More orchestral opulence here, and plenty to interest, if indeed little to enthrall, an audience.

The fifth "dollar" concert at the ...eatre yesterday morning was some of the mightiest ...Wagner's greatest ...a large audience much

THIS CLIPPING FR...
NEW YORK SUN

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Stravinsky's Work

The tonal splendors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again resounded through Carnegie Hall Saturday, when Dr. Koussevitzky gave the organization's matinee concert and with a large audience in attendance. The program comprised Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro" for string orchestra, opus 47, first announced for Friday evening's concert, but finally not played; Stravinsky's capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist, and the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss, which was repeated from the orchestra's program of the evening before.

The Stravinsky work, which Mr. Koussevitzky had introduced to America, was given in New York by his orchestra last month at its evening concert, with Mr. Sanroma, then as now, the pianist. The Elgar introduction and allegro, which is seldom heard here, was composed a quarter of a century and more ago. Well written, but rather dull to hear, the score was played under Dr. Koussevitzky's searching baton in a highly finished style.

As a special feature of its ... season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Bach festival under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, through the following Sunday, March 29. The program for March 25 will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder, Major Henry L. Higginson. Bliss Perry will deliver a memorial address.

Participants with the Boston Symphony in this festival include the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata Club of Boston; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Regina Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

Bach's B minor Mass is scheduled both for March 24 and 28. On March 25, besides Professor Perry's address, the program includes organ and harpsichord numbers. On March 26 the second Brandenburg concerto, first orchestral suite, D minor piano concerto and the Magnificat will be heard; on the afternoon of March 27 the third orchestral suite, concerto for two violins and cantatas "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit." On Saturday evening, March 28, the cantatas "Christus lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein feste Burg," fifth Brandenburg concerto and piano numbers will be performed.

121

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 14 1931

Boston Will Have Bach Music Series

Symphony Orchestra to Celebrate Half Century Season With Festival Opening March 24

A Bach festival to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Programs.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the Festival on Tuesday (March 24), and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, Soprano, Margaret Matzenauer, Mezzo-Soprano, Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, Baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for Two Violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D. minor, and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-tempered Chlavichord." Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory, and formerly organist with this orchestra.

Anniversary Year.

Other events of the fiftieth anniversary season have been the first performances of scores written especially for the Orchestra by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas, Respighi, and also the American composers, Copland, Hill, Carpenter, and Hanson. A Beethoven festival was given in the nation's capital last December. The jubilee season was opened by Sir George Henschel, the orchestra's first conductor, who repeated the original program of 50 years ago.

...following Sunday, March 29. The program for March 25 will be dedicated to the memory of the orchestra's founder, Major Henry L. Higginson. Bliss Perry will deliver a memorial address.

Participants with the Boston Symphony in this festival include the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Bach Cantata, of Boston; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, pianist; Regina Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichordist, and Wallace Goodrich, organist.

Bach's B minor Mass is scheduled both for March 24 and 28. On March 25, Besides Professor Perry's address, the program includes organ and harpsichord numbers. On March 26 the second Brandenburg concerto, first orchestral suite, D minor piano concerto and the Magnificat will be heard; on the afternoon of March 27 the third orchestral suite, concerto for two violins and cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit." On Saturday evening, March 28, the cantatas "Christus lag in Todesbanden" and "Ein feste Burg," fifth Brandenburg concerto and piano numbers will be performed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
2 14 1931

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

SOME years ago—never mind just when; dates are dry food—Arthur Whiting, musician, composer, scholar and observer, gave a musical party. It was a coming-out party. The debutant was not a fair maiden, but a group of songs. The place was the Whiting studio. About thirty men gathered in the room. There were fire light, the dull glow of lamps and the enshrouding veil of fragrant tobacco smoke. Before the songs were sung Vincent D'Indy, composer of the "Ishtar," variations and high priest of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, read with elegant diction the texts by Paul Verlaine, from which the songs were made. Then we heard the music.

Francis Rogers sang the lyrics, Arthur Whiting played the piano, and the composer of the songs played the viola obbligato. After the group had been revealed to us, we had an interval for conversation, beer, sandwiches and continued smoke. Then we resumed our seats and the songs were sung again. It was in the intermission that Walter Damrosch said to his brother:

"Frank, this man Loeffler has something that the rest of them have not."

And that was straight talk. It took many of them years to find it out and there are dullards in the world of music who do not know it yet. However, there are celebrations just now because Charles Martin Loeffler has attained the Biblical three score and ten. He has been dwelling for several years in the seclusion of his home in Medford, Mass., but Boston, which knew him when he sat at the first desk of its great orchestra beside Franz Kneisel, has drawn him out of his den and turned the white light of its approbation upon him.

What Walter Damrosch said was the pith of the whole matter. Loeffler is one of the composers who was developed under the spread of the Debussy influence of music. Loeffler's art is inconceivable except as part of the beginning of the modernist advance. But it is none the less strikingly original and distinguished by certain qualities of imaginative creation and by aristocracy of style. Loeffler, the reflective, introspective and highly cultivated man, the student of Vergil and Horace, the lover of long natural vistas and of the thoughts of men, speaks in every work, whether it be the "Death of Tintagiles," the "Pagan Poem" or the "Villanelle du Diable."

It is fitting that this musician should be honored by his fellows. He has lived in this country many years and is an American citizen. He was born and studied abroad, but he is thoroughly Americanized. He is at any rate the foremost composer in this country. More than that, he is one of the foremost composers of his time. The world of music, not only here but across the seas, has reason to be proud of him.

* * *

A Word to Wise Fiddlers.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra has a remarkable history. Older music lovers will recall the seasons when at the first two desks sat Kneisel and Loeffler, Tim Adamowski and Otto Roth, all of whom appeared at various times as solo artists at concerts of the organization. On one occasion Mr. Loeffler was not only soloist, but composer. This was at the fourth concert of the twelfth season of the orchestra in this city. It was in the Metropolitan Opera House. The program comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mr. Loeffler's divertimento for violin and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, the customary three excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade." Mr. Loeffler was the soloist in his own work. Mr. Kneisel played the solos in the Rimsky-Korsakov music.

Just why violinists, who are none too well supplied with material, do not examine this piece is a subject for wonder. It is not one of Mr. Loeffler's loftiest creations, but it is distinctly good violin stuff and grateful for the soloist. It is in three movements, preamble, "Eclogue" (the classic view of the composer already characteristic) and "Carnival des Mortes." This finale is a set of brilliant variations on the "Dies Irae." The composition is rich in melody, color and effective orchestration.

It is crowded with difficulties and perhaps in these days might be rudely pushed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso piece, but since violinists persistently perform compositions which have only technical displays to recommend them, this divertimento of Loeffler, which is also good music, might be worth at least one hearing. It is not necessary to descant upon the merits of the composer's better known works. They deserve to enjoy a long period of active life. They possess individuality and musical beauty of a high order.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB

* * *

Arthur Honneger's new symphony, written especially for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony orchestram, was given its first performance under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction last evening in Boston. On the same program was Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and "Canticum Fratis Solis" with Povla Frijsh as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
FEB 15 1931

In a visit to New York the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, has played Strauss' "Domestic" Symphony, Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, Stravinsky's "Capriccio" and Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN
FEB 18 1931

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL REACHES 81ST BIRTHDAY

London, Feb. 18—(AP)— Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 years of age today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 15 1931

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Judging by various criticisms in last week's papers and the letter published in yesterday's TIMES there seems to be an awakening as to the Toscanini-Molinari régime and the poor programs that have been offered by these gentlemen.

It might be interesting for these masters of the baton to know that the audience they play to knows good music when they hear it and do not want to be fed on a lot of Italian sugar-water, but are used to stronger things and should be allowed to hear some Bruckner, Mahler, Bloch, Reger and numerous other great composers who never appear on Philharmonic programs.

No one doubts the genius of Toscanini, but this position entails obligations to give the public the best in music. Mr. Koussevitzky is the only conductor whose programs seem to be entirely satisfactory, and whose concerts this season are the only ones which I have thoroughly enjoyed.

J. S. WOLF.

New York, Feb. 9, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
FEB 15 1931

* * *

Another orchestral visitor from out-of-town to treat New York symphony lovers to an unusually brilliant concert, recently, was the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. In fact, the occasion was marked by one of the most brilliant performances ever heard here from this organization, and the audience quick to grasp unusual merit, not only applauded enthusiastically throughout but cheered as well.

This time, Mr. Koussevitzky did not introduce any new works but, nevertheless, his offerings were of unusual interest. The program opened with two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli [illegible] by the litt[illegible] symphony [illegible] Strauss, "Sin[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
FEB 12 1931

HENSCHEL EIGHTY-ONE.

First Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Still Young.

LONDON, Feb. 19 (AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is eighty-one years old Wednesday, but still young and healthy." He recalled the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations." It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight [illegible] is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
FEB 18 1931

SIR HENSCHEL 81

London, Feb. 18 (AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty years.

Essen, Max [illegible] conductor [illegible] Orchestra, [illegible] ams program

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 15 1931

NEWLY RECORDED MUSIC

Elman Plays Tchaikovsky Concerto—Koussevitzky Conducts Ravel's 'Mother Goose'

By COMPTON PAKENHAM.

DROPPING back a few numbers to fill out the blanks, Victor's repressing of the Tchaikovsky violin concerto in D (Op. 35), by Mischa Elman and the London Symphony Orchestra, under John Barbirolli, which has been on the imported list for some months, is now issued as Masterpiece No. 79.

As is only to be expected, the one-time prodigy performs extraordinary feats with the concerto, originally dedicated to his late master, Leopold Auer, declined by him without thanks, and later transferred to Adolph Brodsky. In fact, the four records included in the album are so completely dominated by Mischa Elman, that the Barbirolli who has frequently contributed such excellently balanced recordings to the H. M. V. list—his "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart was included in the special release of Victor which came out in November—is left very much in the background. To be exact, over a couple of stretches he is found struggling bravely, and with quick success, to catch up with his meteoric soloist.

It is probably inevitable that this should be so, but surely some adjustment might have been made whereby the Elman stature could have been reduced and the general perspective straightened out. It should not have been difficult to increase the size of the instruments handed out to the orchestra until they were even half the size of Elman's giant fiddle. The pity for this is greater on account of the obvious excellence of what is going on behind the soloist. Barbirolli gives part of the first movement a triumphant swing which sounds new to us, and between them he and Elman have managed to make the whole work sound as though it was a far greater matter than it is—or we had suspected. As compared with the Bronislaw Hubermann version—with the Berlin State Orchestra under Wilhelm Steinberg—(Columbia Masterworks No. 131), the solo part is suaver, more fruity and with little of Hubermann's savagery in it.

A colorful exhibition which shows Elman from several angles, at times a rousing performance of a composition which starts out right stoutly, but before it has run its course seems to lose itself in uncharted futility with the predominant idea of giving as many opportunities as possible for display.

* * *

On two loose records in the same list Victor gives us Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Ravel's "Ma mère l'Oye" (Mother Goose) suite, a comparatively familiar collection of five "Pièces Enfantines" (7370-1). Dating from a year or so before 1910, during which the suite was played as a four-hand piano piece at a concert of the Société Musicale Indépendante by two performers, whose united ages added up to sixteen years, Mother Goose received her first ballet performance with orchestra in January, 1912, at the Théâtre des Arts, Paris.

Adhering strictly to a program, the pieces derive from the tales familiar in every nursery. There is the pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, a dainty, dignified dance suggesting mystery; the Tom Thumb episode, in which the diminutive hero, hoping to find his way home by following the trail of bread crumbs he has dropped but which the birds have eaten up, wanders fearfully in circles; the serenade to Laideronette in her bath, played by the Pagodes, little china figurines inlaid with precious stones, who use instruments built to scale; the conversation of Beauty and the Beast, a dialogue between clarinet and contrabassoon, and finally the Fairy Garden, in which Prince Charming finds and wakes the sleeper, to the obvious joy of all the characters concerned.

How define the qualities that go to make up sound, pregnant nonsense? Mere double entente, of which incidentally we can remember no musical example, is not the way to the hearts of children from one to 100; for the wide-eyed infant who has not as yet overlaid its natural intuition with the smartness which eventually may grow to wisdom can run rings around the man of the world in the matter of sophistication.

As would-be imitators have found to their surprised chagrin, the Anderson-Carroll-Barrie-Milne tradition fails to respond when attempts are made to reduce it to a table of rules of technique. Musically, the problem becomes still more complicated. The makers of the old English pantomime dodged the issue with doubtful success. They tried to compromise by amusing the youngsters with the sight of familiar figures in the flesh and lavish spectacles, while entertaining the less critical portion of the audience with a series of current popular ditties which they prayed the kids might not understand. How many children have been caught humming the airs they have just heard in a performance of "Hänsel und Gretel"? Fraser Simpson's settings to the Christopher Robin and Pooh songs second the lyrics admirably, but away from them would they have any particular significance?

Unhampered by words, or without suggestive lyrics to help him, Ravel's task came into an only related class and, to one who met Mother Goose somewhat late in life, he has succeeded in conveying the delicate spirit of his subjects. Laideronette's miniature orchestra (its instruments were fashioned from such odds and ends as nutshells) plays music that might be expected from it, and the growling voice of the Beast is enough in itself to have repelled the object of his affections. Only in the finale does the music threaten to leave the setting in an orchestral deluge, and it is only there that it fails to convince.

Koussevitzky and the recording staff have done excellently by this material. Clarity is essential to such a performance and, helped by the essential simplicity of the score, the detail throughout is as close to perfection as we can expect at present. The Fairy Garden does give the impression of being played by another orchestra.

Previous recordings of Mother Goose are by Albert Coates and orchestra (H. M. V.) and Walter Damrosch with the old New York Symphony Orchestra in Columbia Masterworks No. 74. This, which runs to five sides, will be kept, despite the new arrival, if only for the reason that on the odd face is the same orchestra in a trifle of Pierné's—the entirely delightful "Entrance of the Little Fauns."

Photo by A B C News Service.

Serge Koussevitzky, Who Conducts Ravel's "Mother Goose" in Recent Recording.

The new Segovia recording—Torroba's Preludio and Fandanguillo (Victor 1487)—compares well with his first surprising releases. Then the discovery that the solo guitar could be made to do so much and could be handled in such a manner as to record so satisfactorily came as a revelation to many, and the wonder lasts. Would it be too much to suggest another couple from Bach?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was the biographer and close friend of Major Higginson, will then make an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
FEB 15 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

2 14 1931

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

SOME years ago—never mind just when; dates are dry food—Arthur Whiting, musician, composer, scholar and observer, gave a musical party. It was a coming-out party. The debutant was not a fair maiden, but a group of songs. The place was the Whiting studio. About thirty men gathered in the room. There were fire light, the dull glow of lamps and the enshrouding veil of fragrant tobacco smoke. Before the songs were sung Vincent D'Indy, composer of the "Ishtar," variations and high priest of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, read with elegant diction the texts by Paul Verlaine, from which the songs were made. Then we heard the music.

Francis Rogers sang the lyrics, Arthur Whiting played the piano, and the composer of the songs played the viola obbligato. After the group had been revealed to us, we had an interval for conversation, beer, sandwiches and continued smoke. Then we resumed our seats and the songs were sung again. It was in the intermission that Walter Damrosch said to his brother:

"Frank, this man Loeffler has something that the rest of them have not."

And that was straight talk. It took many of them years to find it out and there are dullards in the world of music who do not know it yet. However, there are celebrations just now because Charles Martin Loeffler has attained the Biblical three score and ten. He has been dwelling for several years in the seclusion of his home in Medford, Mass., but Boston, which knew him when he sat at the first desk of its great orchestra beside Franz Kneisel, has drawn him out of his den and turned the white light of its approbation upon him.

What Walter Damrosch said was the pith of the whole matter. Loeffler is one of the composers who was developed under the spread of the Debussy influence of music. Loeffler's art is inconceivable except as part of the beginning of the modernist advance. But it is none the less strikingly original and distinguished by certain qualities of imaginative creation and by aristocracy of style. Loeffler, the reflective, introspective and highly cultivated man, the student of Vergil and Horace, the lover of long natural vistas and of the thoughts of men, speaks in every work, whether it be the "Death of Tintagiles," the "Pagan Poem" or the "Villanelle du Diable."

It is fitting that this musician should be honored by his fellows. He has lived in this country many years and is an American citizen. He was born and studied abroad, but he is thoroughly Americanized. He is at any rate the foremost composer in this country. More than that, he is one of the foremost composers of his time. The world of music, not only here but across the seas, has reason to be proud of him.

* * *

A Word to Wise Fiddlers.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra has a remarkable history. Older music lovers will recall the seasons when at the first two desks sat Kneisel and Loeffler, Tim Adamowski and Otto Roth, all of whom appeared at various times as solo artists at concerts of the organization. On one occasion Mr. Loeffler was not only soloist, but composer. This was at the fourth concert of the twelfth season of the orchestra in this city. It was in the Metropolitan Opera House. The program comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mr. Loeffler's divertimento for violin and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, the customary three excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade." Mr. Loeffler was the soloist in his own work. Mr. Kneisel played the solos in the Rimsky-Korsakov music.

Just why violinists, who are none too well supplied with material, do not examine this piece is a subject for wonder. It is not one of Mr. Loeffler's loftiest creations, but it is distinctly good violin stuff and grateful for the soloist. It is in three movements, preamble, "Eclogue" (the classic view of the composer already characteristic) and "Carnival des Mortes." This finale is a set of brilliant variations on the "Dies Irae." The composition is rich in melody, color and effective orchestration.

It is crowded with difficulties and perhaps in these days might be rudely pushed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso piece, but since violinists persistently perform compositions which have only technical displays to recommend them, this divertimento of Loeffler, which is also good music, might be worth at least one hearing. It is not necessary to descant upon the merits of the composer's better known works. They deserve to enjoy a long period of active life. They possess individuality and musical beauty of a high order.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 15 1931

NEWLY RECORDED MUSIC

Elman Plays Tchaikovsky Concerto—Koussevitzky Conducts Ravel's 'Mother Goose'

By COMPTON PAKENHAM.

DROPPING back a few numbers to fill out the blanks, Victor's repressing of the Tchaikovsky violin concerto in D (Op. 35), by Mischa Elman and the London Symphony Orchestra, under John Barbirolli, which has been on the imported list for some months, is now issued as Masterpiece No. 79.

As is only to be expected, the one-time prodigy performs extraordinary feats with the concerto, originally dedicated to his late master, Leopold Auer, declined by him without thanks, and later transferred to Adolph Brodsky. In fact, the four records included in the album are so completely dominated by Mischa Elman, that the Barbirolli who has frequently contributed such excellently balanced recordings to the H. M. V. list—his "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart was included in the special release of Victor which came out in November—is left very much in the background. To be exact, over a couple of stretches he is found struggling bravely, and with quick success, to catch up with his meteoric soloist.

It is probably inevitable that this should be so, but surely some adjustment might have been made whereby the Elman stature could have been reduced and the general perspective straightened out. It should not have been difficult to increase the size of the instruments handed out to the orchestra until they were even half the size of Elman's giant fiddle. The pity for this is greater on account of the obvious excellence of what is going on behind the soloist. Barbirolli gives part of the first movement a triumphant swing which sounds new to us, and between them he and Elman have managed to make the whole work sound as though it was a far greater matter than it is—or we had suspected. As compared with the Bronislaw Hubermann version—with the Berlin State Orchestra under Wilhelm Steinberg—(Columbia Masterworks No. 131), the solo part is suaver, more fruity and with little of Hubermann's savagery in it.

A colorful exhibition which shows Elman from several angles, at times a rousing performance of a composition which starts out right stoutly, but before it has run its course seems to lose itself in uncharted futility with the predominant idea of giving as many opportunities as possible for display.

* * *

On two loose records in the same list Victor gives us Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Ravel's "Ma mère l'Oye" (Mother Goose) suite, a comparatively familiar collection of five "Pièces Enfantines" (7370-1). Dating from a year or so before 1910, during which the suite was played as a four-hand piano piece at a concert of the Société Musicale Indépendante by two performers, whose united ages added up to sixteen years, Mother Goose received her first ballet performance with orchestra in January, 1912, at the Théâtre des Arts, Paris.

Adhering strictly to a program, the pieces derive from the tales familiar in every nursery. There is the pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, a dainty, dignified dance suggesting mystery; the Tom Thumb episode, in which the diminutive hero, hoping to find his way home by following the trail of bread crumbs he has dropped but which the birds have eaten up, wanders fearfully in circles; the serenade to Laideronette in her bath, played by the Pagodes, little china figurines inlaid with precious stones, who use instruments built to scale; the conversation of Beauty and the Beast, a dialogue between clarinet and contrabassoon, and finally the Fairy Garden, in which Prince Charming finds and wakes the sleeper, to the obvious joy of all the characters concerned.

How define the qualities that go to make up sound, pregnant nonsense? Mere double entente, of which incidentally we can remember no musical example, is not the way to the hearts of children from one to 100; for the wide-eyed infant who has not as yet overlaid its natural intuition with the smartness which eventually may grow to wisdom can run rings around the man of the world in the matter of sophistication.

As would-be imitators have found to their surprised chagrin, the Anderson-Carroll-Barrie-Milne tradition fails to respond when attempts are made to reduce it to a table of rules of technique. Musically, the problem becomes still more complicated. The makers of the old English pantomime dodged the issue with doubtful success. They tried to compromise by amusing the youngsters with the sight of familiar figures in the flesh and lavish spectacles, while entertaining the less critical portion of the audience with a series of current popular ditties which they prayed the kids might not understand. How many children have been caught humming the airs they have just heard in a performance of "Hänsel und Gretel"? Fraser Simpson's settings to the Christopher Robin and Pooh songs second the lyrics admirably, but away from them would they have any particular significance?

Unhampered by words, or without suggestive lyrics to help him, Ravel's task came into an only related class and, to one who met Mother Goose somewhat late in life, he has succeeded in conveying the delicate spirit of his subjects. Laideronette's miniature orchestra (its instruments were fashioned from such odds and ends as nutshells) plays music that might be expected from it, and the growling voice of the Beast is enough in itself to have repelled the object of his affections. Only in the finale does the music threaten to leave the setting in an orchestral deluge, and it is only there that it fails to convince.

Koussevitzky and the recording staff have done excellently by this material. Clarity is essential to such a performance and, helped by the essential simplicity of the score, the detail throughout is as close to perfection as we can expect at present. The Fairy Garden does give the impression of being played by another orchestra.

Previous recordings of Mother Goose are by Albert Coates and orchestra (H. M. V.) and Walter Damrosch with the old New York Symphony Orchestra in Columbia Masterworks No. 74. This, which runs to five sides, will be kept, despite the new arrival, if only for the reason that on the odd face is the same orchestra in a trifle of Pierné's—the entirely delightful "Entrance of the Little Fauns."

The new Segovia recording—Torroba's Preludio and Fandanguillo (Victor 1487)—compares well with his first surprising releases. Then the discovery that the solo guitar could be made to do so much and could be handled in such a manner as to record so satisfactorily came as a revelation to many, and the wonder lasts. Would it be too much to suggest another couple from Bach?

Photo by A B C News Service.

Serge Koussevitzky, Who Conducts Ravel's "Mother Goose" in Recent Recording.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 1 5 1931

* * *

Arthur Honneger's new symphony, written especially for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony orchestram, was given its first performance under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction last evening in Boston. On the same program was Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and "Canticum Fratis Solis" with Povla Frijsh as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

FEB 15 1931

In a visit to New York the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, has played Strauss' "Domestic" Symphony, Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, Stravinsky's "Capriccio" and Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ATTLEBORO, MASS
SUN

FEB 18 1931

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL REACHES 81ST BIRTHDAY

London, Feb. 18—(AP)— Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 years of age today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 15 1931

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Judging by various criticisms in last week's papers and the letter published in yesterday's TIMES there seems to be an awakening as to the Toscanini-Molinari régime and the poor programs that have been offered by these gentlemen.

It might be interesting for these masters of the baton to know that the audience they play to knows good music when they hear it and do not want to be fed on a lot of Italian sugar-water, but are used to stronger things and should be allowed to hear some Bruckner, Mahler, Bloch, Reger and numerous other great composers who never appear on Philharmonic programs.

No one doubts the genius of Toscanini, but this position entails obligations to give the public the best in music. Mr. Koussevitzky is the only conductor whose programs seem to be entirely satisfactory, and whose concerts this season are the only ones which I have thoroughly enjoyed.

J. S. WOLF.

New York, Feb. 9, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

FEB 15 1931

* * *

Another orchestral visitor from out-of-town to treat New York symphony lovers to an unusually brilliant concert, recently, was the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. In fact, the occasion was marked by one of the most brilliant performances ever heard here from this organization, and the audience quick to grasp unusual merit, not only applauded enthusiastically throughout but cheered as well.

This time, Mr. Koussevitzky did not introduce any new works but, nevertheless, his offerings were of unusual interest. The program opened with two Bach preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli followed by the little performed, seventh symphony of Sibelius, and the Strauss, "Sinfonia Domestica."

London, F
Henschel, gra
music and fi
Boston Symp

Wets and Drys Report On J

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 15 1931

Boston Symphony to Give Bach Festival in March

A Bach festival to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half century season. The festival will be held in Symphony Hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was the biographer and close friend of Major Higginson, will then make an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

FEB 15 1931

* * *

Regular conductor at Essen, Max Fiedler, 72 years old, once conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently directed a Brahms program in Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16 1931

BOSTON TO HAVE BACH FESTIVAL

Symphony Orchestra on 50th Anniversary to Honor Henry L. Higginson.

WILL CONTINUE SIX DAYS

Feature Will Be Two Performances of Mass in B-Minor Under Dr. Koussevitzky

On the occasion of its 50th anniversary the Boston Symphony orchestra will hold a Bach Festival late next month in honor of Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Orchestral, choral and chamber music by Johann Sebastian Bach will be included in the program to be offered in Boston six March days beginning Tuesday, the 24th. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will be assisting organizations, and a number of vocal and instrumental soloists will appear.

The feature of the Symphony Hall festival under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be two performances of the Mass in B-minor on the first and last days, Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. On each day the Mass will be performed in two parts—at 4:30 and 8:30.

The soloists will include: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ. Bliss Perry is announced as a speaker for the Wednesday concert, when he will eulogize the founder.

The mid-week bills are announced as follows: Wednesday, March 25 at 8:30: Organ Prelude; Harpsichord—Prelude and Fugue; Fantasia; Italian Concerto; Organ—Toccata.

Thursday, March 26 at 8:30: Brandenberg Concerto No. 2 (with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet); Suite for Orchestra, No. 1 in C major; Piano Concerto in D minor; Magnificat (chorus and orchestra).

Friday, March 27 at 2:30: Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D; Concerto for two violins; cantata—"Ich bin ein guter Hirt;" Cantata—"O, Ewigkeit."

Saturday, March 28 at 8:15: Cantata—"Christ lag in Todesbanden;" Brandenberg Concerto No. 5 (with solo piano, violin, and flute); Piano solo—Preludes and Fugues; Cantata—"Ein feste Burg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
FEB 16 1931

BOSTON TO HAVE BACH FESTIVAL

Symphony Orchestra on 50th Anniversary to Honor Henry L. Higginson.

On the occasion of its 50th anniversary the Boston Symphony orchestra will hold a Bach Festival late next month in honor of Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Orchestral, choral and chamber music by Johann Sebastian Bach will be included in the program to be offered in Boston six March days beginning Tuesday, the 24th. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will be assisting organizations, and a number of vocal and instrumental soloists will appear.

The feature of the Symphony Hall festival under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be two performances of the Mass in B-minor on the first and last days, Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. On each day the Mass will be performed in two parts—at 4:30 and 8:30.

The soloists will include: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ. Bliss Perry is announced as a speaker for the Wednesday concert, when he will eulogize the founder.

The mid-week bills are announced as follows: Wednesday, March 25 at 8:30: Organ Prelude; Harpsichord—Prelude and Fugue; Fantasia; Italian Concerto; Organ—Toccata.

Thursday, March 26 at 8:30: Brandenberg Concerto No. 2 (with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet); Suite for Orchestra, No. 1 in C major; Piano Concerto in D minor; Magnificat (chorus and orchestra).

Friday, March 27 at 2:30: Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D; Concerto for two violins; cantata—"Ich bin ein guter Hirt;" Cantata—"O, Ewigkeit."

Saturday, March 28 at 8:15: Cantata—"Christ lag in Todesbanden;" Brandenberg Concerto No. 5 (with solo piano, violin, and flute); Piano solo—Preludes and Fugues; Cantata—"Ein feste Burg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
FEB 16 1931

From the Northern Venice.

Music Editor of The Sun: In your issue of January 14 you remark apropos Gabrilowitsch's conducting of Schubert's symphony of the heavenly length, that "since the day of Bruckner and Mahler this symphony does not seem of inordinate length." It does not. Nor does Bruckner's fifth symphony, played here yesterday by the Hamburg Philharmonic under Muck, strike me as inordinately long. It took one hour and fifteen minutes in performance, and came at the close of a concert which began with the overture to the "Magic Flute," followed by Mozart's concerto for piano and orchestra in C major, Kochel 401, the piano part being taken by Walter Gieseking. It was an admirable program, admirably played. Muck's conducting has all the patrician qualities of old, and his collaboration with Gieseking in the piano concerto was something to be treasured. The audience, including the soloist, stayed till the end of the symphony, and at the close tendered Muck an ovation of Toscanini proportions.

Bruckner's place among the immortals is assured—at least in Germany and Austria. There are no disputes concerning Bruckner's work, as there are no disputes concerning Wagner's. He has been admitted to the august company of the great B.'s, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms—with no reservations.

I find Mahler's place not quite so secure even in Vienna even among musicians. The layman is taking to Mahler as he has in turn taken to Wagner, Brahms and Bruckner. It is the musician, and the pseudo musician, of the learned scribes, who gives Mahler the cold shoulder. I can quite appreciate his problem. The job to study Mahler—or Bruckner for that—is not the easiest in the world. What we don't know is suspect. What we don't understand it is best to attack. It was trouble enough to get acquainted with Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner; why bother about the garrulous Mahler and Bruckner? The endless repetitions, this lack of form, this diffuseness! This is not music in accordance with the canons of musical art as Mozart saw them. True. Nor is Wagner's! Nor are the writings of Shakespeare, Goethe, Kant, Balzac, Dostoevsky, James Joyce and many besides, if we were to apply the same principles to literature and philosophy.

Bruckner and Mahler will become as popular in America as they are here. Not all conductors will permit themselves to be cowed by a press which arrogates to itself the right to judge that which it neither knows nor understands, nor cares to understand. The opportunities to become familiar with the music of these giants have been too few. The public, drugged with Brahms and Tschaikowsky, will demand more Bruckner and Mahler, and will get what it wants. We get the kind of music and the kind of government that we deserve!

The Hamburg Philharmonic, under Muck, plays much like the Boston Symphony played under Muck, or the Bayreuth orchestra did when this incomparable leader presided over "Parsifal" and "Meistersinger." I heard him in these works in the summer of 1925. There is to be no more Bayreuth for Muck. He confirmed to me the report that he is not going back this summer. "Thirty years is enough," he said. "Since Siegfried Wagner is dead Bayreuth is not the same to me any more."

ALFRED LIEBAN.

Hamburg, Feb. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 18 1931

GRAND OLD MAN OF ENGLISH MUSIC IS 81

London, Feb. 18.—(AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after five years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 19 1931

Sir George Henschel, English Musician, Is 81

London, Feb. 18.—(AP.)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after 50 years.

"It career, back t orchestr some of

It w
Sir Ge a pro expres a for Britis chest his B

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
FEB 18 1931

MOMENTS

By SIDNE

To Whom Announcements a Matters May Be Ad

Boston Programs.

On the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week Mr. Koussevitzky has set as chief piece Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony," which will enlist the services of an assisting chorus from the Cecelia. The other numbers will be the Handel Concerto Grosso for Strings, Op. 6, No. 9 and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

J. R. Sanroma, heard with pleasure at Rogers Hall last week was assisting pianist with the Flute-Players at a concert at the Art Club on Sunday.

This morning at the Statler the artist will be Maria Jeritza of the Metropolitan Opera.

Sunday afternoon in Symphony hall Florence Austral will give a program of operatic airs and songs.

Amy Ward Durfee, contralto, who was heard here recently in recital at the Normal school, is to sing before the MacDowell Club in Boston this afternoon. She is to make her radio debut next week over WEAF, the New York station of the N. B. C.

A Bach Festival.

A Bach festival to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Maj. Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the festival on Tuesday (March 24), and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 19 1931

MODERN GREEK CHAIR PROPOSED

Boston Meeting Also Criticises Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Devotion of a $100,000 fund for the establishment in an American univer- of a chair for instruction of mod- Greek was approved by members e Greek-American Progressive as- tion meeting in convention at Bos- according to the Christian Science itor.

ptain George Demeter, the grand rnor, presided at the meeting at ch there were some 300 delegates announced the donations. He ex- ned that the association is a na- al organization with 185 lodges in United States, organized to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SO. MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD
FEB 18 1931

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL 81 YEARS OLD TODAY

London, Feb. 18 — (AP) — Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is eighty-one today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra — my orchestra, as I like to thnik of it —at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
FEB 19 1931

George Henschel, Musician, Is 81

First Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra "Young, Healthy."

LONDON, Feb. 18 — (AP) Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston Orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British broadcasting company orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 18 1931

GRAND OLD MAN OF ENGLISH MUSIC IS 81

Sir George Henschel Is Still "Young and Healthy."

London, Feb. 18.—(AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty

THIS CLIPPING FROM DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS
FEB 19 1931

Noted Musician 81.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.

Geo.
Eng-
f the was ung

felt the ack stra

FEB 19 1931

HENSCHEL EIGHTY-ONE.

First Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Still Young.

LONDON, Feb. 19 (AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is eighty-one years old Wednesday, but still young and healthy." He recalled the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations." It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST
FEB 18 1931

HENSCHEL 'YOUNG' AT 81

First Conductor of Boston Symphony in Good Health

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN
FEB 18 1931

Washington

Mrs. Hoover attended the concert of the Boston Symphony. First one in some time.

James Hay, Jr., has been added to the writing forces of the George Washington Bicentennial.

Kate Smith, the Washington girl who landed on Broadway, is currently a headliner at the Earl

With dew

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
FEB 19 1931
NEWARK, N. J.
EVE. NEWS

First Conductor of Boston Symphony Is Active at 81

LONDON, Feb. 18 (AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career, "he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting company orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 16 1931

BOSTON TO HAVE BACH FESTIVAL

Symphony Orchestra on 50th Anniversary to Honor Henry L. Higginson.

WILL CONTINUE SIX DAYS

Feature Will Be Two Performances of Mass in B-Minor Under Dr. Koussevitzky

On the occasion of its 50th anniversary the Boston Symphony orchestra will hold a Bach Festival late next month in honor of Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Orchestral, choral and chamber music by Johann Sebastian Bach will be included in the program to be offered in Boston six March days beginning Tuesday, the 24th. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will be assisting organizations, and a number of vocal and instrumental soloists will appear.

The feature of the Symphony Hall festival under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be two performances of the Mass in B-minor on the first and last days, Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. On each day the Mass will be performed in two parts—at 4:30 and 8:30.

The soloists will include: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ. Bliss Perry is announced as a speaker for the Wednesday concert, when he will eulogize the founder.

The mid-week bills are announced as follows: Wednesday, March 25 at 8:30: Organ Prelude; Harpsichord—Prelude and Fugue; Fantasia; Italian Concerto; Organ—Toccata.

Thursday, March 26 at 8:30: Brandenberg Concerto No. 2 (with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet); Suite for Orchestra, No. 1 in C major; Piano Concerto in D minor; Magnificat (chorus and orchestra).

Friday, March 27 at 2:30: Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D; Concerto for two violins; cantata—"Ich bin ein guter Hirt;" Cantata—"O, Ewigkeit."

Saturday, March 28 at 8:15: Cantata—"Christ lag in Todesbanden;" Brandenberg Concerto No. 5 (with solo piano, violin, and flute); Piano solo—Preludes and Fugues; Cantata—"Ein feste Burg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

FEB 16 1931

HENSCHEL 'YOUNG' AT 81

First Conductor of Boston Symphony in Good Health

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

FEB 18 1931

1 French city containing famous cathedral.
6 Baked beans are associated with ——?
11 Electrified particle.
12 Frozen water.
13 Pertaining to air.
14 To immerse.
15 Orb.
16 Pronoun.
17 Tradesmen.
18 No good.
20 Age.
21 Mother-of-35 Indian.
37 Hurrah!
38 Eagle.
39 Serf.
41 Cereal grass.
43 Like.
44 Pastry.
45 To sin.
47 Toward.
48 Part of the eye.

YESTERDAY'S

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

FEB 16 1931

BOSTON TO HAVE BACH FESTIVAL

Symphony Orchestra on 50th Anniversary to Honor Henry L. Higginson.

On the occasion of its 50th anniversary the Boston Symphony orchestra will hold a Bach Festival late next month in honor of Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Orchestral, choral and chamber music by Johann Sebastian Bach will be included in the program to be offered in Boston six March days beginning Tuesday, the 24th. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will be assisting organizations, and a number of vocal and instrumental soloists will appear.

The feature of the Symphony Hall festival under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be two performances of the Mass in B-minor on the first and last days, Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. On each day the Mass will be performed in two parts—at 4:30 and 8:30.

The soloists will include: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ. Bliss Perry is announced as a speaker for the Wednesday concert, when he will eulogize the founder.

The mid-week bills are announced as follows: Wednesday, March 25 at 8:30: Organ Prelude; Harpsichord—Prelude and Fugue; Fantasia; Italian Concerto; Organ—Toccata.

Thursday, March 26 at 8:30: Brandenberg Concerto No. 2 (with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet); Suite for Orchestra, No. 1 in C major; Piano Concerto in D minor; Magnificat (chorus and orchestra).

Friday, March 27 at 2:30: Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D; Concerto for two violins; cantata—"Ich bin ein guter Hirt;" Cantata—"O, Ewigkeit."

Saturday, March 28 at 8:15: Cantata—"Christ lag in Todesbanden;" Brandenberg Concerto No. 5 (with solo piano, violin, and flute); Piano solo—Preludes and Fugues; Cantata—"Ein feste Burg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

FEB 19 1931

George Henschel, Musician, Is 81

First Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra "Young, Healthy."

LONDON, Feb. 18 — (AP) Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston Orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British broadcasting company orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 19 1931
NEWARK, N. J.
EVE. NEWS

FEB 18 1931

Sir George Henschel 81

LONDON (AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is eighty-one today, but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston Orchestra again after fifty years. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

FEB 16 1931

From the Northern Venice.

Music Editor of The Sun: In your issue of January 14 you remark apropos Gabrilowitsch's conducting of Schubert's symphony of the heavenly length, that "since the day of Bruckner and Mahler this symphony does not seem of inordinate length." It does not. Nor does Bruckner's fifth symphony, played here yesterday by the Hamburg Philharmonic under Muck, strike me as inordinately long. It took one hour and fifteen minutes in performance, and came at the close of a concert which began with the overture to the "Magic Flute," followed by Mozart's concerto for piano and orchestra in C major, Kochel 401, the piano part being taken by Walter Gieseking. It was an admirable program, admirably played. Muck's conducting has all the patrician qualities of old, and his collaboration with Gieseking in the piano concerto was something to be treasured. The audience, including the soloist, stayed till the end of the symphony, and at the close tendered Muck an ovation of Toscanini proportions.

Bruckner's place among the immortals is assured—at least in Germany and Austria. There are no disputes concerning Bruckner's work, as there are no disputes concerning Wagner's. He has been admitted to the august company of the great B.'s, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms—with no reservations.

I find Mahler's place not quite so secure even in Vienna even among musicians. The layman is taking to Mahler as he has in turn taken to Wagner, Brahms and Bruckner. It is the musician, and the pseudo musician, of the learned scribes, who gives Mahler the cold shoulder. I can quite appreciate his problem. The job to study Mahler—or Bruckner for that—is not the easiest in the world. What we don't know is suspect. What we don't understand it is best to attack. It was trouble enough to get acquainted with Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner; why bother about the garrulous Mahler and Bruckner? The endless repetitions, this lack of form, this diffuseness! This is not music in accordance with the canons of musical art as Mozart saw them. True. Nor is Wagner's! Nor are the writings of Shakespeare, Goethe, Kant, Balzac, Dostoevsky, James Joyce and many besides, if we were to apply the same principles to literature and philosophy.

Bruckner and Mahler will become as popular in America as they are here. Not all conductors will permit themselves to be cowed by a press which arrogates to itself the right to judge that which it neither knows nor understands, nor cares to understand. The opportunities to become familiar with the music of these giants have been too few. The public, drugged with Brahms and Tschaikowsky, will demand more Bruckner and Mahler, and will get what it wants. We get the kind of music and the kind of government that we deserve!

The Hamburg Philharmonic, under Muck, plays much like the Boston Symphony played under Muck, or the Bayreuth orchestra did when this incomparable leader presided over "Parsifal" and "Meistersinger." I heard him in these works in the summer of 1925. There is to be no more Bayreuth for Muck. He confirmed to me the report that he is not going back this summer. "Thirty years is enough," he said. "Since Siegfried Wagner is dead Bayreuth is not the same to me any more."

ALFRED LIEBAN.

Hamburg, Feb. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 18 1931

GRAND OLD MAN OF ENGLISH MUSIC IS 81

London, Feb. 18.—(AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after five years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 19 1931

GRAND OLD MAN OF ENGLISH MUSIC IS 81

Sir George Henschel Is Still "Young and Healthy."

London, Feb. 18.—(AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS

FEB 19 1931

Noted Musician 81.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TI
NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.

Geo. Eng- f the was oung felt the ack stra

FEB 19 1931

HENSCHEL EIGHTY-ONE.

First Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Still Young.

LONDON, Feb. 19 (AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is eighty-one years old Wednesday, but still young and healthy." He recalled the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations." It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 19 1931

Sir George Henschel, English Musician, Is 81

London, Feb. 18.—(AP.)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 18 1931

...e Handel Concerto Grosso for Strings, Op. 6, No. 9 and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

J. R. Sanroma, heard with pleasure at Rogers Hall last week was assisting pianist with the Flute-Players at a concert at the Art Club on Sunday.

This morning at the Statler the artist will be Maria Jeritza of the Metropolitan Opera.

Sunday afternoon in Symphony hall Florence Austral will give a program of operatic airs and songs.

Amy Ward Durfee, contralto, who was heard here recently in recital at the Normal school, is to sing before the MacDowell Club in Boston this afternoon. She is to make her radio debut next week over WEAF, the New York station of the N. B. C.

A Bach Festival.

A Bach festival to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Maj. Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the festival on Tuesday (March 24), and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 19 1931

MODERN GREEK CHAIR PROPOSED

Boston Meeting Also Criticises Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Devotion of a $100,000 fund for the establishment in an American university of a chair for instruction of modern Greek was approved by members of the Greek-American Progressive association meeting in convention at Boston, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Captain George Demeter, the grand governor, presided at the meeting at which there were some 300 delegates and announced the donations. He explained that the association is a national organization with 185 lodges in the United States, organized to pro-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SO. MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD

FEB 18 1931

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL 81 YEARS OLD TODAY

London, Feb. 18 — (AP) — Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is eighty-one today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra — my orchestra, as I like to thnik of it —at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

Washington

Mrs. Hoover attended the concert of the Boston Symphony. First one in some time.

James Hay, Jr., has been added to the writing forces of the George Washington Bicentennial.

Kate Smith, the Washington girl who landed on Broadway, is currently a headliner at the Par-

With dew

...ous Specials
...ry Butter
...nds 57c
...hite Rose

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 16 1931

BOSTON TO HAVE BACH FESTIVAL

Symphony Orchestra on 50th Anniversary to Honor Henry L. Higginson.

WILL CONTINUE SIX DAYS

Feature Will Be Two Performances of Mass in B-Minor Under Dr. Koussevitzky

On the occasion of its 50th anniversary the Boston Symphony orchestra will hold a Bach Festival late next month in honor of Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Orchestral, choral and chamber music by Johann Sebastian Bach will be included in the program to be offered in Boston six March days beginning Tuesday, the 24th. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will be assisting organizations, and a number of vocal and instrumental soloists will appear.

The feature of the Symphony Hall festival under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be two performances of the Mass in B-minor on the first and last days, Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. On each day the Mass will be performed in two parts—at 4:30 and 8:30.

The soloists will include: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ. Bliss Perry is announced as a speaker for the Wednesday concert, when he will eulogize the founder.

The mid-week bills are announced as follows: Wednesday, March 25 at 8:30: Organ Prelude; Harpsichord—Prelude and Fugue; Fantasia; Italian Concerto; Organ—Toccata.

Thursday, March 26 at 8:30: Brandenberg Concerto No. 2 (with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet); Suite for Orchestra, No. 1 in C major; Piano Concerto in D minor; Magnificat (chorus and orchestra).

Friday, March 27 at 2:30: Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D; Concerto for two violins; cantata—"Ich bin ein guter Hirt;" Cantata—"O, Ewigkeit."

Saturday, March 28 at 8:15: Cantata—"Christ lag in Todesbanden;" Brandenberg Concerto No. 5 (with solo piano, violin, and flute); Piano solo—Preludes and Fugues; Cantata—"Ein feste Burg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
FEB 16 1931

BOSTON TO HAVE BACH FESTIVAL

Symphony Orchestra on 50th Anniversary to Honor Henry L. Higginson.

On the occasion of its 50th anniversary the Boston Symphony orchestra will hold a Bach Festival late next month in honor of Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Orchestral, choral and chamber music by Johann Sebastian Bach will be included in the program to be offered in Boston six March days beginning Tuesday, the 24th. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will be assisting organizations, and a number of vocal and instrumental soloists will appear.

The feature of the Symphony Hall festival under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be two performances of the Mass in B-minor on the first and last days, Tuesday, March 24, and Sunday, March 29. On each day the Mass will be performed in two parts—at 4:30 and 8:30.

The soloists will include: Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadesus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ. Bliss Perry is announced as a speaker for the Wednesday concert, when he will eulogize the founder.

The mid-week bills are announced as follows: Wednesday, March 25 at 8:30: Organ Prelude; Harpsichord—Prelude and Fugue; Fantasia; Italian Concerto; Organ—Toccata.

Thursday, March 26 at 8:30: Brandenberg Concerto No. 2 (with solo violin, flute, oboe and trumpet); Suite for Orchestra, No. 1 in C major; Piano Concerto in D minor; Magnificat (chorus and orchestra).

Friday, March 27 at 2:30: Suite for Orchestra, No. 3 in D; Concerto for two violins; cantata—"Ich bin ein guter Hirt;" Cantata—"O, Ewigkeit."

Saturday, March 28 at 8:15: Cantata—"Christ lag in Todesbanden;" Brandenberg Concerto No. 5 (with solo piano, violin, and flute); Piano solo—Preludes and Fugues; Cantata—"Ein feste Burg."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
FEB 16 1931

From the Northern Venice.

Music Editor of The Sun: In your issue of January 14 you remark apropos Gabrilowitsch's conducting of Schubert's symphony of the heavenly length, that "since the day of Bruckner and Mahler this symphony does not seem of inordinate length." It does not. Nor does Bruckner's fifth symphony, played here yesterday by the Hamburg Philharmonic under Muck, strike me as inordinately long. It took one hour and fifteen minutes in performance, and came at the close of a concert which began with the overture to the "Magic Flute," followed by Mozart's concerto for piano and orchestra in C major, Kochel 401, the piano part being taken by Walter Gieseking. It was an admirable program, admirably played. Muck's conducting has all the patrician qualities of old, and his collaboration with Gieseking in the piano concerto was something to be treasured. The audience, including the soloist, stayed till the end of the symphony, and at the close tendered Muck an ovation of Toscanini proportions.

Bruckner's place among the immortals is assured—at least in Germany and Austria. There are no disputes concerning Bruckner's work, as there are no disputes concerning Wagner's. He has been admitted to the august company of the great B.'s, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms—with no reservations.

I find Mahler's place not quite so secure even in Vienna even among musicians. The layman is taking to Mahler as he has in turn taken to Wagner, Brahms and Bruckner. It is the musician, and the pseudo musician, of the learned scribes, who gives Mahler the cold shoulder. I can quite appreciate his problem. The job to study Mahler—or Bruckner for that—is not the easiest in the world. What we don't know is suspect. What we don't understand it is best to attack. It was trouble enough to get acquainted with Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner; why bother about the garrulous Mahler and Bruckner? The endless repetitions, this lack of form, this diffuseness! This is not music in accordance with the canons of musical art as Mozart saw them. True. Nor is Wagner's! Nor are the writings of Shakespeare, Goethe, Kant, Balzac, Dostoevsky, James Joyce and many besides, if we were to apply the same principles to literature and philosophy.

Bruckner and Mahler will become as popular in America as they are here. Not all conductors will permit themselves to be cowed by a press which arrogates to itself the right to judge that which it neither knows nor understands, nor cares to understand. The opportunities to become familiar with the music of these giants have been too few. The public, drugged with Brahms and Tschaikowsky, will demand more Bruckner and Mahler, and will get what it wants. We get the kind of music and the kind of government that we deserve!

The Hamburg Philharmonic, under Muck, plays much like the Boston Symphony played under him, or the Bayreuth orchestra did when this incomparable leader presided over "Parsifal" and "Meistersinger." I heard him in these works in the summer of 1925. There is to be no more Bayreuth for Muck. He confirmed to me the report that he is not going back this summer. "Thirty years is enough," he said. "Since Siegfried Wagner is dead Bayreuth is not the same to me any more."

ALFRED LIEBAN.

Hamburg, Feb. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 18 1931

GRAND OLD MAN OF ENGLISH MUSIC IS 81

London, Feb. 18.—(AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after five years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 19 1931

Sir George Henschel, English Musician, Is 81

London, Feb. 18.—(AP.)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 19 1931

MODERN GREEK CHAIR PROPOSED

Boston Meeting Also Criticises Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Devotion of a $100,000 fund for the establishment in an American university of a chair for instruction of modern Greek was approved by members of the Greek-American Progressive association meeting in convention at Boston, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Captain George Demeter, the grand governor, presided at the meeting at which there were some 300 delegates and announced the donations. He explained that the association is a national organization with 185 lodges in the United States, organized to promote loyalty to the country, a better understanding between Greeks and Americans, and a greater familiarity with the Greek language.

Another resolution which criticized Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for importing musicians for his orchestra was said to have been induced by the separation of Demetrios Demetriades, an American citizen, from the orchestra. Its passage brought a response from Judge Frederick P. Cabot, head of the board of directors of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, who characterized the criticism as "going rather far afield."

"Last autumn," Judge Cabot explained, "a Greek player of the double bass was not given a new contract. That was not a criticism of him in any sense nor an implication that he is not an excellent musician. It is simply a question whether his particular talents will fit into the musical organization on a sufficient basis."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
FEB 19 193[illegible]

George Henschel, Musician, Is 81

First Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra "Young, Healthy."

LONDON, Feb. 18 — (AP) Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston Orchestra again after 50 years.

"It was the crowning joy of my career," he said, "to be asked to go back to conduct that orchestra—my orchestra, as I like to think of it—at some of its jubilee celebrations."

It was only a year or so ago that Sir George, in a radio broadcast, sang a program of songs with all his old expression and clear diction. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British broadcasting company orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 19 1931

GRAND OLD MAN OF ENGLISH MUSIC IS 81

Sir George Henschel Is Still "Young and Healthy."

London, Feb. 18.—(AP)—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty

THIS CLIPPING FROM DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS
FEB 19 1931

Noted Musician 81.

London, Feb. 19 (AP)—Sir Geo. Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was eighty-one yesterday but still "young and healthy."

He recalled the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
FEB 18 1931

[illegible] the Handel Concerto Grosso for Strings, Op. 6, No. 9 and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

J. R. Sanroma, heard with pleasure at Rogers Hall last week was assisting pianist with the Flute-Players at a concert at the Art Club on Sunday.

This morning at the Statler the artist will be Maria Jeritza of the Metropolitan Opera.

Sunday afternoon in Symphony hall Florence Austral will give a program of operatic airs and songs.

Amy Ward Durfee, contralto, who was heard here recently in recital at the Normal school, is to sing before the MacDowell Club in Boston this afternoon. She is to make her radio debut next week over WEAF, the New York station of the N. B. C.

A Bach Festival.

A Bach festival to be given through the last week of March will be the culminating feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's half century season. The festival will be performed in Symphony hall, Boston, from Tuesday, March 24, each day through Sunday, March 29.

The memory of Henry L. Higginson will be especially honored. The second evening (March 25) is dedicated to the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through 37 years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Maj. Higginson's biographer and close friend, will then give an address. Chamber music of Bach will likewise be played.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces Bach's monumental Mass in B minor which will open the festival on Tuesday (March 24), and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works. Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be given on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5), and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 1[illegible]

[illegible] Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is 81 today but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went back to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty years.

[illegible] ion. Within a fortnight he is to conduct the big British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in the same program given in his Boston jubilee concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST
FEB 19 1931

Washington

Mrs. Hoover attended the concert of the Boston Symphony. First one in some time.

James Hay, Jr., has been added to the writing forces of the George Washington Bicentennial.

Kate Smith, the Washington girl who landed on Broadway, is currently a headliner at the Par[illegible]

With dem[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST
FEB 19 1931

HENSCHEL 'YOUNG' AT 81

First Conductor of Boston Symphony in Good Health

LONDON, Feb. 18 (AP).—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is eighty-one today, but still "young and healthy."

He recalled today the pleasure he felt at the reception given him in the United States when he went there to conduct the Boston orchestra again after fifty years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
FEB 19 1931

Sir George Henschel Stays 'Young' at 81

LONDON, Feb. 18 (AP).—Sir George Henschel, grand old man of English music and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was eighty-one today but still "young and healthy."

[illegible] Butter
White Rose
[illegible] can 23c

[illegible] Specials
[illegible] 57c
[illegible] Butter
White Rose

134

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 1 1931

In the WORLD of MUSIC

BY W. J. HENDERSON.

New York, Feb. 21.—Some years ago—never mind just when; dates are dry food—Arthur Whiting, musician, composer, scholar and observer, gave a musical party. It was a coming-out party. The debutant was not a fair maiden, but a group of songs. The place was the Whiting studio. About thirty men gathered in the room. There were fire light, the dull glow of lamps and the enshrouding veil of fragrant tobacco smoke. Before the songs were sung, Vincent D'Indy, composer of the "Ishtar," variations and high priest of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, read with elegant diction the texts by Paul Verlaine, from which the songs were made. Then we heard the music.

Francis Rogers sang the lyrics, Arthur Whiting played the piano, and the composer of the songs played the viola obbligato. After the group had been revealed to us, we had an interval for conversation, beer, sandwiches and continued smoke. Then we resumed our seats and the songs were sung again. It was in the intermission that Walter Damrosch said to his brother:

"Frank, this man Loeffler has something that the rest of them have not."

And that was straight talk. It took many of them years to find it out and there are dullards in the world of music who do not know it yet. However, there are celebrations just now because Charles Martin Loeffler has attained the Biblical three score and ten. He has been dwelling for several years in the seclusion of his home in Medford, Mass., but Boston, which knew him when he sat at the first desk of its great orchestra beside Franz Kneisel, has drawn him out of his den and turned the white light of its approbation upon him.

What Walter Damrosch said was the pith of the whole matter. Loeffler is one of the composers who was developed under the spread of the Debussy influence of music. Loeffler's art is inconceivable except as part of the beginning of the modernist advance. But it is none the less strikingly original and distinguished by certain qualities of imaginative creation and by aristocracy of style. Loeffler, the reflective, introspective and highly cultivated man, the student of Vergil and Horace, the lover of long natural vistas and of the thoughts of men, speaks in every work, whether it be the "Death of Tintagiles," the "Pagan Poem" or the "Villanelle du Diable."

It is fitting that this musician should be honored by his fellows. He has lived in this country many years and is an American citizen. He was was born and studied abroad, but he is thoroughly Americanized. He is at any rate the foremost composer in this country. More than that, he is one of the foremost composers of his time. The world of music, not only here but across the seas, has reason to be proud of him.

* * *

A Word to Wise Fiddlers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a remarkable history. Older music lovers will recall the seasons when at the first two desks sat Kneisel and Loeffler, Tim Adamowski and Otto Roth, all of whom appeared at various times as solo artists at concerts of the organization. On one occasion Mr. Loeffler was not only soloist, but composer. This was at the fourth concert of the twelfth season of the orchestra in this city. It was in the Metropolitan Opera House. The program comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mr. Loeffler's divertimento for violin and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, the customary three excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade." Mr. Loeffler was the soloist in his own work. Mr. Kneisel played the solos in the Rimsky-Korsakov music.

Just why violinists, who are none too well supplied with material, do not examine this piece is a subject for wonder. It is not one of Mr. Loeffler's loftiest creations, but it is distinctly good violin stuff and grateful for the soloist. It is in three movements, preamble, "Eclogue" (the classic view of the composer already characteristic) and "Carnival des Mortes." This finale is a set of brilliant variations on the "Dies Irae." The composition is rich in melody, color and effective orchestration.

It is crowded with difficulties and perhaps in these days might be rudely pushed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso piece, but since violinists persistently perform compositions which have only technical displays to recommend them, this divertimento of Loeffler, which is also good music, might be worth at least one hearing. It is not necessary to descant upon the merits of the composer's better known works. They deserve to enjoy a long period of active life. They possess individuality and musical beauty of a high order.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
FEB 21 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY IT ITS 50TH YEAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening, March 4th, is this year celebrating with features of importance and interest the 50 years of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, came from Europe to open the season in Boston's Symphony Hall last October. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky resumed the conductorship on the following week, thus beginning his seventh season at its head.

A Bach Festival in Boston next month, and the playing of a number of scores this season especially written by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, are other features which will make this the outstanding year of its long and notable career. A special radio concert was given on Saturday evening, Oct. 4th, as the orchestra's contribution to the Tercentenary Program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting the concert which was broadcast over the entire nation.

Sir George Henschel's trip to America to lead the Boston Symphony last Fall was his first since his conductorship of forty-seven years ago, and he came to find the orchestra almost doubled in number and having acquired a long standing reputation of the very highest in the world of musical performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson— to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For thirty-seven years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

George Henschel ,having firmly established the orchestra, was followed by Wilhelm Gericke who through twelve years drilled it into subtilty of performance which made it one of the first in the world. Arthus Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of his day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur, and Max Fiedler. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra, which was Major Higginson's to its highest point of perfection and fame. In his 79th year, the orchestra's founder left it in control of a board of trustees. After the two French conductors, Henri Rebaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
FEB 22

AN outstanding event of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth anniversary celebration this year will be a Bach festival, to be held in Symphony Hall in Boston from March 24 to March 29, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. On Wednesday evening, March 25, the program will be dedicated to the memory of Henry L. Higginson, who was the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer through thirty-seven years. Bliss Perry, the writer, who was Major Higginson's biographer and close friend, will deliver an address that evening. Bach's chamber music will be played.

The Mass in B minor will open the festival on Tuesday and will be repeated to close it on the Sunday following. The Magnificat will be performed on March 26, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society combining with the orchestra for both works.

Four cantatas (Nos. 4, 30, 80, 85) are to be sung on March 27 and 28 by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5) and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for Two Violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord."

Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Société des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory and formerly organist with the orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 21 1931

THE WORKS OF STRAVINSKY

Subject to Analysis and Criticism by Mr. Duffy

To the Editor of The Courant:—

We wonder how New Yorkers received Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave that work recently. The writer recently had the pleasure of listening to a recording (and a very fine one) of this work, with the composer, I believe, at the piano.

A year ago, Leopold Stokowski described the music of "Sacre du Printemps" as being the greatest music of our time, a statement which finds favor, we may well believe, with Stokowski only! Let's hope so. What would he say of the "Capriccio"? There is some difference between these two works of one and the same composer, and neither is worthy of posterity. In fact, we have reason to wonder if Stravinsky's music will find a permanent place among the great works of musical history.

Stravinsky has always aimed to play to the fancies of his public. From about 1908 till about 1913. Ballet-music was in vogue. Ravel had produced during that period his "Daphnis et Chloe"; Debussy had written three ballets; Roussel had written a few. But none of these had created the unprecedented sensations which resulted from Stravinsky's "Oiseau de Feu" and "Petrouchka." What was there about these works that made them so popular?

In the first place, they were musically different. While "L'Oiseau de Feu" saps here and there of Debussy, there is nevertheless a strong tendency toward an individualism which found its full fruition in "Petrouchka" and "Sacre du Printemps." There was, in all three of these works, a new harmonic idiom, coupled with the most dazzling orchestral coloring, so indispensable to Russian music. There was even confusion of tonalities, complication of rhythms, and at times lack of both. It is music which demands action for its appreciation.

Then came the war. And now that it's over, and things may seem to commence settling down to something like normal, folks have somehow become more serious, thinks Stravinsky, and are tired of ballets. And so, he has commenced to "study up" on the classics; and one of the results of this study is the "Capriccio," a work which, though very modern, (for no reason at all other than to be just a little different), nevertheless has strong tonal tendencies. The work ends semi-tumultuously, on a solid G-Major chord; and more than once do we find our composer landing on solid major or minor triads. There is a perfectly nice section in this if you please. And yet, with all this return to definite tonalities, the work is light and almost frivolous. Stravinsky has said his bit in his ballets. All, or practically all, that follows these is of less serious consequence. There may be attempts to make the "Capriccio" a sensational piece; but there isn't enough material of im-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
FEB 21 1931

Boston Symphony Is 50 Years Old

Serge Koussevitzky who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall March 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening, March 4, is this year celebrating with features of importance and interest the 50th year of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, came from Europe to open the season in Boston's Symphony Hall last October. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky resumed the conductorship on the following week, thus beginning his seventh season at its head.

A Bach Festival in Boston next month, and the playing of a number of scores this season especially written by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, are other features which will make the outstanding year of its long and notable career. A special radio concert was given on Saturday evening, October 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the Tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting the concert which was broadcast over the entire nation.

Sir George Henschel's trip to America to lead the Boston Symphony last Fall was his first since his conductorship of 47 years ago, and he came to find the orchestra almost doubled in number and having acquired a long standing reputation of the highest in the world of musical performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

George Henschel, having firmly established the orchestra, was followed by Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into subtlety of performance which made it one of the first in the world. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of his day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra, which was Major Higginson's, to its highest point of perfection and fame. In his 79th year, the orchestra's founder left it in control of a board of trustees. After the two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
NEWS
FEB 2 1931

Deserved Tribute Is Paid Composer Who Has Reached His Seventieth Milestone

BY W. J. HENDERSON

NEW YORK, Feb. 21.—Some years ago—never mind just when; dates are dry food—Arthur Whiting, musician, composer, scholar and observer, gave a musical party. It was a coming-out party. The debutant was not a fair maiden, but a group of songs. The place was the Whiting studio. About 30 men gathered in the room. There were fire light, the dull glow of lamps and the enshrouding veil of fragrant tobacco smoke. Before the songs were sung Vincent D'Indy, composer of the "Ishtar," variations and high priest of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, read with elegant diction the text by Paul Verlaine, from which the songs were made. Then we heard the music.

Francis Rogers sang the lyrics, Arthur Whiting played the piano, and the composer of the songs played the viola obbligato. After the group had been revealed to us, we had an interval for conversation, beer, sandwiches and continued smoke. Then we resumed our seats and the songs were sung again. It was in the intermission that Walter Damrosch said to his brother:

"Frank, this man Loeffler has something that the rest of them have not."

And that was straight talk. It took many of them years to find it out and there are dullards in the world of music who do not know it yet. However, there are celebrations just now because Charles Martin Loeffler has attained the biblical threescore and ten. He has been dwelling for several years in the seclusion of his home in Medford, Mass., but Boston, which knew him when he sat at the first desk of its great orchestra beside Franz Kneisel, has drawn him out of his den and turned the white light of its approbation upon him.

What Walter Damrosch said was the pitch of the whole matter. Loeffler is one of the composers who was developed under the spread of the Debussy influence of music. Loeffler's art is inconceivable except as part of the beginning of the modernist advance. But it is none the less strikingly original and distinguished by certain qualities of imaginative creation and by aristocracy of style. Loeffler, the reflective, introspective and highly cultivated man, the student of Vergil and Horace, the lover of long natural vistas and of the thoughts of men, speaks in every work, whether it be the "Death of Tintagiles," the "Pagan Poem" or the "Villanelle du Diable."

It is fitting that this musician should be honored by his fellows. He has lived in this country many years and is an American citizen. He was born and studied abroad, but he is thoroughly Americanized. He is at any rate the foremost composer in this country. More than that, he is one of the foremost composers of his time. The world of music, not only here but across the seas, has reason to be proud of him.

* * *

The Boston symphony orchestra has a remarkable history. Older music lovers will recall the seasons when at the first two desks sat Kneisel and Loeffler, Tim Adamowski and Otto Roth, all of whom appeared at various times as solo artists at concerts of the organization. On one occasion Mr. Loeffler was not only soloist, but composer. This was at the fourth concert of the 12th season of the orchestra in this city. It was in the Metropolitan Opera House. The program comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mr. Loeffler's divertimento for violin and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, the customary three excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" and "Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade." Mr. Loeffler was the soloist in his own work. Mr. Kneisel played the Rimsky-Korsakov music.

Just why violinists who are none too well supplied with material, do not examine this piece is a subject for wonder. It is not one of Mr. Loeffler's loftiest creations, but it is distinctly good violin stuff and grateful for the soloist. It is in three movements, preamble, "Eclogue" (the classic view of the composer already characteristic) and "Carnival des Mortes." This finale is a set of brilliant variations on the "Dies Irae." The composition is rich in melody, color and effective orchestration.

It is crowded with difficulties and perhaps in these days might be rudely pushed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso piece, but since violinists persistently perform compositions which have only technical displays to recommend them, this divertimento of Loeffler, which is also good music, might be worth at least one hearing. It is not necessary to descant upon the merits of the composer's better known works. They deserve to enjoy a long period of active life. They possess individuality and musical beauty of a high order.

See Page 141 for Feb. comments

134

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 1 1931

In the WORLD of MUSIC

BY W. J. HENDERSON.

New York, Feb. 21.—Some years ago—never mind just when; dates are dry food—Arthur Whiting, musician, composer, scholar and observer, gave a musical party. It was a coming-out party. The debutant was not a fair maiden, but a group of songs. The place was the Whiting studio. About thirty men gathered in the room. There were fire light, the dull glow of lamps and the enshrouding veil of fragrant tobacco smoke. Before the songs were sung, Vincent D'Indy, composer of the "Ishtar," variations and high priest of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, read with elegant diction the texts by Paul Verlaine, from which the songs were made. Then we heard the music.

Francis Rogers sang the lyrics, Arthur Whiting played the piano, and the composer of the songs played the viola obbligato. After the group had been revealed to us, we had an interval for conversation, beer, sandwiches and continued smoke. Then we resumed our seats and the songs were sung again. It was in the intermission that Walter Damrosch said to his brother:

"Frank, this man Loeffler has something that the rest of them have not."

And that was straight talk. It took many of them years to find it out and there are dullards in the world of music who do not know it yet. However, there are celebrations just now because Charles Martin Loeffler has attained the Biblical three score and ten. He has been dwelling for several years in the seclusion of his home in Medford, Mass., but Boston, which knew him when he sat at the first desk of its great orchestra beside Franz Kneisel, has drawn him out of his den and turned the white light of its approbation upon him.

What Walter Damrosch said was the pith of the whole matter. Loeffler is one of the composers who was developed under the spread of the Debussy influence of music. Loeffler's art is inconceivable except as part of the beginning of the modernist advance. But it is none the less strikingly original and distinguished by certain qualities of imaginative creation and by aristocracy of style. Loeffler, the reflective, introspective and highly cultivated man, the student of Vergil and Horace, the lover of long natural vistas and of the thoughts of men, speaks in every work, whether it be the "Death of Tintagiles," the "Pagan Poem" or the "Villanelle du Diable."

It is fitting that this musician should be honored by his fellows. He has lived in this country many years and is an American citizen. He was born and studied abroad, but he is thoroughly Americanized. He is at any rate the foremost composer in this country. More than that, he is one of the foremost composers of his time. The world of music, not only here but across the seas, has reason to be proud of him.

* * *

A Word to Wise Fiddlers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a remarkable history. Older music lovers will recall the seasons when at the first two desks sat Kneisel and Loeffler, Tim Adamowski and Otto Roth, all of whom appeared at various times as solo artists at concerts of the organization. On one occasion Mr. Loeffler was not only soloist, but composer. This was at the fourth concert of the twelfth season of the orchestra in this city. It was in the Metropolitan Opera House. The program comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mr. Loeffler's divertimento for violin and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, the customary three excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade." Mr. Loeffler was the soloist in his own work. Mr. Kneisel played the solos in the Rimsky-Korsakov music.

Just why violinists, who are none too well supplied with material, do not examine this piece is a subject for wonder. It is not one of Mr. Loeffler's loftiest creations, but it is distinctly good violin stuff and grateful for the soloist. It is in three movements, preamble, "Eclogue" (the classic view of the composer already characteristic) and "Carnival des Mortes." This finale is a set of brilliant variations on the "Dies Irae." The composition is rich in melody, color and effective orchestration.

It is crowded with difficulties and perhaps in these days might be rudely pushed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso piece, but since violinists persistently perform compositions which have only technical displays to recommend them, this divertimento of Loeffler, which is also good music, might be worth at least one hearing. It is not necessary to descant upon the merits of the composer's better known works. They deserve to enjoy a long period of active life. They possess individuality and musical beauty of a high order.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
FEB 21 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY IT ITS 50TH YEAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening, March 4th, is this year celebrating with features of importance and interest the 50 years of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, came from Europe to open the season in Boston's Symphony Hall last October. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky resumed the conductorship on the following week, thus beginning his seventh season at its head.

A Bach Festival in Boston next month, and the playing of a number of scores this season especially written by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, are other features which will make this the outstanding year of its long and notable career. A special radio concert was given on Saturday evening, Oct. 4th, as the orchestra's contribution to the Tercentenary Program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting the concert which was broadcast over the entire nation.

Sir George Henschel's trip to America to lead the Boston Symphony last Fall was his first since his conductorship of forty-seven years ago, and he came to find the orchestra almost doubled in number and having acquired a long standing reputation of the very highest in the world of musical performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson— to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For thirty-seven years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

George Henschel ,having firmly established the orchestra, was followed by Wilhelm Gericke who through twelve years drilled it into subtilty of performance which made it one of the first in the world. Arthus Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of his day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur, and Max Fiedler. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra, which was Major Higginson's to its highest point of perfection and fame. In his 79th year, the orchestra's founder left it in control of a board of trustees. After the two French conductors, Henri Rebaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

himself; "Apollo Musagètes," "Four Studies for Orchestra" and the overture to the little opera "Mavra."

are to be sung on ... by the Bach Cantata Club. The vocal quartet in the choral scores will consist of Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, baritone.

Orchestral works will include two Brandenburg Concertos (Nos. 2 and 5) and Suites (Nos. 1 and 3). The Concerto for Two Violins will be played by Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. Alexander Borovsky will come from Europe to play the piano concerto in D minor and also preludes and fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord."

Mme. Patorni-Casadesus of the "Société des Instruments Anciens" will also come from Europe to play a group of pieces on the harpsichord. Organ numbers will be played by Wallace Goodrich, director of the New England Conservatory and formerly organist with the orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall March 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening, March 4, is this year celebrating with features of importance and interest the 50th year of its existence. Sir George Henschel, who was the first conductor of the orchestra in 1881-84, came from Europe to open the season in Boston's Symphony Hall last October. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky resumed the conductorship on the following week, thus beginning his seventh season at its head.

A Bach Festival in Boston next month, and the playing of a number of scores this season especially written by the foremost living composers for this orchestra's anniversary year, are other features which will make the outstanding year of its long and notable career. A special radio concert was given on Saturday evening, October 4, as the orchestra's contribution to the Tercentenary program of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, Serge Koussevitzky conducting the concert which was broadcast over the entire nation.

Sir George Henschel's trip to America to lead the Boston Symphony last Fall was his first since his conductorship of 47 years ago, and he came to find the orchestra almost doubled in number and having acquired a long standing reputation of the highest in the world of musical performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the life dream of Henry L. Higginson—to give America a permanent orchestra, the very finest that individual effort and expenditure could create. For 37 years this noted financier and patron of the arts devoted his best energies and the limit of his income to perfecting his orchestra. He obtained the most skillful musicians of the time, and the greatest living conductors to shape them into an ensemble of ideal beauty.

George Henschel, having firmly established the orchestra, was followed by Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into subtlety of performance which made it one of the first in the world. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of his day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra, which was Major Higginson's, to its highest point of perfection and fame. In his 79th year, the orchestra's founder left it in control of a board of trustees. After the two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
FEB 21 1931

THE WORKS OF STRAVINSKY

Subject to Analysis and Criticism by Mr. Duffy

To the Editor of The Courant:—

We wonder how New Yorkers received Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave that work recently. The writer recently had the pleasure of listening to a recording (and a very fine one) of this work, with the composer, I believe, at the piano.

A year ago, Leopold Stokowski described the music of "Sacre du Printemps" as being the greatest music of our time, a statement which finds favor, we may well believe, with Stokowski only! Let's hope so. What would he say of the "Capriccio"? There is some difference between these two works of one and the same composer, and neither is worthy of posterity. In fact, we have reason to wonder if Stravinsky's music will find a permanent place among the great works of musical history.

Stravinsky has always aimed to play to the fancies of his public. From about 1908 till about 1913, Ballet-music was in vogue. Ravel had produced during that period his "Daphnis et Chloe"; Debussy had written three ballets; Roussel had written a few. But none of these had created the unprecedented sensations which resulted from Stravinsky's "Oiseau de Feu" and "Petrouchka." What was there about these works that made them so popular?

In the first place, they were musically different. While "L'Oiseau de Feu" saps here and there of Debussy, there is nevertheless a strong tendency toward an individualism which found its full fruition in "Petrouchka" and "Sacre du Printemps." There was, in all three of these works, a new harmonic idiom, coupled with the most dazzling orchestral coloring, so indispensable to Russian music. There was even confusion of tonalities, complication of rhythms, and at times lack of both. It is music which demands action for its appreciation.

Then came the war. And now that it's over, and things may seem to commence settling down to something like normal, folks have somehow become more serious, thinks Stravinsky, and are tired of ballets. And so, he has commenced to "study up" on the classics; and one of the results of this study is the "Capriccio," a work which, though very modern, (for no reason at all other than to be just a little different), nevertheless has strong tonal tendencies. The work ends semi-tumultuously, on a solid G-Major chord; and more than once do we find our composer landing on solid major or minor triads. There is a perfectly nice section in this if you please. And yet, with all this return to definite tonalities, the work is light and almost frivolous. Stravinsky has said his bit in his ballets. All, or practically all, that follows these is of less serious consequence. There may be attempts to make the "Capriccio" a sensational piece; but there isn't enough material of importance to produce this effect. Certainly, while we welcome a return to concord, a work such as this can never hope to be called great, as the word great goes nowadays. No. Not until Stravinsky has studied the three B's a bit more, can he hope to equal any one or all three of them.

JOHN J. DUFFY.

Hartford, Feb. 16, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAYTON, O.
NEWS

Deserved Tribute Is Paid Composer Who Has Reached His Seventieth Milestone

BY W. J. HENDERSON

NEW YORK, Feb. 21.—Some years ago—never mind just when; dates are dry food—Arthur Whiting, musician, composer, scholar and observer, gave a musical party. It was a coming-out party. The debutant was not a fair maiden, but a group of songs. The place was the Whiting studio. About 30 men gathered in the room. There were fire light, the dull glow of lamps and the enshrouding veil of fragrant tobacco smoke. Before the songs were sung Vincent D'Indy, composer of the "Ishtar," variations and high priest of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, read with elegant diction the text by Paul Verlaine, from which the songs were made. Then we heard the music.

Francis Rogers sang the lyrics, Arthur Whiting played the piano, and the composer of the songs played the viola obbligato. After the group had been revealed to us, we had an interval for conversation, beer, sandwiches and continued smoke. Then we resumed our seats and the songs were sung again. It was in the intermission that Walter Damrosch said to his brother:

"Frank, this man Loeffler has something that the rest of them have not."

And that was straight talk. It took many of them years to find it out and there are dullards in the world of music who do not know it yet. However, there are celebrations just now because Charles Martin Loeffler has attained the biblical threescore and ten. He has been dwelling for several years in the seclusion of his home in Medford, Mass., but Boston, which knew him when he sat at the first desk of its great orchestra beside Franz Kneisel, has drawn him out of his den and turned the white light of its approbation upon him.

What Walter Damrosch said was the pitch of the whole matter. Loeffler is one of the composers who was developed under the spread of the Debussy influence of music. Loeffler's art is inconceivable except as part of the beginning of the modernist advance. But it is none the less strikingly original and distinguished by certain qualities of imaginative creation and by aristocracy of style. Loeffler, the reflective, introspective and highly cultivated man, the student of Vergil and Horace, the lover of long natural vistas and of the thoughts of men, speaks in every work, whether it be the "Death of Tintagiles," the "Pagan Poem" or the "Villanelle du Diable."

It is fitting that this musician should be honored by his fellows. He has lived in this country many years and is an American citizen. He was born and studied abroad, but he is thoroughly Americanized. He is at any rate the foremost composer in this country. More than that, he is one of the foremost composers of his time. The world of music, not only here but across the seas, has reason to be proud of him.

* * *

The Boston symphony orchestra has a remarkable history. Older music lovers will recall the seasons when at the first two desks sat Kneisel and Loeffler, Tim Adamowski and Otto Roth, all of whom appeared at various times as solo artists at concerts of the organization. On one occasion Mr. Loeffler was not only soloist, but composer. This was at the fourth concert of the 12th season of the orchestra in this city. It was in the Metropolitan Opera House. The program comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mr. Loeffler's divertimento for violin and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, the customary three excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" and "Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade." Mr. Loeffler was the soloist in his own work. Mr. Kneisel played the Rimsky-Korsakov music.

Just why violinists who are none too well supplied with material, do not examine this piece is a subject for wonder. It is not one of Mr. Loeffler's loftiest creations, but it is distinctly good violin stuff and grateful for the soloist. It is in three movements, preamble, "Eclogue" (the classic view of the composer already characteristic) and "Carnival des Mortes." This finale is a set of brilliant variations on the "Dies Irae." The composition is rich in melody, color and effective orchestration.

It is crowded with difficulties and perhaps in these days might be rudely pushed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso piece, but since violinists persistently perform compositions which have only technical displays to recommend them, this divertimento of Loeffler, which is also good music, might be worth at least one hearing. It is not necessary to descant upon the merits of the composer's better known works. They deserve to enjoy a long period of active life. They possess individuality and musical beauty of a high order.

See Page 141 for Feb. comments

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
FEB 22 1931

Symphony to Resume Its Season Here

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

Boston Symphony Festival.

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been observed in various ways throughout the year, will culminate in a Bach Festival in March. There will be, in a series of concerts beginning March 24, two performances of the B minor mass, given each time in two parts, afternoon and evening, a very sensible idea; two orchestral suites and two of the Brandenburg concertos; piano pieces, organ pieces, a concerto for two violins, four cantatas and the Magnificat.

Quite a lot of Bach for one short week. The choral forces engaged are the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, both of which organizations Dr. Archibald T. Davison is conductor, and the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Goodrich, conductor. Also, of course, numerous soloists. Dr. (honoris causa? Serge Koussevitzky will be, naturally, generalissimo of this impressive array of performers.

In great part, indeed, principally, the whole celebration will be held to honor the memory of Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra in 1881. No more devoted patron of music has ever lived. A man of great wealth, he paid, year after year, the very considerable deficits of the orchestra. He was the first, though not the last, American Maecenas.

Real Benefactor.

Then came the war, and the profoundly regrettable Karl Muck incident, which may well, at this late day, be consigned to oblivion. No citizen of Boston has ever deserved better of his fellow townsmen than Col. Higginson.

And not only in Boston should his name be held in high esteem. More than any other man he was instrumental in spreading the gospel of lofty orchestral standards throughout the land. For in the old days the Boston Orchestra traveled extensively, giving concerts in all parts of the country.

An interesting feature of this 50th anniversary season has been the large number of new works by celebrated composers specially written for it. There have been first performances of scores by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas and Respighi as the foreign contributions, and works by Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson to hold up the American end.

Finally, it is worthy of particular note that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, came over from England to direct the first concert of the jubilee season, repeating the original initial program of 50 years ago. Talk about your hardy veterans!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
FEB 24 1931

Pleads in War Time for German Musician

During the war, when the American public had foolishly banned German music at the Metropolitan Opera House and concert halls, Melba came to me one day in a most agitated state of mind.

"You must aid me," she commanded, "your pen can help one of my close friends."

I was the music critic of an important newspaper at that time, and I assured the excited celebrity that my column was at her disposition.

"Help Muck," she said. "He is not a German spy. I know that he is not, but I cannot speak in his behalf. I am responsible for his presence in the United States, for I persuaded Charles Ellis to engage him as conductor of the Boston Symphony. He is one of the world's greatest musicians, but his enemies have vowed to destroy him. There is not a single shred of evidence to prove that he is a spy, but the Federal authorities have discovered another reason for sending him to the Atlanta penitentiary. I cannot tell you now, but I shall when the war is over. But take my word. He is guiltless of espionage."

At the risk of being suspected of Germanic sympathies I, in so far as I was able, did write in defense of this genius of the baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
FEB 25 1931

Boston Programs.

Novelty on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will be Edward Burlingame Hill's new Symphony written for the jubilee anniversary year of the orchestra. The composer is a Cambridge man and for some time has been on the faculty of Harvard university in the department of music. Besides many compositions in the smaller forms he has written a number of orchestral works, some of which the Boston orchestra has presented from time to time. In addition he has contributed many articles on various musical topics to magazines and the press. The programs this week will be notable also for the assistance of Jascha Heifetz, violinist, who will play the Beethoven Concerto for violin and orchestra. Other pieces on the list will be an Entr' act from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and the Egmont Overture of Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 27 1931

Illustrious Half Century of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emal Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory —new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
FEB 28 1931

Boston Symphony at Smith College.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Smith College will be made Tuesday night. Serge Koussivitsky will conduct. The program has not reached us, but Koussivitsky is sure to arrange an attractive program, with a novelty or two included. Needless to write, tickets will be at a premium.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 27 1931

CRITIC WILL DESCRIBE SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Dr. W. Louis Chapman to Speak Sunday in Providence Public Library.

An informal music talk, descriptive of the Providence Symphony Society's concert March 8, will be given Sunday afternoon in the children's rooms of the Providence Public Library by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal. As has been the case with Dr. Chapman's similar talks prior to the Boston Symphony concerts, the lecture is sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

Dr. Chapman will consider the program announced by Wassili Leps, conductor for the special testimonial concert in honor of Roswell H. Fairman. The speaker will use the piano and other instruments for a demonstration of the themes in the three principal works, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, Weber's Euryanthe Overture and Mozart's Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

The lecture will begin at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 28 1931

Illustrious Half Century of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emal Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory —new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1903
Max Fiedler	1903-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAM
FEB 28 1931

Psalm Symphony To Be Played Here

Igor Stravinsky's latest work, the "Symphony of Psalms," written specially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be introduced to New York at the Carnegie Hall concert of the orchestra next Thursday evening and repeated in the same hall next Saturday afternoon. The score is a setting of Psalms XXXVIII., XXXIX. and CL. The assisting chorus will be that of the Schola Cantorum.

Arthur Honegger's new symphony, which was likewise composed for the Boston orchestra's anniversary, will be another "first time in New York" at the Thursday concert. To open the program Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen Handel's twelfth concerto grosso for string orchestra; to close it, Ravel's "La Valse."

The Saturday program will open with Handel's sixth concerto grosso for string orchestra and close with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes." The concert's novelty will be Edward Burlingame Hill's second symphony, in C major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 28 1931

Illustrious Half Century of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emal Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory —new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
FEB 28 1931

VARIATIONS

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Melba, the greatest vocalist of her day, is dead and with her passing only Sembrich remains to carry on the traditions of the "Golden Age of Music" through her teaching. Melba sang until the last and so great was her art that although the top notes of early days were gone the middle voice had warmed and grown so that she gave pleasure whenever she sang.

According to available records Melba sang here twice, the first time in 1895 at a festival of the Hampden County Musical Association directed by George W. Chadwick and a second time when she was brought here in 1915 by Edward H. Marsh.

In spite of the great demands made upon her Melba was most conscientious in keeping her dates. She was forced to cancel her concert for Mr. Marsh and several thousand dollars was returned but she was reengaged and arrived in the city suffering from a high temperature but she kept her engagement because she had been forced to cancel the first time.

Back on the Discs.

The approaching Bach Festival in Boston, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next month, brings to mind the wide interest in Bach music in the past few years. The Bach vogue seems to have started when Haroid Samuel, the English pianist, was brought to this country for one of the Coolidge festivals in Pittsfield. At his first New York recital Samuel created a sensation and has had a brilliant career in this country ever since.

In line with the Bach vogue various recording companies issued series of Bach discs and one company alone has issued 16 compositions. One may now hear piano recordings of the "English Suite in A minor"; the Prelude and Fugue in C minor" and the Sarabande. There are organ recordings of the Prelude and Fugue in G major and E minor, the "Fugue in C minor," the "Fantasia in C minor," aria from the "Orchestra Suite in D" and the allegro from "Sonata No. 1." The great "Missa Sollenes" has been recorded in its entirety and new Bach discs are coming out at frequent intervals. With the finest Bach interpreters making these recordings they are of inestimable value from the educational standpoint as well as for historical purposes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST
FEB 28 1931

Symphonies by Philharmonic

One Novelty on Toscanini's Program—Boston Orchestra in Three Numbers New to New York

TWO symphonies, one not in the repertory since 1886, will make up next week's program of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arturo Toscanini. Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, in E major, has not been played by the orchestra since November 13, 1886, when Theodore Thomas was conductor; Thomas gave it first in this country in Chicago July 29 of the same year. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is the other, which will be given in Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening, Friday afternoon, Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. Tomorrow afternoon the program in the Metropolitan Opera House will consist of the Overture to Weber's "Oberon," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, and Dvorak's "From the New World" Symphony. A week from today will come the last children's morning concert of the season under the direction of Ernest Schelling, when a request program will be given and prizes awarded to the children who have sent in the best notebooks.

Serge Koussevitzky will present at both concerts of the Boston Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon "Symphonie de Psaumes" by Igor Stravinsky This is the Russian composer's latest work, which was written especially for the fiftieth anniversary of this orchestra and has had its first performance in Boston. The score is a musical setting of Psalms XXXVIII, XXXIX and CL. A chorus from the Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, conductor, will sing the vocal part. Honegger's recently completed symphony, which likewise was composed especially for the orchestra's anniversary and was first performed in Boston on February 13 and 14, will also be introduced to New York at the Thursday evening concert. The concert will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 for string orchestra and close with Ravel's "La Valse." The matinee concert will open with another Concerto Grosso of Handel—No. 6 for string orchestra—and, in addition to Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," will include a performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's Symphony in C Major, No. 2, to be heard for the first time in New York. The afternoon will close with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

March 8 will be Deems Taylor's lovely "Through the Looking Glass," conducted by the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

Notes of Music Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 5 and 7.

Serge Koussevitzky will present at both concerts the "Symphonie de Psaumes" by Igor Stravinsky. This is the Russian composer's latest work, which was written especially for the fiftieth anniversary of this orchestra and has had its first performance in Boston. A chorus from the Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, conductor, will sing the vocal part. Honegger's recently completed symphony, which likewise was composed especially for the orchestra's anniversary and was first performed in Boston on February 13 and 14, will also be introduced to New York at the Thursday evening concert. The concert will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 for string orchestra and close with Ravel's "La Valse."

The matinee concert will open with another concerto grosso of Handel, No. 6 for string orchestra, and in addition to Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" will include a performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's symphony in C major No. 2, to be heard for the first time in New York. The afternoon will close with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
FEB 22 1931

Symphony to Resume Its Season Here

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.
Boston Symphony Festival.

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been observed in various ways throughout the year, will culminate in a Bach Festival in March. There will be, in a series of concerts beginning March 24, two performances of the B minor mass, given each time in two parts, afternoon and evening—a very sensible idea; two orchestral suites and two of the Brandenburg concertos; piano pieces, organ pieces, a concerto for two violins, four cantatas and the Magnificat.

Quite a lot of Bach for one short week. The choral forces engaged are the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, both of which organizations Dr. Archibald T. Davison is conductor, and the Bach Cantata Club, C. Wallace Goodrich, conductor. Also, of course, numerous soloists. Dr. chonoris causa? Serge Koussevitzky will be, naturally, generalissimo of this impressive array of performers.

In great part, indeed, principally, the whole celebration will be held to honor the memory of Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra in 1881. No more devoted patron of music has ever lived. A man of great wealth, he paid, year after year, the very considerable deficits of the orchestra. He was the first, though not the last, American Maecenas.

Real Benefactor.

Then came the war, and the profoundly regrettable Karl Muck incident, which may well, at this late day, be consigned to oblivion. No citizen of Boston has ever deserved better of his fellow townsmen than Col. Higginson.

And not only in Boston should his name be held in high esteem. More than any other man he was instrumental in spreading the gospel of lofty orchestral standards throughout the land. For in the old days the Boston Orchestra traveled extensively, giving concerts in all parts of the country.

An interesting feature of this 50th anniversary season has been the large number of new works by celebrated composers specially written for it. There have been first performances of scores by Stravinsky, Honegger, Prokofieff, Roussel, Dukas and Respighi as the foreign contributions, and works by Copland, Hill, Carpenter and Hanson to hold up the American end.

Finally, it is worthy of particular note that Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, came over from England to direct the first concert of the jubilee season, repeating the original initial program of 50 years ago. Talk about your hardy veterans!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL
FEB 24 1931

Pleads in War Time for German Musician

During the war, when the American public had foolishly banned German music at the Metropolitan Opera House and concert halls, Melba came to me one day in a most agitated state of mind.

"You must aid me," she commanded, "your pen can help one of my close friends."

I was the music critic of an important newspaper at that time, and I assured the excited celebrity that my column was at her disposition.

"Help Muck," she said. "He is not a German spy. I know that he is not, but I cannot speak in his behalf. I am responsible for his presence in the United States, for I persuaded Charles Ellis to engage him as conductor of the Boston Symphony. He is one of the world's greatest musicians, but his enemies have vowed to destroy him. There is not a single shred of evidence to prove that he is a spy, but the Federal authorities have discovered another reason for sending him to the Atlanta penitentiary. I cannot tell you now, but I shall when the war is over. But take my word. He is guiltless of espionage."

At the risk of being suspected of Germanic sympathies I, in so far as I was able, did write in defense of this genius of the baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
FEB 25 1931

Boston Programs.

Novelty on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will be Edward Burlingame Hill's new Symphony written for the jubilee anniversary year of the orchestra. The composer is a Cambridge man and for some time has been on the faculty of Harvard university in the department of music. Besides many compositions in the smaller forms he has written a number of orchestral works, some of which the Boston orchestra has presented from time to time. In addition he has contributed many articles on various musical topics to magazines and the press. The programs this week will be notable also for the assistance of Jascha Heifetz, violinist, who will play the Beethoven Concerto for violin and orchestra. Other pieces on the list will be an Entr' act from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and the Egmont Overture of Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 27 1931

Illustrious Half Century of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emal Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory —new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
FEB 28 1931

Boston Symphony at Smith College.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Smith College will be made Tuesday night. Serge Koussivitsky will conduct. The program has not reached us, but Koussivitsky is sure to arrange an attractive program, with a novelty or two included. Needless to write, tickets will be at a premium.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 27 1931

CRITIC WILL DESCRIBE SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Dr. W. Louis Chapman to Speak Sunday in Providence Public Library.

An informal music talk, descriptive of the Providence Symphony Society's concert March 8, will be given Sunday afternoon in the children's rooms of the Providence Public Library by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal. As has been the case with Dr. Chapman's similar talks prior to the Boston Symphony concerts, the lecture is sponsored by the Monday Morning Musical Club.

Dr. Chapman will consider the program announced by Wassili Leps, conductor for the special testimonial concert in honor of Roswell H. Fairman. The speaker will use the piano and other instruments for a demonstration of the themes in the three principal works, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, Weber's Euryanthe Overture and Mozart's Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

The lecture will begin at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 28 1931

Illustrious Half Century of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emal Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory —new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

...tions

By ...

...day, is dead and ... Sembrich remains to carry on the traditions of the "Golden Age of Music" through her teaching. Melba sang until the last and so great was her art that although the top notes of early days were gone the middle voice had warmed and grown so that she gave pleasure whenever she sang.

According to available records Melba sang here twice, the first time in 1895 at a festival of the Hampden County Musical Association directed by George W. Chadwick and a second time when she was brought here in 1915 by Edward H. Marsh.

In spite of the great demands made upon her Melba was most conscientious in keeping her dates. She was forced to cancel her concert for Mr. Marsh and several thousand dollars was returned but she was reengaged and arrived in the city suffering from a high temperature but she kept her engagement because she had been forced to cancel the first time.

Back on the Discs.

The approaching Bach Festival in Boston, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next month, brings to mind the wide interest in Bach music in the past few years. The Bach vogue seems to have started when Haroid Samuel, the English pianist, was brought to this country for one of the Coolidge festivals in Pittsfield. At his first New York recital Samuel created a sensation and has had a brilliant career in this country ever since.

In line with the Bach vogue various recording companies issued series of Bach discs and one company alone has issued 16 compositions. One may now hear piano recordings of the "English Suite in A minor"; the Prelude and Fugue in C minor" and the Sarabande. There are organ recordings of the Prelude and Fugue in G major and E minor, the "Fugue in C minor," the "Fantasia in C minor," aria from the "Orchestra Suite in D" and the allegro from "Sonata No. 1." The great "Missa Sollenes" has been recorded in its entirety and new Bach discs are coming out at frequent intervals. With the finest Bach interpreters making these recordings they are of inestimable value from the educational stand-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 28 1931

Illustrious Half Century of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emal Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory —new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The full chronology of the conductors follows:

George Henschel	1881-1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884-1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889-1893
Emil Paur	1893-1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898-1906
Karl Muck	1906-1908
Max Fiedler	1908-1912
Karl Muck	1912-1918
Henri Rabaud	1918-1919
Pierre Monteux	1919-1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST
FEB 28 1931

Symphonies by Philharmonic

One Novelty on Toscanini's Program—Boston Orchestra in Three Numbers New to New York

TWO symphonies, one not in the repertory since 1886, will make up next week's program of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arturo Toscanini. Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, in E major, has not been played by the orchestra since November 13, 1886, when Theodore Thomas was conductor; Thomas gave it first in this country in Chicago July 29 of the same year. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is the other, which will be given in Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening, Friday afternoon, Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. Tomorrow afternoon the program in the Metropolitan Opera House will consist of the Overture to Weber's "Oberon," Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, and Dvorak's "From the New World" Symphony. A week from today will come the last children's morning concert of the season under the direction of Ernest Schelling, when a request program will be given and prizes awarded to the children who have sent in the best notebooks.

Serge Koussevitzky will present at both concerts of the Boston Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon "Symphonie de Psaumes" by Igor Stravinsky This is the Russian composer's latest work, which was written especially for the fiftieth anniversary of this orchestra and has had its first performance in Boston. The score is a musical setting of Psalms XXXVIII, XXXIX and CL. A chorus from the Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, conductor, will sing the vocal part. Honegger's recently completed symphony, which likewise was composed especially for the orchestra's anniversary and was first performed in Boston on February 13 and 14, will also be introduced to New York at the Thursday evening concert. The concert will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 for string orchestra and close with Ravel's "La Valse." The matinee concert will open with another Concerto Grosso of Handel—No. 6 for string orchestra—and, in addition to Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," will include a performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's Symphony in C Major, No. 2, to be heard for the first time in New York. The afternoon will close with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

Mischa Levitzki will be the soloist with the symphony orchestra of 200 led by Erno Rapee tomorrow morning in the Roxy Theatre, playing Liszt's Piano Concerto in E flat. The orchestra will also be heard in Beethoven's First Symphony and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." A feature of the concert March 8 will be Deems Taylor's lovely "Through the Looking Glass," conducted by the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

Notes of Music Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 5 and 7.

Serge Koussevitzky will present at both concerts the "Symphonie de Psaumes" by Igor Stravinsky. This is the Russian composer's latest work, which was written especially for the fiftieth anniversary of this orchestra and has had its first performance in Boston. A chorus from the Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, conductor, will sing the vocal part. Honegger's recently completed symphony, which likewise was composed especially for the orchestra's anniversary and was first performed in Boston on February 13 and 14, will also be introduced to New York at the Thursday evening concert. The concert will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 for string orchestra and close with Ravel's "La Valse."

The matinee concert will open with another concerto grosso of Handel, No. 6 for string orchestra, and in addition to Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" will include a performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's symphony in C major No. 2, to be heard for the first time in New York. The afternoon will close with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

136

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

FEB 8 1931

HUB SYMPHONY NEXT THURSDAY

On next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Woolsey Hall, the event climaxing one of the finest season's of fine music that this city has ever enjoyed. Serge Koussevitsky, the Orchestra's great Russian leader, will conduct the concert, and the occasion takes on particular significance by reason of the fact that this is the 50th anniversary year of the organization. Many of the programs that have been given this season have been planned to commemorate the reaching of the Boston Symphony's half-century milestone, and the list of numbers New Haven will hear were selected with this thought in mind.

A new symphony by Honegger, written especially for the Orchestra's anniversary, will be one of the principal numbers played here next Wednesday. The piece was recently played for the first time in Boston, and was pronounced both a success and the masterpiece of the French composer up to this time.

Another important rendition will be the Caprice on Spanish themes by Rimsky-Korsakov, one of the most brilliant of all orchestral pieces and that it will be tremendously acclaimed there is no doubt.

Other numbers on the program will include a concerto grosso for string orchestra by Handel, and two Wagner pieces, one the Ride of the Valkyries from 'Die' Walkure" and the other the Perlude to "Lohengrin".

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards a phenomenon then unknown in America. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the Orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the Orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. The came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did Emil Paud and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony Hall, the Orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the Orchestra to an unprecedental degree of virtuosity and beauty.

In his 84th year, the Orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The complete program and order of numbers for the forthcoming concert is as folows:

Handel ..... Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra Op. 6, No. 12.
Honegger ..... Symphony
I. Allegro marcato
II. Adagio
III. Presto
(Composed for the 50th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)
Ten minute intermission.
Wagner ..... Ride of the Valkries from "Die Walkure"
Wagner .. Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsakov ..... Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
I. Alborada
II. Variations

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

FEB 28 1931

part in the jousting. Heading the New Haven cast will be Emer Scarra, Mount Carmel state amateu heavyweight champion, who will b given another real opponent in th ctar bout of the evening's presen tation.

In addition to Scarra, Stanle Bethke, also of Mount Carmel, wil also appear under the Arena A. C colors. Bethke, a novice welter weight, fought twice on the last am ateur card and won inside of round on each occasion. Considere a real comer because of his spee and punching power, Bethke is ex pected to develop into a highly ef fective gloveman, before the end o the current indoor season.

Bob Riccio, a veteran lightweight will also represent the Arena gym Riccio made several brilliant fight on other amateur programs at th Arena, where he was a real favor

McClelland Referee Of Bout In Miami

Miami, Fla., Feb. 27 (AP)—The Miami Boxing commission today announced the appointment of Elmer (Slim) McClelland, Detroit, to referee the ten-round fight between Primo Carnera and Jimmy Maloney here March 5.

McClelland was picked over Johnny Martin, Boston, whose selection was advocated by Dan Carroll, Maloney's manager.

The referee will have full power as to the decision of the contest inasmuch as the boxing commission decided not to require three judges as has been customary.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

FEB 28 1931

STRAVINSKY—PSALMIST.

About the last thing any one expected Igor Stravinsky, creator of the pagan "Rite of Spring," to turn to for inspiration was the Psalms. But that is precisely what he has done in his latest work, "The Symphony of Psalms," and it will be disclosed for the first time next Thursday by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra.

On this same program will also be Arthur Honegger's new symphony (both this and the Stravinsky music were written especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra). Handel and Ravel will fill out the evening. E. W. Hill's new symphony will replace the Honegger work at the Saturday concert.

Arturo Toscanini's next program with the Philharmonic, which will be given four times next week, beginning Wednesday, holds Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth.

Symphony Conc

Old Concerto, New Symphony, Rare Fragment

Resurrection from Chabrier, Heifetz and Beethoven, Mr. Hill Virtuoso

THOUGH the polite program-book makes no such distinction, an "assisting artist" is one thing at the Symphony Concerts, a "soloist" another. The "assisting artist" comes to serve the needs of a piece of music. Usually it is a "novelty" or a "revival." The conductor would include it in a pair of concerts. It contains a solo-part. No doubt, X, Y or Z would "get it up" for the sake of an appearance with a celebrated orchestra. He might even be interested in the piece for itself. X, Y or Z accepts the invitation—and the honorarium; plays the solo-part ably; if he is clear-minded, foresees his own fate. The discriminating will regard him as an accessory to the piece in hand, blending applause for him with applause for it and the composer. The casual may resent both and, subconsciously, let this distaste cool their warmths toward him. At best he is shackled to a task. He cannot soar through his own glories. He must be a very clear-minded virtuoso to count the piece and the occasion more important than himself.

Not so with the "soloist" in the full sense of the word. He also may come because the conductor desires to set a particular piece upon a program. Usually it is a classic Concerto, long familiar. Two audiences will listen to it as to a thing of custom; whereas they will hear the "soloist" as occasion for rare pleasure. They already know him as eminent hand upon violin or piano. Rightly enough, they believe him summoned that the given Concerto may shine anew in the radiance of his perfections. They will receive him as the whole house, yesterday, received Mr. Heifetz when he came to his place by the conductor's stand. The season through, for no "soloist"—not even for Mr. Gieseking—has there been such a burst of applause, so long, hearty and general. In five months, more rapt ears have not followed any piece played at these concerts. The first audience for this Violin-Concerto of Beethoven could hardly have listened more intent. "Publicity counsellors" and devotees of Mr. Heifetz may be left to number the recalls at the end. As usual Dr. Koussevitzky forsook the stage; but it is an old story that no conductor, within memory at the Symphony Concerts, is so solicitous as he with the orchestral part of a Concerto. Felicitous as well, since he fuses the whole into a symphonic piece, yet not once overclouds the "soloist."

The poised Heifetz is an objective musician. He sees the music before him clear and whole; hears it in character. Beethoven, in these middle years, preferred the violin as a songful instrument; wrote for it and for his friend, Clementi, a lyric Concerto. The so-called knocking motiv may haunt the first movement; the finale may run away into crisp rhythm and exuberant phrase. Throughout, however, it is the first concern of the violin to be songful. It is variously such over the long Allegro. In the slow division it sounds and transfigures melody. Not once through the whole Concerto did Mr. Heifetz depart from this particular and pervading quality. As he played them, the cadenzas—from his master, Auer—reiterated this quality. In spite of its air of lyric innocence, the Concerto contains exacting, even displayful, measures, as virtuoso-fiddling went in 1806. Mr. Heifetz took them so evenly, so easily, that the listener felt rather than perceived—much less considered—this mastery. It came and went as the impression of the passing moment.

The Concerto is not a highly emotionalized music. The scale is less ambitious and aspiring, the musical thought less deep, the creative ardor less glowing than they were to be in Beethoven's next Concerto—"The Emperor" for the piano. There is not even the poetized conflict of orchestra and piano that perpetuates the slow movement of the preceding Concerto in G major. Violin and orchestra go amiably, sympathetically. They join together in euphonies melting upon the ear. Or the orchestra sets in a luminous background, stream-like, for the flowing violin. The "knocking" phrase animates, rather than troubles, the first movement. The engrossing Heifetz left room for more than a thought of Dr. Koussevitzky's sensibility to every curve, accent and shading, of his quick ear and instant hand for every fusion or contrast of solo and orchestral parts; of a unanimity that bound together composer, conductor and violinist in a single voice and style.

Violin and orchestra are, indeed, embarked by Beethoven's will upon a single-hearted quest. They seek, all three, the beauty which only music may compass and convey. It is born in this Concerto of no external suggestion. It springs from no inner emotional conflict. It is a self-contained passion for an ideal beauty of songful sound in the particular voice of the violin. The Allegro gains it variously in a gentle fervor of creation. In the Larghetto the violin and the orchestra first speak it one to another; then the violin takes it to itself; carries it, as a bird wings upward, through the last ineffable measures. The orchestra recalls the violin to the light vigors of the finale; but through the interstices still plays that beauty in another phase.

Whatever the music, this disembodied beauty of sound, pellucid, unflawed, finely measured, is the essence of Mr. Heifetz's violin-playing. Yesterday he had only to join the beauty which he emanates to the kindred beauty which Beethoven would create. From first bar to last, the jointure was complete and unbroken, equally of the spirit within and the tone without. Kreisler and Muck, Heifetz and Koussevitzky—twice within twenty years Beethoven's Violin-Concerto has been Ariel's music of an enchanted air.

It is the moment for an intermezzo about another rare performance. The Introduction to the Second Act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," began the concert. On paper, it seemed a convenience. For the congenitally tardy must be served, lest their late and inconsiderate entrances disturb—as they did yesterday—more important music. And "Gwendoline" itself? One of the operas written in Paris when the example of Wagner was potent upon the generation of the eighties. Perhaps, the best of them; now fallen out of the repertory everywhere, preserved only by an Overture and this Introduction. To lift the curtain upon an amorous second act, Chabrier wrote misty, longing, dreamful measures; distributed them to the woodwinds and the strings of a hushed orchestra; swelled them to climax; bade them droop and sigh and vanish into silence. Dr. Koussevitzky and his choirs played them with a diaphanous beauty and a gentle intensity renewing and transfiguring Chabrier's pages. The effect was momentary; but it vies in recollection with that of the Concerto itself.

Finally to the new Symphony of Professor Hill, in C major and the full panoply of four movements, played for the first time, and in the applauded presence of the composer. His fellow townsfolk do not forget his services in Boston and Cambridge to the art of music; to that art liberalized and falling upon open ears and minds. Before them of late he has proved his maturing quality as composer, excelling with the concentration of full-furnished years the more desultory adventures of younger days. If their applause yesterday seemed more hesitant than of old, the explanation is the nature of this second Symphony.

For it seemed, in the casual impressions of first performance, a virtuoso-music. It is entirely self-contained. It addresses itself wholly to the creation of a musical substance and a musical movement that shall generate purely musical reactions. It abounds with ready resource. It teems with adroit devices. A manifold craftsmanship never declines into routine or academic exercise, sustaining momentum, keeping animation throughout. By the same token it is a Symphony of this immediate day, frankly but not calculatingly modernistic: neither mannered nor opinionated; preferring the play of sonorities, rhythms, timbres to emotionalized or poetized expression; a young man's Symphony, were youth to be blessed with the readiness and abundance of Mr. Hill at middle age.

The first movement passes swiftly, vividly—with inexhaustible rhythmic flexibility, quick changes of pace and mood, diversified and animated working of the musical material, spirited and pointed play of instrumental voices. Throughout go the modern freedoms, the modern vitalizing, upon orthodox form. . . . The following scherzo is virtuoso exercise with rhythmic figures, driven at high speed, whipped and colored with fancy; relaxing this tonal sport for brief lyric interludes; never reiterating, beating nothing out too thin. . . . The succeeding slow movement develops and enriches a single musical thought; forego rhythmic flexibility for rhythmic intensity; searches out darker timbres; ebbs and flows sensitively; swells into broad or deep sonority. . . . The finale returns to the rhythmic energy, the vitalizing freedom, the animation and urgency of the beginning—to the end a quick-spirited, unflagging music, be the hand upon it vigorous or light.

A virtuoso-symphony—the listener repeated to himself—peradventure a brilliant symphony; such a symphony as should go into European festivals of contemporary music to prove that an American composer can do that sort of thing and do it notably well. Then came the reservations. By the evidence of those very qualities, Mr. Hill has written a cosmopolitan Symphony that any composer of his abilities might have accomplished anywhere. There are no marks of an environment and a soil; whereas Mr. Hill's first Symphony sounded out of New England; was seldom tuned to an eclectic modernism. Yet again—scarcely one of Mr. Hill's motivs in this Second Symphony lays immediate hold on the ear; individualizes itself to the listening mind. At first hearing, they sound as matter for treatment, and that treatment soon becomes everything. . . . But a composer has unquestionable right to make a symphony in whatever mood and to whatever end may possess him.

H. T. P.

PERFORMANCE BY HEIFETZ BRILLIANT

By MOSES SMITH

Jascha Heifetz is the soloist at this week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, and naturally he overshadows the rest of the program. Though he has played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra only twice previously, using the Beethoven Concerto in 1919, he again selected this masterpiece.

His performance at the matinee of yesterday was great—if you put back in that word the meaning it has lost in this age of superlatives. Heifetz played with the flawless technical skill, beauty of tone and exquisite musicality that made him a unique figure among violinists. Only an occasional distortion of rhythm could prevent one's calling this performance as fine an interpretation of Beethoven's classic score as Heifetz gave two years ago in the Brahms Concerto. And the latter was, in our estimation, the finest violin playing Boston has heard in the decade and a half during which we have frequented local concert halls.

Heifetz emphasis was primarily lyrical, and so was Mr. Koussevitzky's with the orchestral part. Sensitively as many phrases were moulded by the conductor, however, and beautiful as many passages were, there were spots when the accompaniment was—to blurt out an ugly word—incompetent. Whether, in these places, the fault was the orchestral players' or Mr. Koussevitzky's

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A new symphony, No. 2 in C major, by Edward Burlingame Hill, graced the program of the seventeenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Feb. 27 and 28 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Besides boasting a definite tonality, this novelty had the added distinction of not having been written for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra.

"The second symphony, like the first," said the composer in a note contributed to the program book, "has no descriptive background, no literary quotations appended. I find myself in sympathy with those of the younger generation who feel that music has enough intrinsic problems of its own without adding those of other arts." And this professor of music in Harvard University adds: "I have kept to the traditional forms, thinking I had not had sufficient experience to experiment."

Mr. Hill's style is much the same whether he is setting down notes or words, except that musically he speaks mainly French. His new score, dedicated to his colleague, Prof. Walter R. Spalding, opens with a movement in sonata form in which the principal theme has the "feminine" quality usually associated with a second theme. Then comes a Scherzo with Trio. The third is the slow movement, marked "Maestoso ma non troppo lento." The Finale is an "Allegro energico." All is logical and orderly.

The musical ideas of the composer are characteristically his own, the idiom in which he conveys them that of the modern French school. This symphony therefore, though more considerable, is a companion piece to its author's Symphony in B flat and his "Lilacs," after Amy Lowell's poem. Rhythmic patterns are perhaps somewhat more complex than in the former works, but the influence of the modern Russians is slight. It is hardly necessary to add that in both composition and orchestration, the symphony is the work of a master hand. It was received with marked favor.

The other principal item of the program was the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Probably any lingering trace of the notion that Heifetz is "cold" had been destroyed in the symphony audiences by this artist's performance of the Brahms Concerto two years ago. Certainly no one could have found coldness in the player's tone in the lovely melody of the slow movement in the concert under review. The performance was of course masterly throughout (including the orchestral accompaniment), and the ovation was prolonged until after the soloist had brought back Dr. Koussevitzky to share in it.

The program opened with the Prelude to Act II from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," a charming bit of lavender and old lace which the audience viewed apathetically. The final item was the "Egmont" Overture.

L. A. S.

SCIENCE MONITOR.

136

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

FEB 8 1931

HUB SYMPHONY NEXT THURSDAY

On next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Woolsey Hall, the event climaxing one of the finest season's of fine music that this city has ever enjoyed. Serge Koussevitsky, the Orchestra's great Russian leader, will conduct the concert, and the occasion takes on particular significance by reason of the fact that this is the 50th anniversary year of the organization. Many of the programs that have been given this season have been planned to commemorate the reaching of the Boston Symphony's half-century milestone, and the list of numbers New Haven will hear were selected with this thought in mind.

A new symphony by Honegger, written especially for the Orchestra's anniversary, will be one of the principal numbers played here next Wednesday. The piece was recently played for the first time in Boston, and was pronounced both a success and the masterpiece of the French composer up to this time.

Another important rendition will be the Caprice on Spanish themes by Rimsky-Korsakov, one of the most brilliant of all orchestral pieces and that it will be tremendously acclaimed there is no doubt.

Other numbers on the program will include a concerto grosso for string orchestra by Handel, and two Wagner pieces, one the Ride of the Valkyries from 'Die' Walkure" and the other the Perlude to "Lohengrin".

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards a phenomenon then unknown in America. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the Orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the Orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. The same Wilhelm Gericke, who throughout 12 years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, the most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did Emil Paud and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony Hall, the Orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the Orchestra to an unprecedental degree of virtuosity and beauty.

In his 84th year, the Orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors; Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. The great Russian leader has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertoire—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

The complete program and order of numbers for the forthcoming concert is as folows:

Handel ..... Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra Op. 6, No. 12.
Honegger ..... Symphony
I. Allegro marcato
II. Adagio
III. Presto
(Composed for the 50th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)
Ten minute intermission.
Wagner ..... Ride of the Valkries from "Die Walkure"
Wagner .. Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Rimsky-Korsakov ..... Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.
I. Alborada
II. Variations

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

FEB 28 1931

Symphony Conc

Old Concerto,

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY, AT WOOLSEY HALL NEXT WEDNESDAY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK JOURNAL

FEB 28 1931

STRAVINSKY—PSALMIST.

About the last thing any one expected Igor Stravinsky, creator of the pagan "Rite of Spring," to turn to for inspiration was the Psalms. But that is precisely what he has done in his latest work. "The Symphony of Psalms," and it will be disclosed for the first time next Thursday by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra.

On this same program will also be Arthur Honegger's new symphony (both this and the Stravinsky music were written especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra). Handel and Ravel will fill out the evening. E. W. Hill's new symphony will replace the Honegger work at the Saturday concert.

Arturo Toscanini's next program with the Philharmonic, which will be given four times next week, beginning Wednesday, holds Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth.

it is a clas[illegible]. Two audiences will listen to it as to a thing of custom; whereas they will hear the "soloist" as occasion for rare pleasure. They already know him as eminent hand upon violin or piano. Rightly enough, they believe him summoned that the given Concerto may shine anew in the radiance of his perfections. They will receive him as the whole house, yesterday, received Mr. Heifetz when he came to his place by the conductor's stand. The season through, for no "soloist"—not even for Mr. Gieseking—has there been such a burst of applause, so long, hearty and general. In five months, more rapt ears have not followed any piece played at these concerts. The first audience for this Violin-Concerto of Beethoven could hardly have listened more intent. "Publicity counsellors" and devotees of Mr. Heifetz may be left to number the recalls at the end. As usual Dr. Koussevitzky forsook the stage; but it is an old story that no conductor, within memory at the Symphony Concerts, is so solicitous as he with the orchestral part of a Concerto. Felicitous as well, since he fuses the whole into a symphonic piece, yet not once overclouds the "soloist."

The poised Heifetz is an objective musician. He sees the music before him clear and whole; hears it in character. Beethoven, in these middle years, preferred the violin as a songful instrument; wrote for it and for his friend, Clementi, a lyric Concerto. The so-called knocking motiv may haunt the first movement; the finale may run away into crisp rhythm and exuberant phrase. Throughout, however, it is the first concern of the violin to be songful. It is variously such over the long Allegro. In the slow division it sounds and transfigures melody. Not once through the whole Concerto did Mr. Heifetz depart from this particular and pervading quality. As he played them, the cadenzas—from his master, Auer—reiterated this quality. In spite of its air of lyric innocence, the Concerto contains exacting, even displayful, measures, as virtuoso-fiddling went in 1806. Mr. Heifetz took them so evenly, so easily, that the listener felt rather than perceived—much less considered—this mastery. It came and went as the impression of the passing moment.

The Concerto is not a highly emotionalized music. The scale is less ambitious and aspiring, the musical thought less deep, the creative ardor less glowing than they were to be in Beethoven's next Concerto—"The Emperor" for the piano. There is not even the poetized conflict of orchestra and piano that perpetuates the slow movement of the preceding Concerto in G major. Violin and orchestra go amiably, sympathetically. They join together in euphonies melting upon the ear. Or the orchestra sets in a luminous background, stream-like, for the flowing violin. The "knocking" phrase animates, rather than troubles, the first movement. The engrossing Heifetz left room for more than a thought of Dr. Koussevitzky's sensibility to every curve, accent and shading, of his quick ear and instant hand for every fusion or contrast of solo and orchestral parts; of a unanimity that bound together composer, conductor and violinist in a single voice and style.

Violin and orchestra are, indeed, embarked by Beethoven's will upon a single-hearted quest. They seek, all three, the beauty which only music may compass and convey. It is born in this Concerto of no external suggestion. It springs from no inner emotional conflict. It is a self-contained passion for an ideal beauty of songful sound in the particular voice of the violin. The Allegro gains it variously in a gentle fervor of creation. In the Larghetto the violin and the orchestra first speak it one to another; then the violin takes it to itself; carries it, as a bird wings upward, through the last ineffable measures. The orchestra recalls the violin to the light vigors of the finale; but through the interstices still plays that beauty in another phase.

Whatever the music, this disembodied beauty of sound, pellucid, unflawed, finely measured, is the essence of Mr. Heifetz's violin-playing. Yesterday he had only to join the beauty which he emanates to the kindred beauty which Beethoven would create. From first bar to last, the jointure was complete and unbroken, equally of the spirit within and the tone without. Kreisler and Muck, Heifetz and Koussevitzky—twice within twenty years Beethoven's Violin-Concerto has been Ariel's music of an enchanted air.

It is the moment for an intermezzo about another rare performance. The Introduction to the Second Act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," began the concert. On paper, it seemed a convenience. For the congenitally tardy must be served, lest their late and inconsiderate entrances disturb—as they did yesterday—more important music. And "Gwendoline" itself? One of the operas written in Paris when the example of Wagner was potent upon the generation of the eighties. Perhaps, the best of them; now fallen out of the repertory everywhere, preserved only by an Overture and this Introduction. To lift the curtain upon an amorous second act, Chabrier wrote misty, longing, dreamful measures; distributed them to the woodwinds and the strings of a hushed orchestra; swelled them to climax; bade them droop and sigh and vanish into silence. Dr. Koussevitzky and his choirs played them with a diaphanous beauty and a gentle intensity renewing and transfiguring Chabrier's pages. The effect was momentary; but it vies in recollection with that of the Concerto itself.

Finally to the new Symphony of Professor Hill, in C major and the full panoply of four movements, played for the first time, and in the applauded presence of the composer. His fellow townsfolk do not forget his services in Boston and Cambridge to the art of music; to that art liberalized and falling upon open ears and minds. Before them of late he has proved his maturing quality as composer, excelling with the concentration of full-furnished years the more desultory adventures of younger days. If their applause yesterday seemed more hesitant than of old, the explanation is the nature of this second Symphony.

For it seemed, in the casual impressions of first performance, a virtuoso-music. It is entirely self-contained. It addresses itself wholly to the creation of a musical substance and a musical movement that shall generate purely musical reactions. It abounds with ready resource. It teems with adroit devices. A manifold craftsmanship never declines into routine or academic exercise, sustaining momentum, keeping animation throughout. By the same token it is a Symphony of this immediate day, frankly but not calculatingly modernistic: neither mannered nor opinionated; preferring the play of sonorities, rhythms, timbres to emotionalized or poetized expression; a young man's Symphony, were youth to be blessed with the readiness and abundance of Mr. Hill at middle age.

The first movement passes swiftly, vividly—with inexhaustible rhythmic flexibility, quick changes of pace and mood, diversified and animated working of the musical material, spirited and pointed play of instrumental voices. Throughout go the modern freedoms, the modern vitalizing, upon orthodox form. . . . The following scherzo is virtuoso-exercise with rhythmic figures, driven at high speed, whipped and colored with fancy; relaxing this tonal sport for brief lyric interludes; never reiterating, beating nothing out too thin. . . . The succeeding slow movement develops and enriches a single musical thought; foregoes rhythmic flexibility for rhythmic intensity; searches out darker timbres; ebbs and flows sensitively; swells into broad or deep sonority. . . . The finale returns to the rhythmic energy, the vitalizing freedom, the animation and urgency of the beginning—to the end a quick-spirited, unflagging music, be the hand upon it vigorous or light.

A virtuoso-symphony—the listener repeated to himself—peradventure a brilliant symphony; such a symphony as should go into European festivals of contemporary music to prove that an American composer can do that sort of thing and do it notably well. Then came the reservations. By the evidence of those very qualities, Mr. Hill has written a cosmopolitan Symphony that any composer of his abilities might have accomplished anywhere. There are no marks of an environment and a soil; whereas Mr. Hill's first Symphony sounded out of New England; was seldom tuned to an eclectic modernism. Yet again—scarcely one of Mr. Hill's motivs in this Second Symphony lays immediate hold on the ear; individualizes itself to the listening mind. At first hearing, they sound as matter for treatment, and that treatment soon becomes everything. . . . But a composer has unquestionable right to make a symphony in whatever mood and to whatever end may possess him.

H. T. P.

PERFORMANCE BY HEIFETZ BRILLIANT

By MOSES SMITH

Jascha Heifetz is the soloist at this week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, and naturally he overshadows the rest of the program. Though he has played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra only twice previously, using the Beethoven Concerto in 1919, he again selected this masterpiece.

His performance at the matinee of yesterday was great—if you put back in that word the meaning it has lost in this age of superlatives. Heifetz played with the flawless technical skill, beauty of tone and exquisite musicality that made him a unique figure among violinists. Only an occasional distortion of rhythm could prevent one's calling this performance as fine an interpretation of Beethoven's classic score as Heifetz gave two years ago in the Brahms Concerto. And the latter was, in our estimation, the finest violin playing Boston has heard in the decade and a half during which we have frequented local concert halls.

Heifetz emphasis was primarily lyrical, and so was Mr. Koussevitzky's with the orchestral part. Sensitively as many phrases were moulded by the conductor, however, and beautiful as many passages were, there were spots when the accompaniment was—to blurt out an ugly word—incompetent. Whether, in these places, the fault was the orchestral players' or Mr. Koussevitzky's is not for us to say. But it comes strongly from a band that distinguished itself immediately afterward with a glowing performance of the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture.

Chabrier's Entr'acte to the second act of "Gwendoline" began the program, and Edward Burlingame Hill's Second Symphony followed. Recently composed, and played yesterday for the first time, it disclosed familiar qualities. Some of the themes are original and charming. Others are derivative from French impressionism, but not offensively. The work is discriminately written, tastefully orchestrated.

offer
Free Grafis
YOUR HOME FOR YOU DAYS
ANNING, Inc.
STREET, BOSTON
8230
99 Chauncy Street, Boston
Tel. Hancock 3790—3791

logical

The musical ideas of the composer are characteristically his own, the idiom in which he conveys them that of the modern French school. This symphony therefore, though more considerable, is a companion piece to its author's Symphony in B flat and his "Lilacs," after Amy Lowell's poem. Rhythmic patterns are perhaps somewhat more complex than in the former works, but the influence of the modern Russians is slight. It is hardly necessary to add that in both composition and orchestration, the symphony is the work of a master hand. It was received with marked favor.

The other principal item of the program was the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Probably any lingering trace of the notion that Heifetz is "cold" had been destroyed in the symphony audiences by this artist's performance of the Brahms Concerto two years ago. Certainly no one could have found coldness in the player's tone in the lovely melody of the slow movement in the concert under review. The performance was of course masterly throughout (including the orchestral accompaniment), and the ovation was prolonged until after the soloist had brought back Dr. Koussevitzky to share in it.

The program opened with the Prelude to Act II from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," a charming bit of lavender and old lace which the audience viewed apathetically. The final item was the "Egmont" Overture.

L. A. S.

SWAMPSCOTTA

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

...re was born in Tver, Russia, ...ly 26, 18..4, a man who will ...his place among the notable ...alities to whom the Ameri... ...blic owes so much. At the ... twelve, Serge Koussevitsky ... his career by conducting ...hestra of his home town. He ...raduated from Moscow Con... ...ory and was known as a ... bass virtuoso. He was said ... finest performer on this ...nt in Europe, and is, in ... world's foremost authority ...s noble instrument. He ...d a Russian musical edition ...ve many Russian composers ...cement by publishing their ... When Kerensky became ...ister of Russia, he was ...ll powers with regard to ...al questions in Russia. He ...ccept, however, because it ...terfere too much with his

...evitsky fell in love with ... Constantinown Ouschakoff, ...rming, cultured, as well as ...wealthy, young Russian maid... ...hey were married in 1905, ... a short courtship. They set... ...d in Berlin and maintained a ...utiful home there, where they ...ert...ied lavishly.

... first began practicing con... ...ng with an orchestra at the ...erlin High School. He was often ...n a box at the concerts of the Philharmonic Orchestra, tak... ...ng notes on the conducting of ...sch, one of the world's most ...nous conductors. He made his debut with this orchestra in 1906 and made frequent appearances as its conductor thereafter.

Koussevitsky and his wife then returned to Moscow where they established such a mansion that thirteen servants were required. Here he founded his own personal orchestra of seventy-three of the best players in Europe. This was the largest and most proficient private orchestra ever kept in musical history. He maintained this at his own expense of two hundred thousand roubles (one hundred thousand dollars). It was also characteristic of him to travel all over Russia with his orchestra, carrying symphonic music to parts where it had never been heard. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave concerts in town after town. In this way he was able to develop his own great resources and acquire surpassing skill. Much praise is due to Madame Koussevitsky for her great service to music in enabling her husband to develop his genius and gain such experience. It is well to make it known here that Madame Koussevitsky attends every one of her husband's rehearsals and is his most severe critic.

After the war, he had great successes in London and Paris, and then Boston. Under his leadership, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to occupy first place among the leading orchestras of the world, for all round technical perfection, tonal purity and beauty, resonance, instrumental balance, and general excellence of ensemble.

Koussevitsky proceeds to the scene of action as though he were the person in the hall least concerned about subsequent events. There is no pose, no fussy trick in order to attract attention. But one feels for all the modesty and quietness of entrance that he will have his hand on every essential point. He is a real live wire when standing in front of an orchestra and welds his orchestra into one great sensitive and responsive instrument. He feels every note of the work with an emotional intensity that electrifies the audience. He also seems to be able to humanize the old masters. Some one has said that his "heart and soul are at the end of his baton" and that "his interpretative art wakes the dust of ages into life".

SWAMP

He has been described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness which certainly makes itself known to the listeners. His unique personality compels immediate attention. One may notice that on entering the stage, he takes only twelve steps to his stand. Masterly poise predominates throughout all his conducting, whether strenuous or not. All he does has its own significance, and it is interesting to note that he seems to draw the music forth from the musicians. The mood of a selection shows itself upon the countenance of the conductor. When the music requires great effort on the part of the conductor, one would think that the vein across his temple would burst, and great beads of perspiration stand out on his fore... At the end of his piece, he st... g to ... h w... et ba... te tu... te a... or a... le h... d th... o h... is s... n i... d e... a p... at v... a- t... d. F... o- c... s- t... lic t... is c... nd ... es- t... nd]...

Concerts and Composers and Conversations

Corridor Interludes Around Chabrier and Beethoven, Miss Ehrhart Gains

Jans. Mar. 2

ON SATURDAY, as on Friday, at the Symphony Concert, the fragment from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" surprised many that heard. It had not been played at Symphony Hall for nine years. Recollection dims quickly as one season, or even one concert, succeeds another. Between the spring of 1922 and the winter of 1931, a considerable part of the audience had been renewed. Probably a full half of it, possibly more, heard this Introduction to Act II as "new: first time." Piece and performance touched it equally. Here was a strange, romantic music, intensified and poetized. Absorbed listening and warm applause were the proof—and corridor prattle besides.

Some were quick to say that since Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra play Chabrier so well, they should play him oftener. Likely enough The Pops had worn "España" threadbare; but in Dr. Muck's time it was one of the orchestra's show-pieces. Others recalled the Overture to "Gwendoline" and believed it worth revival; or Mottl's orchestral version of Chabrier's piano-piece, "Bourrée Fantasque." A few spoke more mysteriously of an overture to an opéra-comique, "Le Roi malgré lui," and of a Polonaise later on. But these, probably, were numbers for The Pops.

One or two next made bold to suggest that Chabrier's contemporary, Lalo, was equally neglected composer at Symphony Hall. Was the Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" quite outmoded? And what of a Suite from his ballet, "Namouna," likewise in Dr. Muck's repertory? They even wondered for an instant about Chausson—his Symphony, his tone-poem, "Viviane," his "Poem" for violin and orchestra? Were they also stone-dead? Occasionally in Chicago, Mr. Stock still plays the Symphony. Ixe, the incorrigible Romantic, was even harping on Liszt. By all the signs and all the saints, Dr. Koussevitzky could release "Tasso," or "Mazeppa," or even "Orpheus," from the limbo into which they had fallen. But Liszt is dead and buried, interposed Zed, his friend and contradictor. "Our romanticism is the romanticism of Honegger in 'Pacific 2-3-1' or in 'Rugby.'" Before they could join issue, the bell rang, timely.

This was not all. At the end of Beethoven's Violin-Concerto and of Mr. Heifetz, Ixe and Zed departed together, fleeing under a common impulse from the Overture to "Egmont." Encountering Penstock, their friend, they hastened to confide their feelings to him—in the innocent hope that he would put them into print. Outside the nine Symphonies and two or three Concertos, did the immortal Ludwig write nothing for orchestra except the "Egmont," the "Coriolan" and the third "Leonora" overture? Their friend admitted that he had written more or less; but by common consent it was inferior stuff, better left to gather dust on the shelves.

They retorted with "The Dedication of the House," which had sounded "rather well" from Sir George Henschel last October. They were all for a suite of dances from Beethoven's Promethean ballet which, they said, had been played in Gericke's time. Or for the Overture to "King Stephen" resurrected by Monteux? Or for the First "Leonora?" Did anyone hear that nowadays? All this, they urged, might be Grade C Beethoven; but at least it was fresh Beethoven; whereas—but it was wisest to escape while Ixe and Zed were estimating how many times they had conducted Count Egmont to his doom. Before the evening was over, they undoubtedly drank to the memory of the Duke of Alva who ordered the execution.

MADE TRUSTEE OF SYMPHONY

William Phillips Elected Member of Board

Post Mar 2

William Phillips of Boston and Beverly has been elected a member of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The election took place last Friday but public announcement from Symphony Hall was not made until yesterday. A grand nephew of Wendell Phillips, Mr. Phillips was the first American minister to Canada. Previous to that he had been minister to the Netherlands and to Belgium and still earlier secretary to Joseph F. Choate when the latter was ambassador to England.

William Phillips, settled in Boston and Beverly since he retired from the diplomatic service as United States Minister to Canada, has joined the Board of Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra.

Tran. Mar 2

WILLIAM PHILLIPS TRUSTEE OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

William Phillips of North Beverly, Harvard graduate and for many years a distinguished member of the United States diplomatic service, has been chosen a member of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chairman of the trustees is Judge Frederick P. Cabot of Boston. Mr Phillips' term of service, under the rules of the board, is to be of indefinite length.

Mr Phillips was born in Beverly, May 30, 1878, and was graduated from Harvard in 1900. He attended Harvard Law School for 2½ years, and some years later, in 1922, he was given the degree of master of arts.

He has been attached at various times to American embassies and legations in London and Pekin. He has been envoy and minister to The Netherlands, Belgium and Canada, and has held a number of high posts in the State Department, including that of Assistant Secretary of State during the World War from January, 1917, to March, 1920.

He belongs to the Somerset, Myopia Hunt, Knickerbocker, Harvard and Metropolitan clubs.

Globe Mar 2

Music Notes and Comment

Nathan Milstein, the Russian violinist now engaged on his second American tour, will make his Boston debut at this week's Symphony concerts in the Brahms concerto. Mr Milstein, born at Odessa in 1904, studied there under Stoliarski, and completed his training at Leningrad (then St Petersburg), under the late Leopold Auer. In 1929 he appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestras, but was not then engaged by the Boston Symphony. He has been highly praised by reviewers in New York and in Europe.

Globe Mar 2

Dr Koussevitzky's novelty on this week's program in the Friday and Saturday series of Symphony concerts is a "Symphonic Legend" by Alexander Steinert, to be played for the first time in America. The composer is a member of a well-known Boston family who has in recent years studied music abroad, following his graduation from Harvard. Piano pieces by Mr Steinert have been played here in public by various givers of recitals.

Concert-Chronicle

Dr. Muck and Baireuth

Mar 9

TO CLEAR away misunderstandings about his departure from Baireuth, Dr. Muck lately sent to the principal German newspapers copies of his letter of resignation despatched last September to Frau Winifred Wagner, Siegfried's widow. The New York Times translates it as follows:

"After mature deliberation I have come to the firm and irrevocable resolution to regard my activities in Baireuth as ended. In 1908 I gave Frau Cosima Wagner my word to help Siegfried with the Baireuth work as long as it was possible to me. I have kept this word so far as lay in my power. I have kept my word not only because I pledged it to Frau Cosima but because I felt myself bound to Siegfried by ties of true friendship. Through years of labor in a common cause, Siegfried and the work at Baireuth remained before my eyes—despite every change of time and place—as a firm, invariable idea, to which my artistic conscience and the highest sense of duty always recalled me.

"Now a cruel fate has torn Siegfried from his work. Baireuth has lost its leader. The work must be advanced anew, new forces must be put in control; and it must be upon young shoulders that the overwhelming burdens and responsibilities can be laid. For this sort of wheelwork I no longer am fit — I, whose artistic standpoint and convictions, so far as Baireuth is concerned, stem from the preceding century. I feel convinced that you will understand and appreciate the reasons that move me. It is self-evident that I shall always stand at your disposal, should you perhaps require my advice at any future time. In true friendship

"Your Old
KARL MUCK

Incidents and Prospects

Cambridge, where Professor Hill lives, and Harvard, where he works, are to hear his new Symphony, produced successfully in Boston last week and announced for New York next Saturday. To make room for it Dr. Koussevitzky has altered the program for the Symphony Concert in Sanders Theater on Thursday, March 12. It now stands:

Introduction to Act II of the Opera, "Gwendoline" ..... Chabrier
Symphony, No. 2, in C major ..... Hill
Prelude and Finale from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Caprice on Spanish Themes ... Rimsky-Korsakov

Pieces in which a chorus assists the orchestra will fill the last pair, but one, of Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday, April 24 and 25, viz.: Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" to be heard for the first times in Boston; Skriabin's "Prometheus" in revival; a new piece by the elder Cherepnin in memory of Borodin, the composer. For all three Arthur Fiedler is preparing a chorus from The Gecilia.

The fiftieth anniversary of the death of Musorgsky falls at the end of March, to be precise on March 28. To mark it, Mr. Karolik, the Russian tenor, will be heard a few days later at Symphony Hall in a program containing only Musorgsky's songs. Any noting of the anniversary by the Symphony Orchestra seems difficult. Ravel's transcription of "Pictures at an Exhibition" was played last November; the Prelude to "Khovantschina," however characteristic, is only a fragment; while "A Night on the Bald Mountain" does Musorgsky anything but justice.

By invitation of the Department of

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

There was born in Tver, Russia, on July 26, 1874, a man who will ... his place among the notable ... sonalities to whom the Ameri... public owes so much. At the ... of twelve, Serge Koussevitsky st... d his career by conducting th... rchestra of his home town. He ... graduated from Moscow Con... tory and was known as a ... ble-bass virtuoso. He was said ... e the finest performer on this ... ument in Europe, and is, in ... e world's foremost authority ... is noble instrument. He ... d a Russian musical edition ... ave many Russian composers ... agement by publishing their ... ks. When Kerensky became ... inister of Russia, he was ... ll powers with regard to ... al questions in Russia. He ... accept, however, because it ... terfere too much with his ... k.

K... sevitsky fell in love with Na... e Constantinown Ouschakoff, ... arming, cultured, as well as very wealthy, young Russian maid... They were married in 1905, after a short courtship. They set... tled in Berlin and maintained a beautiful home there, where they entert... ned lavishly.

... first began practicing con...ucting with an orchestra at the Berlin High School. He was often seen in a box at the concerts of the Philharmonic Orchestra, taking notes on the conducting of Nikisch, one of the world's most famous conductors. He made his debut with this orchestra in 1906 and made frequent appearances as its conductor thereafter.

Koussevitsky and his wife then returned to Moscow where they established such a mansion that thirteen servants were required. Here he founded his own personal orchestra of seventy-three of the best players in Europe. This was the largest and most proficient private orchestra ever kept in musical history. He maintained this at his own expense of two hundred thousand roubles (one hundred thousand dollars). It was also characteristic of him to travel all over Russia with his orchestra, carrying symphonic music to parts where it had never been heard. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave concerts in town after town. In this way he was able to develop his own great resources and acquire surpassing skill. Much praise is due to Madame Koussevitsky for her great service to music in enabling her husband to develop his genius and gain such experience. It is well to make it known here that Madame Koussevitsky attends every one of her husband's rehearsals and is his most severe critic.

After the war, he had great successes in London and Paris, and then Boston. Under his leadership, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to occupy first place among the leading orchestras of the world, for all round technical perfection, tonal purity and beauty, resonance, instrumental balance, and general excellence of ensemble.

Koussevitsky proceeds to the scene of action as though he were the person in the hall least concerned about subsequent events. There is no pose, no fussy trick in order to attract attention. But one feels for all the modesty and quietness of entrance that he will have his hand on every essential point. He is a real live wire when standing in front of an orchestra and welds his orchestra into one great sensitive and responsive instrument. He feels every note of the work with an emotional intensity that electrifies the audience. He also seems to be able to humanize the old masters. Some one has said that his "heart and soul are at the end of his baton" and that "his interpretative art wakes the dust of ages into life".

He has been described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness which certainly makes itself known to the listeners. His unique personality compels immediate attention. One may notice that on entering the stage, he takes only twelve steps to his stand. Masterly poise predominates throughout all his conducting, whether strenuous or not. All he does has its own significance, and it is interesting to note that he seems to draw the music forth from the musicians. The mood of a selection shows itself upon the countenance of the conductor. When the music requires great effort on the part of the conductor, one would think that the vein across his temple would burst, and great beads of perspiration stand out on his forehead. At the end of his piece, he stands a moment, seemingly trying to gather up again the strength which he has lost, or trying "to get back to earth again". Then he turns and replies graciously to the applause. He goes back stage for a second only, and in that time he has become a new man. It is said that after every concert, he has to have a rub-down because of his strenuous efforts.

Mr. Koussevitsky is the last man in the world to take the quick and easy path which leads only to a passing notoriety. He realizes that without devotion and concentration, triumph dare not be expected. He is a pathfinder, and has introduced more new, unknown orchestral works to the American public than any other conductor. He is called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral world of London, Paris and Boston.

—Ruth Melville.

Concert-Chronicle

Dr. Muck and Bairuth

TO CLEAR away misunderstandings about his departure from Bairuth, Dr. Muck lately sent to the principal German newspapers copies of his letter of resignation despatched last September to Frau Winifred Wagner, Siegfried's widow. The New York Times translates it as follows:

"After mature deliberation I have come to the firm and irrevocable resolution to regard my activities in Bairuth as ended. In 1908 I gave Frau Cosima Wagner my word to help Siegfried with the Bairuth work as long as it was possible to me. I have kept this word so far as lay in my power. I have kept my word not only because I pledged it to Frau Cosima but because I felt myself bound to Siegfried by ties of true friendship. Through years of labor in a common cause, Siegfried and the work at Bairuth remained before my eyes—despite every change of time and place—as a firm, invariable idea, to which my artistic conscience and the highest sense of duty always recalled me.

"Now a cruel fate has torn Siegfried from his work. Bairuth has lost its leader. The work must be advanced anew, new forces must be put in control; and it must be upon young shoulders that the overwhelming burdens and responsibilities can be laid. For this sort of wheelwork I no longer am fit — I, whose artistic standpoint and convictions, so far as Bairuth is concerned, stem from the preceding century. I feel convinced that you will understand and appreciate the reasons that move me. It is self-evident that I shall always stand at your disposal, should you perhaps require my advice at any future time. In true friendship

"Your Old
KARL MUCK

Incidents and Prospects

Cambridge, where Professor Hill lives, and Harvard, where he works, are to hear his new Symphony, produced successfully in Boston last week and announced for New York next Saturday. To make room for it Dr. Koussevitzky has altered the program for the Symphony Concert in Sanders Theater on Thursday, March 12. It now stands:

Introduction to Act II of the Opera, "Gwendoline" ..... Chabrier
Symphony, No. 2, in C major ..... Hill
Prelude and Finale from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Caprice on Spanish Themes ... Rimsky-Korsakov

Pieces in which a chorus assists the orchestra will fill the last pair, but one, of Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday, April 24 and 25, viz.: Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" to be heard for the first times in Boston; Skriabin's "Prometheus" in revival; a new piece by the elder Cherepnin in memory of Borodin, the composer. For all three Arthur Fiedler is preparing a chorus from The Cecilia.

The fiftieth anniversary of the death of Musorgsky falls at the end of March, to be precise on March 28. To mark it, Mr. Karolik, the Russian tenor, will be heard a few days later at Symphony Hall in a program containing only Musorgsky's songs. Any noting of the anniversary by the Symphony Orchestra seems difficult. Ravel's transcription of "Pictures at an Exhibition" was played last November; the Prelude to "Khovantschina," however characteristic, is only a fragment; while "A Night on the Bald Mountain" does Musorgsky anything but justice.

By invitation of the Department of

MADE TRUSTEE OF SYMPHONY

William Phillips Elected Member of Board

Post Mar 2

William Phillips of Boston and Beverly has been elected a member of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The election took place last Friday but public announcement from Symphony Hall was not made until yesterday. A grand nephew of Wendell Phillips, Mr. Phillips was the first American minister to Canada. Previous to that he had been minister to the Netherlands and to Belgium and still earlier secretary to Joseph F. Choate when the latter was ambassador to England.

William Phillips, settled in Boston and Beverly since he retired from the diplomatic service as United States Minister to Canada, has joined the Board of Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra.

Herald Mar 2

WILLIAM PHILLIPS TRUSTEE OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

William Phillips of North Beverly, Harvard graduate and for many years a distinguished member of the United States diplomatic service, has been chosen a member of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chairman of the trustees is Judge Frederick P. Cabot of Boston. Mr Phillips' term of service, under the rules of the board, is to be of indefinite length.

Mr Phillips was born in Beverly, May 30, 1878, and was graduated from Harvard in 1900. He attended Harvard Law School for 2½ years, and some years later, in 1922, he was given the degree of master of arts.

He has been attached at various times to American embassies and legations in London and Pekin. He has been envoy and minister to The Netherlands, Belgium and Canada, and has held a number of high posts in the State Department, including that of Assistant Secretary of State during the World War from January, 1917, to March, 1920.

He belongs to the Somerset, Myopia Hunt, Knickerbocker, Harvard and Metropolitan clubs.

Globe Mar 2

Music Notes and Comment

Globe Mar 2

Nathan Milstein, the Russian violinist now engaged on his second American tour, will make his Boston debut at this week's Symphony concerts in the Brahms concerto. Mr Milstein, born at Odessa in 1904, studied there under Stoliarski, and completed his training at Leningrad (then St Petersburg), under the late Leopold Auer. In 1929 he appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestras, but was not then engaged by the Boston Symphony. He has been highly praised by reviewers in New York and in Europe.

Dr Koussevitzky's novelty on this week's program in the Friday and Saturday series of Symphony concerts is a "Symphonic Legend" by Alexander Steinert, to be played for the first time in America. The composer is a member of a well-known Boston family who has in recent years studied music abroad, following his graduation from Harvard. Piano pieces by Mr Steinert have been played here in public by various givers of recitals.

Artist's View

THE FL

admitted that he had written more or less; but by common consent it was inferior stuff, better left to gather dust on the shelves.

They retorted with "The Dedication of the House," which had sounded "rather well" from Sir George Henschel last October. They were all for a suite of dances from Beethoven's Promethean ballet which, they said, had been played in Ge icke's time. Or for the Overture to "King Stephen" resurrected by Monteux? Or for the First "Leonora?" Did anyone hear that nowadays? All this, they urged, might be Grade C Beethoven; but at least it was fresh Beethoven; whereas—but it was wisest to escape while Ixe and Zed were estimating how many times they had conducted Count Egmont to his doom. Before the evening was over, they undoubtedly drank to the memory of the Duke of Alva who ordered the execution.

138

Stravinsky in the Ears of New York

His "Symphony of Psalms" As Various Reviewers Heard and Wrote

IN ITS TURN, from Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Orchestra and the chorus of its own Schola Cantorum, New York has heard Stravinsky as Psalmist. Twice last week, as many as Carnegie Hall might contain listened to the "Psalms-Symphony," first on Thursday evening, second on Saturday evening. Both audiences received music and performance with interest and seeming admiration, Beyond peradventure they were warm in applause. The occasion stirred Mr. Gilman of the Herald Tribune to a notable article, the ablest and most sensitive yet written in America about the 'Psalms-Symphony." Less two factual paragraphs indicating the chosen Psalms and enumerating the orchestral forces, if follows hereunder:

"God is worshipped by artists in many ways. For some, as for Bach, there was the way of simple prayer and intimate communication: the way that in this case was magically transmutting, for it gave us music which escapes from its pietistic century into a timeless existence of its own, a life of the spirit that is independent of the unstable theologies of man.

"Others, finding God in Nature, might be moved to give Blake's answer to the questioner who asked, 'When the sun rises, do you not see a round disk of fire, something like a guinea?'—'No! I see an innumerable company of the heavenly host, crying "Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord God Almighty."' It was thus that Beethoven often worshiped, and Bruckner, and those other mystics for whom the beauty and wonder of the visible earth were august revelations of the divine. Stirred by the miracle of the dawn, by shadows in pools, by the evening light upon the hills, the peace that falls within the valley, they saw these things as, in Wordsworth's phrase, 'the garment of God.'

"Others, again, worship by the bringing of gifts of the imagination, offering the beauty of songs and words, the loveliness of colors and contours and designs—as those who followed to Bethlehem the annunciatory star, bearing frankincense and myrrh, silver and wrought bronze, chalcedonies from the Indies, and pearls from Kushan, and garments stiff with gold, adonred with sapphires where their seams were fastened. Of such are the liberal Kings of art, the Magi of tributary beauty—Handel and Wagner and Brahms.

"And there is the way of Mr. Stravinsky—Stravinsky, the romantic poet of 'L'Oiseau de Feu,' the bitter, ironic jester of 'Petrushka,' the sophisticated savage of the 'Sacre,' the copyist of bygone styles who has played the sedulous ape to Bach and Handel, Beethoven and Glinka and Chaikovsky; Stravinsky, the restless experimentalist, whose feet have now, it seems, been set upon the rock of the Psalmist, and into whose mouth a new song has been put.

"For we are now confronted with Stravinsky the man of primitive faith, an Old-Testament Stravinsky, setting, for orcheestra and chorus, passages from the Psalms of David, by kind encouragement of Dr. Koussevitzky, as an offering to the current celebration by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of its fiftieth anniversary. The result, a "Symphonie de Psaumes," was put before us Thursday night, for the first time here, by the great organization that stoops to conquer us from time to time in the abandoned precincts of Fifty-seventh Street. . . .

"For the three contrasting moods of the symphony — prayer, thanksgiving, praise—Stravinsky has found original and puissant utterance. He has foregone, as one would have expected, the obvious approaches to his text. The musical clichés of lamentation of thanksgiving, of jubilant praise, have no place in his expressional scheme. He has done what the fructifying artist always does in subjecting to his imagination a standardized subject-matter—has discovered in it fresh aspects and implications, hidden depths and surfaces; has made it yield him what the seventeenth century would have called 'an excellent strangeness.'

" 'Before I go hence, and be no more,' sings the Psalmist at the end of his ereaty; and the long-held notes of Stravinsky's chorus, the grave harmonies of the orchestra, effuse no facile pathos but an age-old austerity of grief. For the verses of thanksgiving (set at the beginning as an astonishing double fugue for orchestra and chorus), he finds a music of intricate and subtle poignance, perhaps the most searching page that Stravinsky has yet given us. The Psalmist recalls the horrors of the pit and of the miry clay, and his anguish waiting for release. His speech is somber with remembered pain; and the acid, astringent tones of the woodwind, the spareness and sharpness of the musical idea, its refusal of the easily delectable, mirror the poet's thought.

"In the last division, the Psalmist's hymn of praise, there are superb outbursts—as when the singer remembers the trumpets and organs and stringed instruments that should exalt the Lord. There is music of splendor, music of imperial voice and vesture, 'arrased with purple like the house of kings.' But the most deeply touching of the symphony's movements is that remarkable E-flat passage near the end in which, as you await a mighty outburst at 'praise him upon the loud cymbals,' the music is suddently stilled, and the voices, in a page that haunts the ear and the mind, evoke the awe of the worshipper before the Sanctuary. And the concluding Alleluia, too, is hushed, at the thought of the supreme beneficence . . . 'He hath made everything beautiful in his time: also he hath set eternity in their heart.'

"Stravinsky, in short, has given us a masterpiece. It is his excelling work. For its exhibition last night, in a justly revealing performance, there can be naught but gratitude to the great orchestra which achieved it."

Hear the Other Side

Of course there were dissenting voices. Mr. Thompson lifts one in the Evening Post, when he says: "Once more the orientation of Stravinsky has veered. This symphony is no more like 'Apollo Musagetes' than that work is like 'Le Sacre de Printemps' or 'Œdipus Rex' is like the Symphonies for Wind Instruments. Here is no 'back to Chaikovsky'; no evocation of past graces of Versailles. Ancient Jewry is contemplated—but contemplated, so it seems to us, from afar. . . . His Hebraic questings are not of the flaming, prophetic order. He builds cumulatively but does not depart from his stance of revery. He yields to no excitement; he kindles none. His devotions have in them a reflective remoteness that makes the religious side of the work decidedly secondary to the musical considerations involved.

"There are distinctive, odd and striking details, but for us they were the bright thoughts of an extraordinary technician who had approached his problem of making a symphony of the Psalms by way of the head rather than the heart. We much prefer the pagan Stravinsky to the Psalmist. We would have him moujik, not Levite. This symphony seems to us a work deficient in red blood, much lucubrated very moderately inspired."

There were doubters, besides, as those paragraphs from Mr. Henderson in the Sun bear witness: "One heard Stravinsky again sounding strange polyphonies with wind instruments, challenging the ear with strident staccato chords and weaving his spells with the magic of conflicting keys. Abrupt contrasts of forte and piano were not wanting or melodic fragments seemingly intruded for the sole purpose of becoming lost in the tonal jungle.

"Nevertheless there remained the final conviction that a mind possessed of authority and a hand trained to high skill had been at work. Some of the choral writing was striking in effectiveness and it had a firmness of texture evoking admiration. The departure from the conventional treatment of the old exclamatory 'Alleluia' was noteworthy. Stravensky gave us a very tender setting in sustained tones sung piano. The close of the work was impressive. But it must be added that a searching examination of the composition cannot be attempted after a single hearing, which left this auditor uncertain whether there was something more or a great deal less than appeared on the surface."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series took place yesterday in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitsky conducted the following gprogram: Mozart, Symphony in G minor and Berlioz, Symphonie Fantastique—two symphonies rarely heard at the same concert. The Mozart symphony retains a freshness and vigor that make it delightful to hear. Time has not dealt as kindly with the Symphonie Fantastique: though it is interesting, it has not those inherent qualities that tend, at each hearing, to fill it with vitality.

Mozart's symphony was beautifully played—the finale, brilliant and exhilarating; the andante, quietly poignant. There was a perfect fusion of the conductor's individuality with the composer's art. Nor was there any cut and dried playing on the part of an orchestra presumably weary from recent travels. Phrases were exquisitely chiseled. Each movement was a model in finesse.

Sincerely and sympathetically was the Symphonie Fantastique treated. Though this symphony is remarkable in many respects — marvellous in sonority; effective in the various moods it establishes—it is often trite, banal, and noisy. It looses in power because the composer feels no curb in his dramatic outpouring. The effusiveness of Berlioz, even Dr. Koussevitsky's careful reading could not obliterate. There were moments when the music was frankly vulgar, despite the infinite pains of the conductor; however lovely melodies flicker

FIFTH TUESDAY OF SYMPHONY

Two symphonies made the programme of the fifth of the current series of Tuesday afternoon Symphony Concerts, which took place yesterday: Mozart's in G-minor and the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Berlioz.

In the presentation of these widely disparate compositions Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra spanned a gulf which required of conductor and men the utmost versatility of interpretation and execution. Between the suave melodic structure, the classic feeling, the conservative orchestration of Mozart's symphony and the wayward and angular themes, the personal and progamistic bias, the luxuriant and often bizarre instrumentation of Berlioz' extravagant work Dr. Koussevitzky achieved an astounding contrast of mood and effect.

The performance of Mozart's music was characterized by a fastidious restraint while the Symphony of Berlioz was interpreted with an eloquent intensity and with a fantasy and gusto that matched the composer's own.

TRANS - MAR 11 -

An Afternoon of Mozart and Berlioz

NOT more than two works stood upon the fifth program of the Tuesday afternoon series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both were symphonies—Mozart's little symphony in G minor, once described as that rarity, a perfect masterpiece; Berlioz's huge Symphonie Fantastique, now slightly over a century old, and originally put on the programs of the present season in recognition of its centennial year.

For Mozart Dr. Koussevitzky used the small orchestra which has now become standard with him for the playing of works by this composer or of works in similar style, an orchestra ascending from six double basses. The stage at Symphony Hall almost looks bare with such an orchestra. The music sounds as one had always imagined Mozart should ideally sound.

Dr. Koussevitzky's rejuvenating studies of the masterpieces of music would, however, never stop with a shrewd reduction of a swollen orchestra. Into the very marrow of a work he strives to penetrate to bring from it the essence of its distinguishing qualities. Though this symphony in its first movement is labeled "Allegro molto," the so-called "classical" performance of it often leaves one cold, and almost always disappoints one with a feeling of the insignificance of the principal theme. Play this first theme in strict tempo, and too easily comes the reaction—there is no much of anything there. Yet Mozart evidently thought highly of this theme, for he makes it the burden of the entire movement. Time and again, he returns to it; an entire development section is based upon it. Though there is no evidence that the composers of Mozart's day made deep and wide searches for themes that should be laden with significance, yet they hardly treated themes of which it could be suspected, "nothing there." And in the manner in which Dr. Koussevitzky is playing this symphony this ear, such a suspicion could never enter one's mind. Ever so slightly, ever so subtly he brings a note of pathos into this theme, the note which often is just beneath the surface with Mozart—for those who will look beneath the surface.

Qualities of performance of course brought only excellence. The difficult feats of balance in the second movement were never even suspected, while its song and its decorative scheme flowed along untrammeled, a released thing of beauty. Similarly the happy and elegant dance measures of the minuet and the gayety of the finale—each in its own way added new beauties to this symphony.

Berlioz, in his turn, for his symphony created a detailed and extensive program. The writer who described a symphony as the adventures of a theme in the land of tones, really described this "Fantastic" of Berlioz more nearly than many another. For that is what Berlioz's Symphony actually is, the adventure of the theme of his beloved in several lands of tone. In "Dreams and Passions" he discovers it, follows it through the dance measures of a "Ball," continues with it through new adventures in a "Scene in the Fields," hears it in that terrible "March of the Scaffold" and at the last movement before the ensuing execution, finds it in caricature in the supposed "other world" during the witches' revels of his "Walpurgisnight's Dream." Yes, the adventure of a theme in lands of tone.

But though historians may rub their hands with glee over so definite a novel achievement as that of Berlioz, they overlook not other notable qualities in his work. Just maybe (or, according to more literally-minded researchers, may not be) the "father of the symphony" and of the orchestra, so Berlioz is the father of the science of modern orchestration. For out of the studies of this boy who played only a fife and a guitar grew the splendors and the wizardries which a Liszt and a Wagner and a Strauss later drew from strings and winds and drums. Many of them are already present in this hundred-year-old "Symphonie Fantastique." How frequently one hears a sonority which he believes to be that of the whole orchestra, only to find, when one pinches oneself back into reality that no more than two lines of tone are being used. Wizardry! Who has ever produced a tension more tense than that of a few drum rolls (a Koussevitzky holding the reins, let it not be forgotten) at the end of the "Scene in the Fields"? Wizardry redoubled—in 1830 and 1931. Nor can one fail to note that Strauss putting on paper an execution in "Till Eulenspiegel" can do no better than to use the orchestral sonorities which Berlioz used two-thirds of a century earlier. That Strauss had two conflicting tonalities where Berlioz required only one, does not really affect the matter of sonority. And in sum, how it all sounds! Beside it, classical orchestration seems hardly orchestration at all, but merely a convenient use of instruments and ranges. Hearing this, the student may go back to his text-books and know what the modest writers of those compilations mean when they say that Berlioz began the science of modern orchesration. But it will have taken a Koussevitzky and a hundred men trained in his image to bring them the fullness of that knowledge. A. H. M.

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr Koussevitzky filled the program of the fifth Tuesday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon with two standard symphonies, Mozart's familiar one in G minor, and the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz. The contrast between the classic 18th century and the romantic 19th could hardly have been more strikingly indicated than it was by the juxtaposition of these two masterpieces.

Mozart's symphony, played yesterday by an orchestra hardly more numerous than that for which the composer wrote, but in a much bigger hall than any he ever knew, used for concert giving, brought to the listening ear the serenity, the delicacy of feeling, the undercurrent of profound melancholy, the formal perfection of the great classics.

The performance lacked melodic and rhythmic subtlety, nor was the ensemble playing invariably as accurate as one has a right to expect it to be from so famous and so costly an orchestra. The simplest movement, the minuet, was by far the best played.

The "fixed idea," the theme typifying obsession with an unhappy love, stated near the beginning of Berlioz' symphony and repeated in each of the later movements, is a melody no more emphatic, no more violent than Mozart's. Yet its whole mood is different. It is not incongruous with the wild outbursts of the "March to the Scaffold" and the "Sabbat." Berlioz' music is loose jointed, sacrificing form, proportion, restraint to expression. It is quite obviously "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings."

In the present century it is natural to prefer Mozart to Berlioz, since what Berlioz did so well was afterward done so trivially by Liszt and Tchaikovsky. Yet one cannot honestly say that Mozart was the greater genius, though he was the finer writer of music of the two. Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra did ample justice to Berlioz' fervors, and were warmly applauded. P. R.

Novelties for A Week-End at Symphony Hall

Rarely Done Haydn Symphony New Steinert "Legend" Now Impending

UPON the programs of Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall stand two works which for most hearers will be novelties, Alexander Steinert's new "Leggenda Sinfonica" and Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 10 in Breitkopf and Härtel's collection. Mr. Steinert's work was begun in 1928, completed in 1930, which is the date he has affixed to the score. It has come to performance once, in Rome, late in 1930, under the baton of Howard Hanson. Haydn's symphony was last performed at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in December, 1902; will thus be remembered by none too large a number of those who attend the symphony concerts.

Mr. Steinert dedicates his new work "To the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary." He uses the large modern orchestra of the present day. A single movement suffices him. A "Legend"—or tale, or story—implies something that is told, or, in the jargon of the musical world, a "program." Yet no program adorns the pages of this new score, and if Mr. Steinert had one in mind he has given no information to that effect. It may well be assumed that this story is the tale of the adventures of certain themes in the land of tones.

The "Leggenda Sinfonica" makes its way through the medium of a free rhythmic scheme such as is often encountered in modern music. Beginning "Andante tranquillo" and proceeding soon to "Allegro moderato," at least nine other tempo indications are found before the story is told. Early in the work Mr. Steinert presents three themes in their simplest forms. The rest is a matter of expansion, variation, development of those themes. At least two considerable climaxes, rythmic and dynamic, he builds up. At the peak of the second he stops, calls for a long pause. Then there ensues the tranquil mood of the beginning and the "Legend" ends "Maestoso." The idiom is that of the day in which Mr. Steinert lives, without being in any sense radical or revolutionary. The themes are of a melodic character, and much of the development of those themes is esssentially melodic. There are also several virile rhythmic developments.

Haydn's Symphony in D major is one of a set of six written on commission for a Parisian organization known as the "Concerts de la Loge Olympique." Haydn wrote these six symphonies between 1784 and 1789, that is, during his last years at Esterházy. In 1790, the year after the completion of the last of these symphonies, Nikolas Joseph of Esterhazy died and his son Anton disbanded the famous orchestra which had been the pride of his father's establishment. However, he not only continued Haydn's salary (or perhaps more properly, his pension) of 1000 florins, but actually increased it to 1400 florins. At the same time he gave Haydn leave to travel, so that Haydn's independence was thus virtually established. The two London journeys followed shortly (1790-92 and 1794-95). The present symphony is thus one of Haydn's later works, dating not much earlier than the famous set of twelve for Salomon at London.

Haydn wrote altogether 104 symphonies. Several others have been ascribed to him, but are of questionable authenticity. Of the one hundred and four, no less than twenty-one are in the key of D major, and seven more in D minor. To say that a symphony of Haydn is in the key of D is therefore to give it no identification at all. To identify positively and definitely, several lists are resorted to. In Breitkopf and Härtel's octavo edition (the list used by the Boston Symphony Orchestra) the present symphony is No. 10. In the complete edition of Haydn's works, in which Eusebius Mandyczewski attempted to list the symphonies in chronological order, this symphony stands as No. 86.

The reason for the popularity of the key of D with Haydn for his symphonies is not far to seek. The two most important notes of this key, the tonic and dominant (D and A) are also the two middle strings of the violin and the two upper strings of the viola and violoncello. If the composer wishes to modulate to the two most closely related keys, the dominant and the subdominant, he still has the two upper strings of his violins (A, E) for the tonic and dominant of his dominant key, and the two lower strings (A, D) for the tonic and dominant of his sub-dominant key. All of which is merely to say that the key of D is the most practical of all keys for strings. And in the days when systematic playing was a young art (Haydn, be it remembered, is sometimes referred to as the "father of the symphony") the matter

138

Stravinsky in the Ears of New York

His "Symphony of Psalms" As Various Reviewers Heard and Wrote

IN ITS TURN, from Dr. Koussevitzky, the Boston Orchestra and the chorus of its own Schola Cantorum, New York has heard Stravinsky as Psalmist. Twice last week, as many as Carnegie Hall might contain listened to the "Psalms-Symphony," first on Thursday evening, second on Saturday evening. Both audiences received music and performance with interest and seeming admiration, Beyond peradventure they were warm in applause. The occasion stirred Mr. Gilman of the Herald Tribune to a notable article, the ablest and most sensitive yet written in America about the 'Psalms-Symphony." Less two factual paragraphs indicating the chosen Psalms and enumerating the orchestral forces, if follows hereunder:

"God is worshipped by artists in many ways. For some, as for Bach, there was the way of simple prayer and intimate communication: the way that in this case was magically transmutting, for it gave us music which escapes from its pietistic century into a timeless existence of its own, a life of the spirit that is independent of the unstable theologies of man.

"Others, finding God in Nature, might be moved to give Blake's answer to the questioner who asked, 'When the sun rises, do you not see a round disk of fire, something like a guinea?'—'No! I see an innumerable company of the heavenly host, crying "Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord God Almighty."' It was thus that Beethoven often worshiped, and Bruckner, and those other mystics for whom the beauty and wonder of the visible earth were august revelations of the divine. Stirred by the miracle of the dawn, by shadows in pools, by the evening light upon the hills, the peace that falls within the valley, they saw these things as, in Wordsworth's phrase, 'the garment of God.'

"Others, again, worship by the bringing of gifts of the imagination, offering the beauty of songs and words, the loveliness of colors and contours and designs—as those who followed to Bethlehem the annunciatory star, bearing frankincense and myrrh, silver and wrought bronze, chalcedonies from the Indies, and pearls from Kushan, and garments stiff with gold, adonred with sapphires where their seams were fastened. Of such are the liberal Kings of art, the Magi of tributary beauty—Handel and Wagner and Brahms.

"And there is the way of Mr. Stravinsky—Stravinsky, the romantic poet of 'L'Oiseau de Feu,' the bitter, ironic jester of 'Petrushka,' the sophisticated savage of the 'Sacre,' the copyist of bygone styles who has played the sedulous ape to Bach and Handel, Beethoven and Glinka and Chaikovsky; Stravinsky, the restless experimentalist, whose feet have now, it seems, been set upon the rock of the Psalmist, and into whose mouth a new song has been put.

"For we are now confronted with Stravinsky the man of primitive faith, an Old-Testament Stravinsky, setting, for orcheestra and chorus, passages from the Psalms of David, by kind encouragement of Dr. Koussevitzky, as an offering to the current celebration by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of its fiftieth anniversary. The result, a "Symphonie de Psaumes," was put before us Thursday night, for the first time here, by the great organization that stoops to conquer us from time to time in the abandoned precincts of Fifty-seventh Street. . . .

"For the three contrasting moods of the symphony — prayer, thanksgiving, praise—Stravinsky has found original and puissant utterance. He has foregone, as one would have expected, the obvious approaches to his text. The musical clichés of lamentation of thanksgiving, of jubilant praise, have no place in his expressional scheme. He has done what the fructifying artist always does in subjecting to his imagination a standardized subject-matter—has discovered in it fresh aspects and implications, hidden depths and surfaces; has made it yield him what the seventeenth century would have called 'an excellent strangeness.'

" 'Before I go hence, and be no more,' sings the Psalmist at the end of his ereaty; and the long-held notes of Stravinsky's chorus, the grave harmonies of the orchestra, effuse no facile pathos but an age-old austerity of grief. For the verses of thanksgiving (set at the beginning as an astonishing double fugue for orchestra and chorus), he finds a music of intricate and subtle poignance, perhaps the most searching page that Stravinsky has yet given us. The Psalmist recalls the horrors of the pit and of the miry clay, and his anguish waiting for release. His speech is somber with remembered pain; and the acid, astringent tones of the woodwind, the spareness and sharpness of the musical idea, its refusal of the easily delectable, mirror the poet's thought.

"In the last division, the Psalmist's hymn of praise, there are superb outbursts—as when the singer remembers the trumpets and organs and stringed instruments that should exalt the Lord. There is music of splendor, music of imperial voice and vesture, 'arrased with purple like the house of kings.' But the most deeply touching of the symphony's movements is that remarkable E-flat passage near the end in which, as you await a mighty outburst at 'praise him upon the loud cymbals,' the music is suddently stilled, and the voices, in a page that haunts the ear and the mind, evoke the awe of the worshipper before the Sanctuary. And the concluding Alleluia, too, is hushed, at the thought of the supreme beneficence . . . 'He hath made everything beautiful in his time: also he hath set eternity in their heart.'

"Stravinsky, in short, has given us a masterpiece. It is his excelling work. For its exhibition last night, in a justly revealing performance, there can be naught but gratitude to the great orchestra which achieved it."

Hear the Other Side

Of course there were dissenting voices. Mr. Thompson lifts one in the Evening Post, when he says: "Once more the orientation of Stravinsky has veered. This symphony is no more like 'Apollo Musagetes' than that work is like 'Le Sacre de Printemps' or 'Œdipus Rex' is like the Symphonies for Wind Instruments. Here is no 'back to Chaikovsky'; no evocation of past graces of Versailles. Ancient Jewry is contemplated—but contemplated, so it seems to us, from afar. . . . His Hebraic questings are not of the flaming, prophetic order. He builds cumulatively but does not depart from his stance of revery. He yields to no excitement; he kindles none. His devotions have in them a reflective remoteness that makes the religious side of the work decidedly secondary to the musical considerations involved.

"There are distinctive, odd and striking details, but for us they were the bright thoughts of an extraordinary technician who had approached his problem of making a symphony of the Psalms by way of the head rather than the heart. We much prefer the pagan Stravinsky to the Psalmist. We would have him moujik, not Levite. This symphony seems to us a work deficient in red blood, much lucubrated very moderately inspired."

There were doubters, besides, as these paragraphs from Mr. Henderson in the Sun bear witness: "One heard Stravinsky again sounding strange polyphonies with wind instruments, challenging the ear with strident staccato chords and weaving his spells with the magic of conflicting keys. Abrupt contrasts of forte and piano were not wanting or melodic fragments seemingly intruded for the sole purpose of becoming lost in the tonal jungle.

"Nevertheless there remained the final conviction that a mind possessed of authority and a hand trained to high skill had been at work. Some of the choral writing was striking in effectiveness and it had a firmness of texture evoking admiration. The departure from the conventional treatment of the old exclamatory 'Alleluia' was noteworthy. Stravensky gave us a very tender setting in sustained tones sung piano. The close of the work was impressive. But it must be added that a searching examination of the composition cannot be attempted after a single hearing, which left this auditor uncertain whether there was something more or a great deal less than appeared on the surface."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series took place yesterday in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitsky conducted the following gprogram: Mozart, Symphony in G minor and Berlioz, Symphonic Fantastique—two symphonies rarely heard at the same concert. The Mozart symphony retains a freshness and vigor that make it delightful to hear. Time has not dealt as kindly with the Symphonie Fantastique; though it is interesting, it has not those inherent qualities that tend, at each hearing, to fill it with vitality.

Mozart's symphony was beautifully played—the finale, brilliant and exhilarating; the andante, quietly poignant. There was a perfect fusion of the conductor's individuality with the composer's art. Nor was there any cut and dried playing on the part of an orchestra presumably weary from recent travels. Phrases were exquisitely chiseled. Each movement was a model in finesse.

Sincerely and sympathetically was the Symphonie Fantastique treated. Though this symphony is remarkable in many respects — marvellous in sonority: effective in the various moods it establishes—it is often trite, banal, and noisy. It looses in power because the composer feels no curb in his dramatic outpouring. The effusiveness of Berlioz, even Dr. Koussevitsky's careful reading could not obliterate. There were moments when the music was frankly vulgar, despite the infinite pains of the conductor; however lovely melodies flicker through the symphony. The "Scene in the Meadows" was so finely done that its length was forgotten.

A large audience was appreciative of the afternoon's music.

The sixth and last concert of this series will take place Tuesday, April 21.

L. B. D.

...aren Hollis

...HADAY

...are invited to contribute to this "Dish..." as to preparation and serving of so... service. Address such special contrib... Editor, Boston Post."

servative orchestration.

symphony and the wayward and angular themes, the personal and progamistic bias, the luxuriant and often bizarre instrumentation of Berlioz' extravagant work Dr. Koussevitzky achieved an astounding contrast of mood and effect.

The performance of Mozart's music was characterized by a fastidious restraint while the Symphony of Berlioz was interpreted with an eloquent intensity and with a fantasy and gusto that matched the composer's own.

An Afternoon of Mozart and Berlioz

NOT more than two works stood upon the fifth program of the Tuesday afternoon series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both were symphonies—Mozart's little symphony in G minor, once described as that rarity, a perfect masterpiece; Berlioz's huge Symphonie Fantastique, now slightly over a century old, and originally put on the programs of the present season in recognition of its centennial year.

For Mozart Dr. Koussevitzky used the small orchestra which has now become standard with him for the playing of works by this composer or of works in similar style, an orchestra ascending from six double basses. The stage at Symphony Hall almost looks bare with such an orchestra. The music sounds as one had always imagined Mozart should ideally sound.

Dr. Koussevitzky's rejuvenating studies of the masterpieces of music would, however, never stop with a shrewd reduction of a swollen orchestra. Into the very marrow of a work he strives to penetrate to bring from it the essence of its distinguishing qualities. Though this symphony in its first movement is labeled "Allegro molto," the so-called "classical" performance of it often leaves one cold, and almost always disappoints one with a feeling of the insignificance of the principal theme. Play this first theme in strict tempo, and too easily comes the reaction—there is no much of anything there. Yet Mozart evidently thought highly of this theme, for he makes it the burden of the entire movement. Time and again, he returns to it; an entire development section is based upon it. Though there is no evidence that the composers of Mozart's day made deep and wide searches for themes that should be laden with significance. Yet they hardly treated themes of which it could be suspected, "nothing there." And in the manner in which Dr. Koussevitzky is playing this symphony this ear, such a suspicion could never enter one's mind. Ever so slightly, ever so subtly he brings a note of pathos into this theme, the note which often is just beneath the surface with Mozart—for those who will look beneath the surface.

Qualities of performance of course brought only excellence. The difficult feats of balance in the second movement were never even suspected, while its song and its decorative scheme flowed along untrammeled, a released thing of beauty. Similarly the happy and elegant dance measures of the minuet and the gayety of the finale—each in its own way added new beauties to this symphony.

Berlioz, in his turn, for his symphony created a detailed and extensive program. The writer who described a symphony as the adventures of a theme in the land of tones, really described this "Fantastic" of Berlioz more nearly than many another. For that is what Berlioz's Symphony actually is, the adventure of the theme of his beloved in several lands of tone. In "Dreams and Passions" he discovers it, follows it through the dance measures of a "Ball," continues with it through new adventures in a "Scene in the Fields," hears it in that terrible "March of the Scaffold" and at the last movement before the ensuing execution, finds it in caricature in the supposed "other world" during the witches' revels of his "Walpurgisnight's Dream." Yes, the adventure of a theme in lands of tone.

But though historians may rub their hands with glee over so definite a novel achievement as that of Berlioz, they overlook not other notable qualities in his work. Just maybe (or, according to more literally-minded researchers, may not be) the "father of the symphony," and of the orchestra, so Berlioz is the father of the science of modern orchestration. For out of the studies of this boy who played only a fife and a guitar grew the splendors and the wizardries which a Liszt and a Wagner and a Strauss later drew from strings and winds and drums. Many of them are already present in this hundred-year-old "Symphonie Fantastique." How frequently one hears a sonority which he believes to be that of the whole orchestra, only to find, when one pinches oneself back into reality that no more than two lines of tone are being used. Wizardry! Who has ever produced a tension more tense than that of a few drum rolls (a Koussevitzky holding the reins, let it not be forgotten) at the end of the "Scene in the Fields"? Wizardry redoubled—in 1830 and 1931. Nor can one fail to note that Strauss putting on paper an execution in "Till Eulenspiegel" can do no better than to use the orchestral sonorities which Berlioz used two-thirds of a century earlier. That Strauss had two conflicting tonalities where Berlioz required only one, does not really affect the matter of sonority. And in sum, how it all sounds! Beside it, classical orchestration seems hardly orchestration at all, but merely a convenient use of instruments and ranges. Hearing this, the student may go back to his text-books and know what the modest writers of those compilations mean when they say that Berlioz began the science of modern orchesration. But it will have taken a Koussevitzky and a hundred men trained in his image to bring them the fullness of that knowledge. A. H. M.

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr Koussevitzky filled the program of the fifth Tuesday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon with two standard symphonies, Mozart's familiar one in G minor, and the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz. The contrast between the classic 18th century and the romantic 19th could hardly have been more strikingly indicated than it was by the juxtaposition of these two masterpieces.

Mozart's symphony, played yesterday by an orchestra hardly more numerous than that for which the composer wrote, but in a much bigger hall than any he ever knew, used for concert giving, brought to the listening ear the serenity, the delicacy of feeling, the undercurrent of profound melancholy, the formal perfection of the great classics.

The performance lacked melodic and rhythmic subtlety, nor was the ensemble playing invariably as accurate as one has a right to expect it to be from so famous and so costly an orchestra. The simplest movement, the minuet, was by far the best played.

The "fixed idea," the theme typifying obsession with an unhappy love, stated near the beginning of Berlioz' symphony and repeated in each of the later movements, is a melody no more emphatic, no more violent than Mozart's. Yet its whole mood is different. It is not incongruous with the wild outbursts of the "March to the Scaffold" and the "Sabbat." Berlioz' music is loose jointed, sacrificing form, proportion, restraint to expression. It is quite obviously "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings."

In the present century it is natural to prefer Mozart to Berlioz, since what Berlioz did so well was afterward done so trivially by Liszt and Tchaikovsky. Yet one cannot honestly say that Mozart was the greater genius, though he was the finer writer of music of the two. Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra did ample justice to Berlioz' fervors, and were warmly applauded. P. R. t

Novelties for A Week-End at Symphony Hall

Rarely Done Haydn Symphony New Steinert "Legend" Now Impending

UPON the programs of Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall stand two works which for most hearers will be novelties. Alexander Steinert's new "Leggenda Sinfonica" and Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 10 in Breitkopf and Härtel's collection. Mr. Steinert's work was begun in 1928, completed in 1930, which is the date he has affixed to the score. It has come to performance once, in Rome, late in 1930, under the baton of Howard Hanson. Haydn's symphony was last performed at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in December, 1902; will thus be remembered by none too large a number of those who attend the symphony concerts.

Mr. Steinert dedicates his new work "To the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary." He uses the large modern orchestra of the present day. A single movement suffices him. A "Legend"—or tale, or story—implies something that is told, or, in the jargon of the musical world, a "program." Yet no program adorns the pages of this new score, and if Mr. Steinert had one in mind he has given no information to that effect. It may well be assumed that this story is the tale of the adventures of certain themes in the land of tones.

The "Leggenda Sinfonica" makes its way through the medium of a free rhythmic scheme such as is often encountered in modern music. Beginning "Andante tranquillo" and proceeding soon to "Allegro moderato," at least nine other tempo indications are found before the story is told. Early in the work Mr. Steinert presents three themes in their simplest forms. The rest is a matter of expansion, variation, development of those themes. At least two considerable climaxes, rythmic and dynamic, he builds up. At the peak of the second he stops, calls for a long pause. Then there ensues the tranquil mood of the beginning and the "Legend" ends "Maestoso." The idiom is that of the day in which Mr. Steinert lives, without being in any sense radical or revolutionary. The themes are of a melodic character, and much of the development of those themes is esssentially melodic. There are also several virile rhythmic developments.

Haydn's Symphony in D major is one of a set of six written on commission for a Parisian organization known as the "Concerts de la Loge Olympique." Haydn wrote these six symphonies between 1784 and 1789, that is, during his last years at Esterházy. In 1790, the year after the completion of the last of these symphonies, Nikolas Joseph of Esterhazy died and his son Anton disbanded the famous orchestra which had been the pride of his father's establishment. However, he not only continued Haydn's salary (or perhaps more properly, his pension) of 1000 florins, but actually increased it to 1400 florins. At the same time he gave Haydn leave to travel, so that Haydn's independence was thus virtually established. The two London journeys followed shortly (1790-92 and 1794-95). The present symphony is thus one of Haydn's later works, dating not much earlier than the famous set of twelve for Salomon at London.

Haydn wrote altogether 104 symphonies. Several others have been ascribed to him, but are of questionable authenticity. Of the one hundred and four, no less than twenty-one are in the key of D major, and seven more in D minor. To say that a symphony of Haydn is in the key of D is therefore to give it no identification at all. To identify positively and definitely, several lists are resorted to. In Breitkopf and Härtel's octavo edition (the list used by the Boston Symphony Orchestra) the present symphony is No 10. In the complete edition of Haydn's works, in which Eusebius Mandyczewski attempted to list the symphonies in chronological order, this symphony stands as No. 86.

The reason for the popularity of the key of D with Haydn for his symphonies is not far to seek. The two most important notes of this key, the tonic and dominant (D and A) are also the two middle strings of the violin and the two upper strings of the viola and violoncello. If the composer wishes to modulate to the two most closely related keys, the dominant and the subdominant, he still has the two upper strings of his violins (A, E) for the tonic and dominant of his dominant key, and the two lower strings (A, D) for the tonic and dominant of his sub-dominant key. All of which is merely to say that the key of D is the most practical of all keys for strings. And in the days when systematic playing was a young art (Haydn, be it remembered, is sometimes referred to as the "father of the symphony") the matter of practicability must often have been a determining feature.

This particular Symphony in D begins with an Adagio which soon leads into the main body of the first movement, an Allegro Spiritoso. The second movement bears captions which at first sight may seem to be contradictory: "Capriccio" as title, and "Largo" as tempo indication. But of this more later. The third movement is the conventional minuet with trio, in Haydnesque Allegretto, and the finale is an Allegro con spirito.

The first movement is a sonata-form with a well-defined, songful second theme. Not always do Haydn's sonata-forms have a well-developed second theme. The principal theme, however, which follows at once after the introductory Adagio, is full of the freshness and gayety and the lightness and sparkle which characterizes so much of Haydn's music. A figure of three repeated notes is much worked in this theme, reminding one that the immortal motif which is basic in Beethoven's fifth symphony, in its repeated notes at least, was anything but original. Beethoven's originality consists in his treatment of his four-note figure, for no two symphonies could be more different than this of Haydn and the C minor of Beethoven.

It has been suggested that the Largo has been entitled "Capriccio" merely to indicate that the composer was using a free and perhaps fantasia-like form. No modern analyst, however, would find Haydn particularly daring or reckless in any of the formal means he employs. In any case, the title "Capriccio" would seem to be entirely deserved by the capricious and (yes, let the word be used) capricious" manner in which after eight bars measures the first violin part conducts itself above slow-moving accompanimental figures. To say that the Minuet is thoroughly Haydnesque is sufficiently to characterize it. Jolly, rustic, good-humored, here and there a bit sly: Haydn. The finale is cast in sonata-form. Again repeated notes, taken in bright staccato, are of prime importance in the chief theme. A livelier theme would be difficult to imagine. The second, slightly more sustained, is on that account hardly less gay. The free fantasia or "development" is short. The recapitalization is regular. There is a coda of no little interest, both harmonically and rhythmically.

The scoring is that of Haydn's later period, strings with a fairly full complement of winds. The earlier symphonies usually employ no more than four wind instruments.

A. H. M.

Programs in Prospect

For the Symphony Concerts of next week—in the evening, and by exception, on Thursday, March 19; in the afternoon as usual on Friday, March 20. The change is made to gain three clear days—Saturday, Sunday and Monday—for rehearsals of Bach's Mass in B minor and other festival pieces. To return to the program:

Suite from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn

Concerto, No. 1, in B-flat minor for Piano and orchestra ..... Chaikovsky
(Pianist: Mr. Horowitz)

Symphony for Orchestra ..... Honegger
(Repeated by Request)

Salome's Dance from the Opera, "Salome." Strauss

For the supplementary Symphony Concert on Monday evening next in Symphony Hall:

Overture, "Leonora, No. 3" ..... Beethoven
Symphony ..... Berezovsky
(New; Conducted by the Composer)
Concerto for Violin with Orchestra ..... Mendelssohn
(Violinist: L. Zighera)
Caprice in Spanish Themes ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

Mr. Berezovsky is a Russian composer and conductor who settled ten years ago in New York. . . . Mr. Léon Zighera, recently arrived from Paris, is brother to Bernard Zighera, first harp at Symphony Hall and to Alfred Zighera of the first desk of violoncellos.

Incidents and Prospects

Seemingly Mr. Chadwick is improving with composition his new leisure as Director Emeritus of the Conservatory. Its student-orchestra announces a concert for Friday evening next in Jordan Hall, Mr. Goodrich conducting. The last items on the program are "Three Pieces for Orchestra" from Mr. Chadwick to be played for the first times. The first is an overture "mignonne"; the second "an old song"; the third a humorful fugue.

The Symphony Orchestra lately added to its anniversary exhibition the sketches made by Charles Follen McKim, the architect, when he proposed to build Symphony Hall in the form of a Greek theater; to give it a tier of boxes; to include both a small and a large concert-room. The two halls proved impracticable on the chosen site; while the Greek design was ultimately abandoned for the present more conservative auditorium. As appears from newspaper records, there was much discussion of Mr. McKim's "idea." To the end of his life he regretted the doubts and fears that overruled it.

Another new case at the exhibition contains memorabilia of Bach, appropriate to the approaching festival. Mr. Malcolm Lang has lent a leaf of a score in the Cantor's own hand. A friendly German gave it to his father.

By the old Russian calendar, Musorgsky died on March 16, 1881; by our calendar on March 28. To mark this fiftieth anniversary, Dr. Koussevitzky was planning to play the Prelude to "Khovantschina" and the fantasia, "A Night on the Bald Mountain," at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Monday, March 16; then remembered the discrepancy between the two calendars. On March 28, however, the Bach Festival will be in full tide and Musorgsky must pass for the moment unhonored. If there is room for the commemorative pieces on a later program the conductor may return to them. Meanwhile Mr. Karolik's concert of Musorgsky's songs is announced for Tuesday evening, April 14, in Symphony Hall.

Professor Hill for Cambridge Hearing

With Dr. Koussevitzky and His Men to Play the New Symphony

SINCE this is the time of festivals and anniversaries, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra went to Cambridge last evening to demonstrate that being festive is a matter of spirit as well as of dates. It was an evening of virtuoso composers and musicians. The audience, gaily responding to the mood, clapped at every turn. Mr. Hill's spirited new symphony produced the first round of hearty applause. The composer, rising to bow acknowledgment, was the recipient of an exceedingly cordial tribute. As he made his way to the platform at Dr. Koussevitzky's urging, the clapping was redoubled and prolonged, rising to a peak of enthusiasm as he touched hands with the conductor and continuing in force for some time after he had resumed his seat. Upon Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were bestowed similar expressions of approval for an engrossing performance of the Prelude of Wagner's music-drama, "Tristan and Isolde," while the completion of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" was occasion for fresh enthusiasm, spontaneous and intense. After each of the numbers just mentioned, Dr. Koussevitzky signalled the musicians to rise in recognition of the unusually cordial reception which had been accorded them. Everyone had reason to be in a cheerful frame of mind upon leaving the hall.

The evening began with the Prelude to the Second Act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline." As at the previous performance in Symphony Hall, the audience sat in charmed attentiveness. Though arousing no enthusiasm, it pleased the sensuous ear and gave free rein to fancy. Mystic melodies wove their spell: lightly tinted timbres played with images in tone. Woodwinds and strings wound their separate strands in delicate pattern. Not too familiar of recent years, this piece now serves to exemplify the sensitiveness and accuracy which are distinguishing features of any performance by the Boston Symphony.

Once attention had been gained and the new idiom accepted, Mr. Hill's symphony won every interest. The listener quickly learned not to look for programatic meaning and to expect no emotional stimulus as would be the case in, say, a symphony of Chaikovsky, a composer who represents an artistic conception which in exact antithesis to that of Mr. Hill. Gradually one was led to follow the new symphony as a stimulating intellectual occupation: to follow pattern and balanced design, development and elaboration in its stripped purity; to observe instrumental adroitness; to thrill at unexpected turns of harmony and to feel their fresh logic when once heard. At the same time, one noted the driving energy of the piece which kept the listening mind constantly alert and refreshed. In the game of chess, the players obtain a peculiar exhilaration from their concentration; the musical mind derives a similar pleasure form Mr. Hill's new symphony, which is, in fact, an intellectual tour de force. Being likewise an instrumental tour de force for the musicians, it is little wonder that it won such hearty approval.

Excerpts from the music-dramas of Wagner always have been in Dr. Koussevitzky's common repertory for the concerts of the Monday and Tuesday series as well as for supplementary concerts of all kinds. Not always is he so fortunate with this composer, particularly in the case of tempo, which is often too greatly retarded. The Prelude of "Tristan" last evening proved an exception. Accents were uncommonly incisive; instrumental tones were of poignant intensity. It was as if Dr. Koussevitzky had found the real flesh and blood of this music in place of its lifeless semblance.

The exceeding brilliance of the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" will remain for some time an exciting memory. The rhythms "got under the skin": the instrumental colors made the blood tingle. In the full joy of exuberant virtuosity, Dr. Koussevitzky invited the individual talents of the orchestra to dip liberally into Rimsky's dazzling instrumental basket. As fast as corn pops, up leaped the scintillant fancies. This was musical pleasure in which players and audience alike took huge delight.

N. M. J.

Concert-Chronicle

Harrying Honegger

A FINAL paragraph may round the record of the Boston Orchestra in New York last week. To Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony" and to Mr. Hill's Second Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky added Honegger's Symphony, played at home last month as one more anniversary piece. Absorbed in Stravinsky's Psalmody, which stood on the same program, the reviewers had little to say of it. Mr. Gilman of the Herald Tribune put it by altogether "for another occasion." The others that have come to hand found various grounds for blame. The Times, reading Honegger's mind as by television, found it lacking in "conviction and integrity of purpose"—whatever those large and sounding words may mean. Having reproached the music as 'harsh, violent, athletic, brutal, physical and Rabelaisian," the Evening Post discovered it—not unnaturally—as lacking "spiritual beauty." (Possibly, even plausibly, Honegger had other goals in mind.) The Sun disliked the piece, and after a queer old fashion, almost vanished from reviewing in America, gave reasons for its distaste:

"The opening movement is rudely and aggressively rhythmic, almost as much so as the celebrated 'Pacific 2-3-1.' One might be listening to the charge of heavy brigade; but the horses do it better. The modernist is always in trouble when he writes an adagio. His abhorrence of the effete lyric line of the classicists and romanticists leaves him with little to work upon save broken ejaculations and harmonies sharper than a serpent's tooth. In the finale Honegger abandoned much of the machinery of his guild and launched recklessly into a good, old fashioned scherzando in which he d pretty much everything from Beethov to Rimsky-Korsakov, and then wound u with some antique sentiment of whic even Raff might not have been ashamed. . . . The reader is near to weeping a he peruses these variegated distresses; bu a sentence in the Times stays the gatl ering tear: "The freshness and nobilit of Handel's Concerto [which had begu the evening] sustained the listene through much that followed." Yes: ther is still mercy in heaven.

REMARKABLE DEBUT BY MILSTEIN

By MOSES SMITH

Nathan Milstein, Russian violinist who has been touring Europe during the past five years with great acclaim, appears at this week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, playing the Brahms concerto. The other numbers on the program are a symphony of Haydn in D major, Alexander Steinert's "Leggenda Sinfonica" (heard for the first time in America) and two Hungarian dances of Brahms.

Mr. Milstein, who is only 26 years old, made the most impressive debut here since Vladimir Horowitz excited even placid old ladies by his piano playing several years ago. In fact, it was in a degree even more impressive, for great violinists come at rare intervals, and Mr. Milstein is undeniably of the top flight.

One of the most memorable features of his performance was the extraordinarily broad and beautiful tone. His bow did not scratch in the most difficult or exciting phrases. In the slow movement this tone was of ravishing sweetness. Intonation was perfect—we can say no more. As to the more important matter—the approach of the artist to the music in hand—Milstein achieved, so far as the listener could detect, that perfect fusion of emotional excitement with intellectual control which is the goal of the interpreter. At any rate, the result spoke for itself. With the aid of an unusually sensitive performance of the orchestral part under Dr. Koussevitzky, Milstein's rendering takes its place along with the great one of Heifetz in this same work two years ago.

Mr. Steinert, a Boston composer, has written an able, stimulating score about which we should like to write more. The French influence (notably that of his master, Loeffler), is writ large, but it does not efface Steinert's individuality, his technical mastery, nor his remarkable capacity for building up a climax. His composition was greeted with unsual enthusiasm after an excellent performance.

Virtuoso

NATHAN MILSTEIN

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A "Leggenda Sinfonica," by Alexander Lang Steinert, dedicated "to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary," was the novelpiece set upon the program for the orchestra's eighteenth pair of concerts, in Symphony Hall, Boston, March 13 and 14. It had had a previous performance at the Augusteo, Rome.

Mr. Steinert, as the program informed us, is "at home in Paris, France." This information had already been conveyed by the composer's symphonic poem, "Southern Night," introduced by the Boston orchestra four seasons ago; and it was corroborated by the new score, which shows him still under the spell of Debussy and Ravel. An honorable tradition, which Mr. Steinert is carrying on with credit.

"Leggenda Sinfonica" is a title which seems to indicate a "program." As to this, the composer says only that the coda (which follows a dramatic pause) "suggests the narrator who has come to the close of a legendary tale." Probably the music would hold more appeal if the composer had confided to us the nature of this legendary tale. But he speaks merely of three themes, which pass through various phases of development and variation. The listener may detect the themes, and he may follow their treatment, with a certain sense of familiarity. As music, without the aid of literary associations, this score may find some difficulty in justifying itself. We may hope that the composer's next work will display greater originality.

Dr. Koussevitzky had opened the program with a performance of a Haydn Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10) which had not been heard in Boston for nearly 30 years. It is the fifth of a series written for the Concert de la Loge Olympique of Paris. For some reason Dr. Koussevitzky, who of late has been employing a much reduced orchestra for Mozart, used for Haydn nearly his full complement of strings. We have a feeling that the symphony would have left a better impression if it had been uttered in a smaller voice.

The opening Adagio leads into an Allegro of normal form and rather workaday content. The slow movement, labeled "Capriccio," permits the composer some odd tricks of fancy, with violin figures scampering over Largo measures from the rest of the orchestra. It was here that one longed most for a smaller tone, and also for a lighter touch. There was, one felt, an attempt to put too much emotion into the melodies, and too heavy an accent on the chords. The Minuetto, however, had all the Haydnesque jollity, and the Trio, of exceptional charm, was exquisitely played. The last movement, with a conspicuously salient principal theme, was likewise justly set forth.

The soloist was Nathan Milstein, young violinist, who with praiseworthy devotion to artistic ideals had chosen the Brahms Concerto for his first appearance in Boston. Of the virtuoso type, he had a prodigious success. The applause after the first movement was unusually prolonged, and at the close, stamping was mingled with the handclapping. Mr. Milstein has an excellent technique and makes evident his musical feeling. His ardor compensates somewhat for an undeniable lack of breadth in his tone. With greater maturity, doubtless, he will be able to penetrate more deeply into the musical heart of this master-concerto, whose technical demands he already meets dazzlingly.

The Hungarian Dance of Brahms (F major and G minor) closed the program.

L. A. S.

BOSTON Ev

Symphony

The Happiest Of Symphonic Entertainmen

Newfound Hungarian Dance A Soloist, Haydn, and A Native Son

IT IS arguable that the Symph Orchestra might have best celebra its fiftieth year by the repetition, order, of all the programs of its fi season. Five months ago, to begin t rites, the orchestra repeated, with a s gle variation, the pieces played at t initial concerts of Oct. 21-22, 1881. Stro and able after half a century, Sir Geor Henschel as guest was again the co ductor. No doubt he was occasion f the ardent applause of both Friday a ernon and Saturday evening. But it w equally plain to attentive, inquiring o servers that both audiences took small pleasure in a program, believ by Sir George himself so antiquated th he had elided one item. Especially the matinée, as minor Beethoven, Gluc Haydn, Schubert of ballet music, ev Bruch of "Odysseus," passed in proc sion, the general delight ran high. Stude of progress, education, idealism and ot vaunted courses of the human race no that in 1930, after fifty years of Sy phony Concerts in Boston, the put taste in programs was virtually changed.

An incident of yesterday afterno confirmed this impression. As penda to Brahms's Violin Concerto Dr. Ko sevitzky ended the day with two the composer's orchestrated Hunga Dances. Through the first three sea of the concerts one or more played annually. By 1887, the inter between performances lengthened. 1903 the dances disappeared altoget from the active repertory. Throu twenty-eight years they have been re gated to The Pops, where they retu infrequently. On Friday the re-inst ment of two produced an excitemen most comparable with that generated the first hearing of Ravel's more rec "Bolero." The applause was tumu ous; the conductor was urgently recall On the right side of the hall, there w cheers and the most exuberant exp sion of delight known to the mat audience—the stamping of feet. sainted Johannes must have sat up, prised and elated, in his grave-clot When the Hungarian Dances were and much played in the garden res rants that he liked to frequent, they voked no warmer response. Accor to its familiar habit, Boston had prov another unique occasion—for 1931. S er or later, some conductor, whose modernism is a cynical streak, will re to the programs of the early eight eighties—and in the nineteen-forties c all before him at Symphony Hall.

That other essential to enjoymen the earlier standards of the Symp Concerts was also in presence—a so These are counted days of what the s ers call "conductor-worship"; but ma frequenter of Symphony Hall would ly hear an "assisting artist" every Fr afternoon, in the good old fashion o eighties—could the management a prices current. After all, the natura man preference for persons playing r rather than for the music itself, is a changeable quantity. Yesterday the s was young Mr. Milstein, friend of witz in their Odessan days, like making his way to these United S where through two years he has p as violinist, with orchestras and r citals.* He is a dark and comely y man at the middle twenties, modest al; yet in performance betraying a or two of emotional stress, honestly obtrusively, in the way that also sti audience. It responded with floods plause, only a little less than it had poured a few weeks ago upon Heifetz, or that a week onward it w lease upon Mr. Horowitz and Ch sky. Blessed be soloists for their sake! They warm ears, hearts and h

Mr. Milstein played the solo pa Brahms's Concerto, of late biennia at these concerts. Some that would their Brahms rugged and grave, t

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

140

MILSTEIN HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Russian Violinist Makes Boston Debut

Globe Mar. 14

Nathan Milstein, a young Russian violinist who studied under the late Leopold Auer, made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon as soloist in the Brahms concerto at the Symphony concert. Mr Milstein was applauded by orchestra and audience with unusual warmth for playing which deserved the much abused adjective "brilliant."

The novelty on Dr Koussevitzky's program was a "Leggenda Sinfonica" by the young Bostonian composer Alexander Steinert. Mr Steinert was called to the stage to bow repeatedly in response to prolonged applause. Dr Koussevitzky, as is his invariable custom, made his own approval of Mr Milstein and Mr Steinert manifest by hearty handclapping. He is al anxious that young musicians sl be encouraged by a hearty respon their efforts at the Symphony conc

The Brahms concerto is not e tially a show piece, nor has Mr stein's quiet and sensible dem on the concert platform any hi the ostentation of the old-fash "virtuoso" violinist. Yet his bol spirited style of playing, the app ease with which he performed the most intricate and techn difficult phrases, his big tone, his mand of rhythmic and melodic e conquered the approval of Mr stein's hearers.

He has at 28 already acquire international reputation. His ma of violin playing is indeed indispu But ought the Brahms concer sound quite as brilliant as he ma Would not greater purity of tone a less romantic interpretation be erable? At least one listener terday thought so.

"Leggenda Sinfonica"

Mr Steinert's "Leggenda Sinfor dedicated to the Boston Sym Orchestra "on its 50th anniver was first performed at Rome D 1930. Yesterday's was merely th performance in the United S This work has no detailed pro merely the hint to the listener agination that the coda, follow moment of silence, "suggests th rator who has come to the enc legendary tale."

Mr Steinert's score is an ela working out of three musical which are developed to a fort climax. The themes and his ment of them recall the wo Henry Hadley among the elde eration of living Americans, a Howard Hanson among the y contemporary Americans. He h caped for the most part the a vading influence of Stravinsky. T written with a markedly inc command of musical texture, th piece lacks some of the harmoni that was the chief charm of Mr ert's earlier work. The perfor was painstakingly eloquent.

Dr Koussevitzky, wisely t from the more familiar symp Haydn wrote for England, ch open yesterday's concert with D major written in the 1780s f "Concert de la Loge Olympiq Paris, and unplayed here sin regime of Mr Gericke. This sym is one of Haydn's best, full melodic and rhythmic vitality a insured immortality for his despite its obvious limitations hopes others like it may be resu from his complete works and for our delectation.

Small Orchestra

For Mozart Dr Koussevitzk employs habitually a small orc with about the quota of instr for which the 18th century cor wrote as a rule, no more than ers at most. But in Paris the by the 1780s orchestras aim large as the present Boston phony, a fact doubtless held by Haydn when writing the sy played yesterday. It was th the right thing to do to use number of strings, as Dr Kouss wisely did. One felt that in a hall this procedure might erable even for Mozart.

Yesterday's performance wa ited and delightful one, faithf spirit of Haydn's music, with dantic overemphasis on its l was renewed evidence of th progress made in recent sea conductor and orchestra.

MILSTEIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Post Mar 14

Steinert's "Leggenda Sinfonica" Well Received

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concerts have suddenly "gone soloist." At the last pair there was Mr. Heifetz, scaling the heights in the Wist[illegible]

Evans.

Mar 17 Pla

New Composer, New Violinist Contrastingly

An Exuberant Young Russian, And a Matured Parisian Prove Their Mettle

THE audience at "the Mondays" of the Symphony Orchestra is like no other that it assembles. On "the Tuesdays," the company is more youthful and predominantly feminine. On the subscription Fridays, it has "social cachet"—or so the authorities in such matters say; while on the subscription Saturdays, it wears an unmistakable air of quiet distinction. Perhaps it is safest to say that the Monday audience enjoys its six concerts for their own sake; that it attends from no other motive; that it prefers six evenings to twenty-four. Call it also the middle audience of Symphony Concerts, as distinguished from the "social" audience of Friday, the "connoisseur" audience of Saturday, the "youngish" audience of Tuesday. Above any of these three, it upturns faces seemingly of European rather than American or New-England origin; while beyond all the rest, it enjoys itself and makes no secret of its pleasure.

Probably to nineteen-twentieths of his hearers, Mr. Léon Zighera was an unknown quality until they read his name on the program-leaf. Yet at the end of Mendelssohn's Violin-Concerto they applauded him to the echo. As composer and conductor, Mr. Nicolai Berezovsky, with a new Symphony, must have been equally unknown. Once, twice and three times he was heartily recalled. Beethoven's third "Leonora" Overture whipped this Monday audience into rounds of clapping. At the end of the concert, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" fared almost as well. As for Dr. Koussevitzky, there is no taking him for granted when he comes to his place. Or the orchestra, when it rises at his call. The Monday concerts, then, for cheerful excitement. On that score, even the Tuesday matinées hardly keep pace. For both, the Symphony Orchestra is not an institution.

Mr. Zighera, of that Roumanian family of musicians, is elder brother to the familiar harpist and violoncellist at Symphony Hall. He has made his career in Paris—in orchestras, in recitals and as leader of a string quartet. Now he would try fortune in American concert-halls. His choice of Mendelssohn's Concerto suggests his qualities as virtuoso and musician. He draws a small, sensitive and finely tempered tone, that, over-pressed, tends to run thin and shrill. He directs it with keen ear, flexible hand, clear musical instinct and taste. He is neither effective nor eloquent in the conventional sense of the words, but he can shade his tone expertly; keep a smooth euphony with accompanying instruments; poise and round a phrase; point up a rhythm; control a climax—all discreetly and with clear feeling for the music before him.

Measuring all things, Mr. Zighera never clouded Mendelssohn's limpid flow; kept every contour smooth and fine; made tonal lace-work of the figures; took the displayful cadenza lightly; was sympathetic to the composer's sentiment. Not once did he inflate it into emotion; so overstrain both the pattern and the mood. At the end the listener knew him for a violinist with a happy sense of appropriate style. Playing Mendelssohn's Concerto in character, he saved it from the years and from the fashions. Dr. Koussevitzky did no less for the orchestral part. Taken for what it is, the old piece, now near to its nineties, holds its own. A Viennese like Mr. Kreisler; a Parisian, like Mr. Zighera, plays it instinctively.

Decidedly Mr. Berezovsky is of another mettle. His Symphony is brief and impetuous, plunging through a single movement, well marked into the usual divisions. A recurring motiv, clearly defined at the outset, oftener repeated than varied, binds the whole together. Secondary motivs character each division; one or two suggest Russian folk-tunes. There is little development in the orthodox symphonic sense. Instead, changing rhythm, diversified harmonic and instrumental color, keep the music in motion and significance. True Russian, Mr. Berezovsky is no structural composer; while throughout he prefers free form, free melody, free rhythm. (There is hardly a "modernism" in the whole Symphony.) Above all, he has a passion for sonorities fed, no doubt, by orchestral experience as player and conductor. He chooses the driving pace, the whipping rhythm, the tumultuous progress. He urges his orchestra exuberantly, unremittingly, often to the neglect of contrast. He deploys it in tonal mass, or choir by choir, rather than with play of individual instruments. His scherzo leaps; his slow movement sings loud; his finale rises, breaks, rises yet again in floods of sound. Anywhere and everywhere, if there are details, who can spy them out? Hot blood, young vigor and an orchestra at full power carry all before them. Only pedants or "superior persons" will say nay to Mr. Berezovsky's Symphony of young twenties.

From Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra the third "Leonora" Overture now sounds in high, heroic voice. The conductor misses no significant detail; deepens or sharpens the momentary significance. Yet the whole expands and mounts; while each phrase, each musical sentence or paragraph falls into instant place. There is transition, suspense, climax. A musical design, puissant in itself, is moulded and dramatized into epic epitome of the victory of freedom over durance, love over hate, light over darkness. The listener doubts only at the moment when the proclaiming trumpets sound too faint and far. . . . . Agreed that in these realistic days of Spanish composers, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice" is Spanish only by courtesy title. Agreed also that, first last, and nearly all the time, it is orchestral show-piece. Nobody but reviewers of music in New York live perpetually upon a lofty plane of "spiritual elevation." For the rest of us, every one of Rimsky's kickshaws—variations, gypsy song, cadenzas, fandango, what not—so long as there is a virtuoso-orchestra to dispense them and a conductor rejoicing in it to give the word. Euterpe smiles—maybe tucks up her skirt—when she hears such a music.

H. T. P.

MUSIC

Herald Mar 14

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 18th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 16). Steinert, Leggenda Sinfonica (first performance in this country). Brahms, Violin Concerto and Hungarian Dances Nos 2 F major, and 1, G minor. Nathan Milstein, the solo violinist, played for the first time in Boston.

The symphony by Haydn, one of the six written for the Concert de la Loge Olympique, Paris, was no doubt unknown to the great majority of the assembled hearers. It was played in 1902 in the reign of Wilhelm Gericke, as another symphony in this set. The Bear, was introduced at these concerts by Arthur Nikisch in 1889. Its zoological companion The Hen is by no means familiar. The symphony played yesterday is fresh and blithe in spite of the formulas expected from every God-fearing composer at the end of the 18th century. It provokes what a speaker at the banquet reported by Athenaeus called "gentleman-like joy." The Parisian orchestra, which Haydn undoubtedly had in mind, was a large one—40 violins, 12 violoncellos, eight double basses—so that the composer could be sure of strong contrasts in performance by the string section. Fortunate composer—whose symphonies require no analysis—no remarks about chief and subsidiary themes: music that one can, sitting back, enjoy without inquiring into psychological intention or noting attempts at realism in musical seascapes and landscapes—music not inspired by book or picture—just music; now pompous, now merry, and in more serious moments, never too sad, but with a constant feeling for tonal grace and beauty.

The Symphonic Legend by Alexander Lang Steinert, dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its 50th anniversary, was played for the first time at the Augusto in Rome on Dec. 14, 1930, when Howard Hanson conducted it. This Legend is a more important work as regards form, construction and contents, if less poetical, than Steinert's Southern Night played here under Dr. Koussevitzky, nearly five years ago. The Legend is the more mature composition, as is natural, for in the years between the composer has not been working and hearing. It is all very well for a composer to stay in his ivory tower lest by straying into concert halls he may be unduly influenced. While Mr. Steinert's teachers since 1923 have been leaders in the Parisian schools, his own music is not like the bean described by Gilbert as "too French." His own independence in musical thought and his natural taste have kept him from slavish imitation of some master either of the impressionistic, the realistic or the anarchistic school. It is not surprising then that this Legend is first of all honest music; there is no desire on the part of the composer to show the originality that is merely eccentricity or perverse in its worship of ugliness. There is a respect for the sound traditions, respect for that which is distinctively characteristic of the French school—we are not speaking of the dissenting or heterodox chapels—clarity, logical continuity, a sense of rhythmic and dynamic values; coloring that is appropriate to the musical thoughts and is neither pale nor gaudy. Although Mr. Steinert calls for a large and modern orchestra he uses it discreetly and does not find it necessary to employ all the instruments all the time or work them overtime. The Legend is the expression of a sensitive musician. It was received with more than the usual favor shown for an unfamiliar work. The composer bowed his acknowledgment.

Mr. Milstein is in his 27th year. There are some who think that a violinist should not attempt to play music by Johannes Brahms until his hair is silvered, his legs wobble and the state of his heart debars him from life insurance. Liszt said that youth is the time for virtuosity, but your true Brahmsite shudders if his "Master" and virtuosity are named in the same breath. After all, Johannes wrote for the fiddle music that demands full expression, and full expression does not come from the fiddle until the player is a virtuoso in the best sense of the word. "But," some say, "the music of Brahms demands thoughtfulness, gravity, a feeling for the eternal verities, a spiritual nature." There is no end to this pretty talk or balderdash, as you will. Surely Mr. Milstein's experiences in Russia until he made his escape gave him experience, gave him food for thought. Nor should the fact that he is an accomplished violinist preclude him from expounding the gospel according to St. Johannes. It is enough to say of his performance yesterday that technically, emotionally and "intellectually"—if any one insists on this feature of an interpretation—it was engrossing and admirable, a performance that by its compelling nature aroused genuine enthusiasm. It is needless to say that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an accompaniment that was not merely a support.

The concert ended with the exciting, fiery, paprika reminder of Hungary. For once the old saying that the music of Brahms is a gypsy woman trying to dance in a tight corset was forgotten.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the usual Saturday night concert will take place on Thursday night. The Friday afternoon concert will still be on Friday. The program will comprise Mendelssohn's overture and Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Honegger's Symphony (played earlier in this season); Tchaikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 (Mr. Horowitz) and Salome's dance from Strauss's opera.

The other day in London, Stravinsky himself played the piano-part in his own "Caprice" and was welcomed a deal less warmly than Bostonians are accustomed to receive Mr. Sanromá in the same music. Said the Times dryly:

Stravinsky as composer and as pianist was the bright particular star of last night's concert at Queen's Hall; but when he came on to the platform to play the solo part in his "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra he was received with reserve. Perhaps the audience was waiting to see how bright he was going to be before showing him any particular favor. When it was over the applause was not tumultouous; indeed, it was rather surprisingly apathetic, for the "Capriccio" is certainly a bright work. It contains tunes with lively rhythms and plenty of those quips of orchestration with which Stravinsky in his earlier days improved on Rimsky-Korsakov, and in the use of which his numerous imitators have conspicuously failed to improve on him.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE MAR 15

This week the Saturday concert of the Boston Symphony has been shifted to Thursday evening, in order to make room for the final rehearsals for the Bach festival next week. The Friday concert will be given at the usual hour.

The soloist will be Vladimir Horowitz, the sensational Russian pianist, who should excel in the Tchaikovsky concerto he has chosen. Dr Koussevitsky will repeat the new Honegger symphony, composed for the Boston Symphony's anniversary. It is to be hoped that he may later also repeat Roussel's new symphony, the third of the trio of masterpieces thus far introduced this year. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" has already been repeated here. It was also played in New York by the orchestra last week, and even the ultra conservative New York reviewers, most of whom detest music later than Debussy, conceded that it is a masterpiece.

Tomorrow night, by exception, the Monday subscribers will hear a symphony and a soloist not offered in the regular series, a proceeding sure to rouse protests that inferior articles not good enough for the Friday and Saturday audiences are being palmed off on the Monday audience. Nicolai Berezowsky, who has had works performed in New York and Cincinnati, will conduct the first Boston performance of his symphony. He is a Russian, and has been one of the violinists in the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The soloist is a young violinist, Leon Zighera, who has two brothers among the Boston Symphony members, the first harp, and a cellist.

Many soloists will appear in the Bach Festival to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week in memory of Henry L. Higginson and in celebration of its 50th anniversary.

Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz will appear with the orchestra in the concerto for two violins, March 27. Mr Burgin will be the soloist, together with Georges Laurent, flute; Ferdinand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet, in the Second Brandenburg Concerto, March 26. Alexander Borovsky, together with Messrs Burgin and Laurent will appear in the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto, March 28. Mr Borovsky will also play the Piano Concerto in D minor, March 26, and give a group of Preludes and Fugues from the "Well-tempered clavichord," March 28. Mme Patorni-Casadesus, who like Mr Borovsky is coming from Europe for the occasion, will give a group of solos for harpsichord, March 25. On the same date Wallace Goodrich will play organ pieces, and Bliss Perry, the biographer of Henry L. Higginson, will give an address on the orchestra's founder.

To appear in the choral scores of five programs will be Amy Evans, soprano; Adelle Alberts, second soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; and Fraser Gange, baritone.

The festival will begin Tuesday evening, March 24, and continue daily through the following Sunday, March 29.

Tuesday evening, April 7, Lewis Emery, baritone, will be heard here at Jordan Hall for the first time.

Original sketches made for Symphony Hall in 1892 are now being shown at the anniversary exhibition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These plans were based upon the design of a Greek theatre and were subsequently abandoned. They were made by Charles F. McKim of the firm of McKim, Mead & White. It was also Mr McKim who designed the auditorium which now stands.

The Week-End Pleasures of Concert-Halls

Peace Again at Symphony Hall, Discovery at Cambridge, Franck Renewed

A DESIRABLE change has come to pass at the Symphony Concerts, noticed, perhaps, only by those who repine under it or are soothed by it. The concerts of Friday and Saturday began with a symphony by Haydn no more than half an hour long. From first note to last, the doors were closed and kept closed. That is to say, no late-comers entered in the momentary pauses between the movements—no, not even when the conductor had lifted his hand to beat the initial measure. Through the other numbers the doors were as strictly guarded. For the first times, almost, in a season that has now run two-thirds of its course, both audiences listened undisturbed by the inept or careless admission of the tardy. Agreed that, the task is considerable. There are forty-eight entrances to be watched—a surprising number; but as the event proved twice over, with a little discipline they can be watched effectively.

From October through February, breaches of the peace, and public or private complaint over them, had steadily increased. Especially on Friday afternoons, and even when performance was in full tide, late-comers entered the hall without let or hindrance; moved leisurely to their chairs, not always near a door; settled themselves as audibly; in general and in particular perturbed the neighborhood. Worse still, at the pauses, however brief, in a symphony, a suite or a concerto, the doors opened and one or another moved, "dignified and stately," to his or her place; while conductor or orchestra waited their pleasure with uplifted hands or ready lips. As gossip had it, the climax came when one late-comer paused twice in her course to exchange the time of day with acquaintances; while conductor, orchestra and audience waited, in weary politeness, for the end of these greetings.

No wonder complaint multiplied to the management; while the venerable sage of the program-book protested openly and warrantably "in the public prints." Now, at last, discipline is restored; the doors are firmly guarded; many are returning thanks. All of which is not to [illegible]eing hide-note and ected ually

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A new symphony and a soloist newly come to America graced the fifth concert of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the evening of March 16. The symphony was the first adventure in this form by Nicolai Berezowsky, a young Russian now living in New York. The soloist was Léon Zighera, violinist, and brother of Alfred of the first desk of the orchestra's cellos, and of Bernard, its first harpist.

Born in Leningrad, Mr. Berezowsky migrated to the United States in 1922 and became a member of the New York Philharmonic, leading the second violin. His "Hebrew" Suite was performed in 1928 by the New York Philharmonic under Mengelberg. He has written chamber music, an operetta and a cantata.

This "Symphony in one movement"—really in four, played without pause—though it is without key designation, was evidently not written merely to shock the public. Even if Mr. Berezowsky had been tempted to take this road to notoriety, he probably would have realized that traffic on it is now diverted to obscurity. No; his music is really quite lyric, opening with a clearly drawn if not especially compelling theme in the flute, which serves him well throughout. There are other themes, too, one of which, for violas, is rather attractive. None of these themes undergoes any real development. They are tossed about and interwoven among the several choirs with considerable sense of instrumental values but without much apparent structural feeling. The slow movement is restful, and the Scherzo engaging in a quite Russian way. In the Finale the composer surrenders to Stravinsky. Here there is considerable rhythmic emphasis, and a great deal of noise. By reason of its energy and vitality, transmitted through a stirring performance under the composer's own vigorous baton, the symphony won a notable success.

Mr. Zighera brought to the interpretation of Mendelssohn's Concerto a good left-hand technique, excellent bowing and strong musical feeling. His tone is small and rather feminine, and for this reason he doubtless was well advised to choose this concerto for his American début, rather than a more robust vehicle. His performance was well received.

The concert opened with a thrilling proclamation of the "Leonore" No. 3 Overture and closed with a performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" in which the meretriciousness of the music was almost forgotten in the virtuosity of its utterance. Mr. Burgin (concertmaster), Mr. Laurent (flute), Mr. Speyer (English horn) and Mr. B. Zighera (harp) particularly distinguished themselves in their solo passages.

L. A. S.

"Bach" case of special with the c
so on view.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MILSTEIN HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Russian Violinist Makes Boston Debut

Globe—Mar. 14

Nathan Milstein, a young Russian violinist who studied under the late Leopold Auer, made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon as soloist in the Brahms concerto at the Symphony concert. Mr Milstein was applauded by orchestra and audience with unusual warmth for playing which deserved the much abused adjective "brilliant."

The novelty on Dr Koussevitzky's program was a "Leggenda Sinfonica" by the young Bostonian composer Alexander Steinert. Mr Steinert was called to the stage to bow repeatedly in response to prolonged applause. Dr Koussevitzky, as is his invariable custom, made his own approval of Mr Milstein and Mr Steinert manifest by hearty handclapping. He is al anxious that young musicians sl be encouraged by a hearty respon their efforts at the Symphony conc

The Brahms concerto is not e tially a show piece, nor has Mr stein's quiet and sensible dem on the concert platform any hi the ostentation of the old-fash "virtuoso" violinist. Yet his bol spirited style of playing, the app ease with which he performed the most intricate and techn difficult phrases, his big tone, his mand of rhythmic and melodic e conquered the approval of Mr stein's hearers.

He has at 26 already acquire international reputation. His ma of violin playing is indeed indispu But ought the Brahms concer sound quite as brilliant as he ma Would not greater purity of tone a less romantic interpretation be erable? At least one listener terday thought so.

"Leggenda Sinfonica"

Mr Steinert's "Leggenda Sinfo dedicated to the Boston Sym Orchestra "on its 50th anniver was first performed at Rome D 1930. Yesterday's was merely th performance in the United S This work has no detailed pro merely the hint to the listener agination that the coda, follow moment of silence, "suggests th rator who has come to the end legendary tale."

Mr Steinert's score is an ela working out of three musical which are developed to a fort climax. The themes and his ment of them recall the wo Henry Hadley among the elde eration of living Americans, Howard Hanson among the y contemporary Americans. He caped for the most part the vading influence of Stravinsky. written with a markedly inc command of musical texture, th piece lacks some of the harmoni that was the chief charm of Mr ert's earlier work. The perfo was painstakingly eloquent.

Dr Koussevitzky, wisely t from the more familiar symp Haydn wrote for England, ch open yesterday's concert with D major written in the 1780s "Concert de la Loge Olympiq Paris, and unplayed here sin regime of Mr Gericke. This sym is one of Haydn's best, full melodic and rhythmic vitality insured immortality for his despite its obvious limitations hopes others like it may be resu from his complete works and for our delectation.

Small Orchestra

For Mozart Dr Koussevitzk employs habitually a small orc with about the quota of instr for which the 18th century co wrote as a rule, no more than ers at most. But in Paris the by the 1780s orchestras alm large as the present Boston phony, a fact doubtless held by Haydn when writing the sy played yesterday. It was t the right thing to do to use number of strings, as Dr Kous wisely did. One felt that in a hall this procedure might erable even for Mozart.

Yesterday's performance wa ited and delightful one, faithf spirit of Haydn's music, with dantic overemphasis on its l was renewed evidence of t progress made in recent sea conductor and orchestra.

MILSTEIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Post Mar 14

Steinert's "Leggenda Sinfonica" Well Received

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concerts have suddenly "gone soloist." At the last pair there was Mr. Heifetz, scaling the heights in the Vi-

Globe

Page Fourteen

Mar 17 Pla

New Composer, New Violinist Contrastingly

